Lord CASTLEREAGH felt strongly that the Hon. Gentleman had supported the cause of justice. At the same time, he must express his hope, that if the House should refuse the proposed grant to the Duke of Cumberland, it would not withhold dower from the Duchess—(hear, hear.)

Mr. PROTHEROE said, that the sense of the country was expressed by the former vote on the subject; and if the House were now to accede to the motion, it would fill the country with disgust, and bring the proceedings of Parliament into contempt. (Hear, hear!)

Sir THOMAS ACLAND and Lord STANLEY could not consent to the motion.

Mr. F. DOUGLAS said, after the decision in the case of the Duke of Cambridge, he should certainly give his support for granting a similar sum to the Duke of Cumberland.

Mr. GURNEY said, that as the House had thought proper to grant a sum to the Duke of Cambridge, it would be the height of injustice to refuse the same to the Duke of Cumberland.

Mr. ELLIOT thought that as the Duke of Clarence was so near the throne, there was a case for a moderate provision for him; but as to the junior branches of the Royal Family, he did think, and had always thought, that they had been most liberally provided for. (Hear, hear!)

Lord ARCHIBALD HAMILTON said a few words against the motion.

Mr. CANNING thought it was impossible for Ministers to take themselves to exclude any branch of the Royal Family, without stigmatizing them by such exclusion; their proposal had therefore been to take the sense of the House, and if they found it against them, to vote themselves, as bound in common consistency, but without pressing the measure.

Sir JOHN NEWPORT said that if the House retracted the vote of yesterday, they passed a deliberate censure on their own conduct.

Mr. BRAGGE BATHURST thought the House was not bound by the decision of yesterday.

Mr. WYNN said, that the marriage of the Duke of Cambridge with the same Princess (the Duchess of Cumberland) had been broken off at the desire of his Majesty. A Noble Friend had suggested another topic—a female of the highest rank in this country had testified her objection to the match by refusing to receive the Lady in her presence.—(Disapprobation from Honourable Members.)—It was on these grounds that the former decision of the House was one that gave satisfaction to the country; and whatever had since been the conduct of the Lady, the best panegyric that could be pronounced on her was, that nothing further whatever had been heard of her.

Mr. LITTLETON maintained, that the more the character of the Duke of Cumberland was known, the more it would excite regard. As to the insinuations that had been thrown out, no assertion of their truth had ever been made; and he should be ashamed if he could be induced, by any hope of popularity, to give credit to them for a moment.—(Cheers from honourable Members.)

On a division, the numbers were—For the Motion, 136—Against it, 143—Majority against the Grant, 7.—This decision was received by the loud acclamations of the majority.

When strangers were admitted into the gallery, they found the Chairman of the Committee reading the question on the resolution for granting 6,000*l.* a-year to the Duchess of Cumberland; as a dowry, in the event of the decease of his Royal Highness her husband.—After some debate, the question was put, and the resolution unanimously agreed to.

Mr. BROGDEN brought up the report of the grant to the Duke of Clarence.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that in putting the negative on this question, neither the Royal Duke nor he meant any disrespect to the House in saying that he wished to found no Bill upon it.—The grant might be agreed to, and no methods taken for carrying it into effect.

The resolution was then read, when Mr. M. A. TAYLOR again protested against it.

After a few words the resolution was adopted.—Adjourned.

Friday, April 17.

CAPE BRETON, GOVERNOR AINSLIE, &c.

Mr. BENNET presented a petition from Mr. Gibbons, a Colonist of Cape Breton, where he had acted as Attorney-General. He complained of injustice from the Governor (Ainslie) and the Chief Justice of the Colony, both to himself and others. Property had been taken and taxes levied in a most illegal manner, and the Chief Justice had changed his decisions at the request of the Governor. Mr. Bennet did not say that Governor Ainslie had conducted himself so enormously as he had at Dominica; he had not decorated the coast with human heads—(hear, hear!)—but without entering upon his indecent life and example, it was not unusual with him, when persons waited on him on business, to collar and kick them down stairs, if they displeased him:—(laughter.)—His private and his public conduct were alike. Such persons, Mr. Bennet was convinced, were wholly unfit for their stations. He should call for documents on the subject.

Mr. GOLBURN was not prepared for such a crimination of the Governor and Chief Justice, and therefore could not reply in a satisfactory manner. Mr. Gibbons should have brought his charges before the proper tribunal.

The Petition was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FINANCE.

Mr. VANSITTART gave notice, that on Monday he should submit an important measure of finance.

ROYAL MARRIAGES.

The Report of the Committee on the Royal Message was brought up, and the Resolutions agreed to.

Lord GOWER acquainted the House with her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cumberland's reception of the grant they had made her. Her first feeling was an impression of gratitude, but accompanied with a delicacy in accepting any thing that might have a tendency to produce a separate feeling between her Royal Highness and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland. But perceiving that it was the anxious wish of his Royal Highness that she should be provided for, she made a sacrifice to that feeling; and so much the more readily, trusting, as she did, that she might never be considered as a burden to that nation by which she had been treated with such kindness and respect—(hear, hear!) Lord CASTLEREAGH gave a similar intimation.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.

This Bill being taken into consideration, on the clause limiting the labour of the children to twelve hours and a half, Mr. WILBERFORCE hinted that he thought six or seven hours labour quite enough. A discussion ensued, and it was finally agreed that the Bill should be re-committed on Tuesday.

FORGED BANK NOTES.

Sir J. MACKINTOSH fixed his motion respecting Forged Notes for Tuesday.

Mr. MANNING wished for an early discussion, as much misrepresentation had gone abroad on the subject. The Directors were most anxious to prevent the melancholy events caused by forgery; and it was altogether unfounded, that any fear of expense had influenced them in their consideration of plans of prevention. He hoped the public judgment would be suspended till the case was fully explained.

The House then went into a Committee of Supply, when various sums were voted for Ireland.—Adjourned till Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, APRIL 19.

THE news from France is of little interest this week; but we have enough in all conscience at home. The most curious arrival from abroad is the speech of the RUSSIAN EMPEROR on opening the Diet of Poland. It is, to speak plainly at once, (for the thing is too degrading to humanity for ridicule) a most disgusting production. He has the extraordinary face to tell the countrymen of Kosciusko, that "Russia, after a melancholy war, returns them, according to the precepts of the Christian Religion, good for evil!" A melancholy war, and good for evil! But what sort of a war was it, we should be glad to know, that preceded that melancholy war, and that is naturally thought by many to have been the first cause of all the wars that have lately shed so much blood? It was the wanton, unjust, tyrannical, impudent, and most unfeeling war, waged by this very Russia against Poland,—and waged by her because Poland would not submit to be quietly partitioned off into three human cattle-folds by those holy and legitimate Allies, Russia, Austria, and Prussia. If the Emperor of RUSSIA (with whom the noble Kosciusko would have nothing to do) talks of liberal institutions in the midst of his cant, it is because the very revolutions, against which he rails at the end of it, have taught him. When we hear from a Poland of Kosciusko's school, that his Majesty's promises of liberal institutions are realized, we shall believe them; but not till then; for Europe has had too much of the promises of these Holy Allies from north to south. Bigoted Tartar Autocrats dispensing liberal institutions are very suspicious apparitions. Among other strange things of which this descendant of CATHERINE and countryman of SUWARROW informs his Polish subjects, whose memories he seems to think flowed out of them with their blood, is this,—that the "honourable rank," (that of a Russian dependancy) which they are in future to hold among the nations of Europe, is "a valuable possession which they have long sought in vain through the severest trials." Yes; and who put them to those trials?—who interfered with them, invaded them, sent savage army after army against them, cut, shot, bruised, and mangled, and trod them under foot, and threw their still unconquerable champion into a dungeon, and all for not submitting to their arbitrary dictation and usurpation? These very Christian Russians who have now the face to talk of those very trials, and to insist that if the Poles have any privileges at all, it shall be of their giving. They prevented Poland from being free, then twit her with her inability, and then pretend to make her so, while they keep her subjugated to an arbitrary monarchy! Oh, your Tartar despot is your only bestower of freedom! Nations must not get free of their own accord; they do not know how, especially when their preventers have driven them mad; but a bigoted arbitrary monarch,—a leaver in the lurch of the fallen enemy, whom he flattered,—a devout believer in the tyrannies of superstition,—a Holy Ally,—a letter out of ships to his brother bigots, for the purpose of going to cut up revolted subjects tired out of their patience,—come to him, come to him, or let him come to you when you are worn out in body and sick at heart, and he will graciously give you a bit of that independence to restore you, which his ancestors deprived you of, and which he finds he can no longer entirely keep.

Some particulars of the hostilities with the PEISHWA, the substance of which has already been given, appeared yesterday in a Supplementary Gazette. They are very curious, and of more importance than most things of this kind; for to hear only one account of matters, as is always the case in East Indian warfare, is seldom telling us any thing in reality, except as far as dates from places are concerned; and indeed it is chiefly from a circumstance of this nature, that we learn from the present dispatches the success of our arms. They have taken Poona, and hoisted the British flag on the PEISHWA's Palace. This is a considerable blow, certainly; but the natives of India, through the medium of French Officers and of the common news, have no doubt become well acquainted with the late warfares in Europe; and among other arts how to resist foreigners who have no right to their country, they appear to have learnt how to consider the occupation of a capital as a secondary matter, and to resolve upon disputing the rest of the territory with the angrier resolution. Even before the occupation of Poona, the enemy seem to have done no common things,—the cavalry getting into the rear of us on one occasion, and on another surrounding us; but after that event, the dispatches, though still talking in a confident tone natural to bravery and to old success, evidently let us into some awkward secrets to the above effect. Their cavalry is of as little use to them, as that of the French was in Spain; the days are past in skirmishing;—it is found “impossible—effectually—to cover the whole of the baggage,”—a very gingerly specimen of distaste in the unhabitual announcement of losses; and the troops, who endure great fatigue, and lament that the enemy will not fight, are obliged to keep their line in the tightest order, for fear, of course, of having pieces picked out of it by an enemy always present. It is said at the commencement of the dispatches, that the PEISHWA “had used the most unremitting endeavours to corrupt the fidelity of our native troops.” If he could throw a good leader among them, he would most probably play sad work even with our very seat of government. “Our native troops” is a good-looking phrase; but when the reader is aware, that these our troops are a set of native Indians, obstinately attached to their own religion and habits, so much so as to regard our very touch in most things as synonymous with pollution, he will know what to think of their taste for fidelity to us. They will not dress a little milk-porridge after us, till they have washed out the pipkin;—all which may be very foolish, and worth altering, though the violence of other nations and the superstition of other creeds are not the best things in the world to alter them; but so it is; and where people attempt to alter with injustice, they deserve to be opposed with prejudice.

A very curious circumstance has occurred in Parliament, on which we shall make longer observations next week than we have room for at present. The Ministers thought in the first instance to give enormous additions to the incomes of the Royal Family, on the ground of their new marriages, real or meditated. They accordingly announced the day for submitting the project to Parliament; but lo, when the day comes, it appears, from certain mute symptoms with which their proposals had been received by the Members privately, that they were afraid to go on with it; and so, in the teeth of what is accounted a great Parliamentary disrespect to their Royal Master, they are obliged to defer the matter to another day, when their lowered calculations are beaten down still further, and the Opposition make them look exceedingly foolish. We doubt, however, whether they will care much for the matter at bottom, and whether they will not even be glad of an apparent opportunity to talk of the independence of Parliament;—as if however one defeat of them, once and away, on a question not affecting the main personal interests of that illustrious body, or their own,—and only about the Royal Family,—not the Boroughmongers, observe,—goes to prove any thing, except that the Boroughmongers can do what they please, either against People or Prince. The thing would be exceedingly well in constitutional times,—but in an oligarchy “notorious as the sun at noon day,” what is it but a subject of curious speculation?

There is one thing indeed, which has occurred during the week, of importance to the state of the question between the Boroughmongers and the People; and this is the agitation in the city about the new plans of raising the oligarchical needful. We do not pretend to enter into the mysteries of the arithmetic, which puzzle, it seems, the professors themselves; but of this we are pretty sure, that the agitation created by the plans is the first gathering voice of something long announced; and that unless the pilots that say they weathered the other storm, take the opportunity offered them in another part of the vessel of quitting their purser's tricks, conciliating the crew a little, and setting about repairing the old stamina of the vessel, it is high time for people to look about them, and see how they can save what they have got already.—This is the first roll in the billows of the great bubble.

New York Papers to the 8th ult. came to hand yesterday. A Message from the PRESIDENT was delivered to the Congress on the 2d, stating, that the British and American Commissioners, under the 4th article of the Treaty of Ghent, had come to a decision upon the questions submitted to them.

We are glad to find that the endeavour to elect Sir ROBERT WILSON for Southwark is going on with spirit; the gallant and independent Soldier will be accompanied, we understand, to the next meeting by Sir F. BURDETT, Mr. BENNET, Mr. LAMETON, and other gentlemen of independence,—true soldiers also in the noblest of warfares.

DREADFUL FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—It was yesterday morning reported in the City that an extensive part of the Bonding Warehouses at Liverpool had been destroyed by fire. It is confirmed, in some measure, but not to the extent reported. The following is an extract of a letter:—"Liverpool, April 16.—There is a dreadful fire now raging in PARRY'S warehouses, which are quite full of bonded goods, particularly coffee and sugar. Very little can be saved.—P.S. Seven o'clock.—It is reported that the quantity of coffee already destroyed is 400 tons."

FINE ARTS.—SPRING-GARDENS EXHIBITION.—The Exhibition of the Society of Painters in Oil and Water Colours will open to the Public to-morrow. The works of merit will be spoken of in future numbers. There is one Picture in it, however, of Fighting Dogs, by a youth, EDWIN LANDSEER, which we must now notice, as one of the best paintings of animals that has been produced since the time of SNYDERS. It is purchased, we learn, by Sir G. BEAUMONT.—The Duke and Duchess of GLOUCESTER and the Princess SOPHIA yesterday paid a visit to this Exhibition, previous to its being opened to the public. The Royal Party paid particular attention to the works; and the Duke, after having informed himself of the nature and views of the Society, expressed to Mr. SMITH, the President, and Mr. UWINS, the Secretary, his high approbation of the Exhibition, and his conviction that the exertions of the Society would contribute greatly to the advancement of the Arts, as well as to the gratification of the public.

The Concert for the benefit of the late Mr. WILLIAM ELLIOTT'S Family, will take place to-morrow at the Freemasons' Tavern. The proposal, we find, has met with great success, especially among the Freemasons themselves; and we scarcely need repeat our recommendations to others who love all the harmonies in this life, mental and otherwise, in order that the success may be complete and more than complete,—"full measure pressed down and running over." The chief trait in the private character of this very pleasing singer was his modesty,—a quality which, like all others connected with a dislike of giving pain or trouble, the generous are always anxious to see justly treated. They leap forward, as it were, to supply what the greatest merit might otherwise lose.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—The hearing of the case for preventing the marriage of Lady EMILY VANE TEMPEST, a ward of Chancery, was yesterday morning postponed till Tuesday next.—The case is on the petition of Mr. MICHAEL ANGELO TAYLOR, one of the Guardians of Lady EMILY, whose estates are of the value of 35,000*l.* a year, and who is only 18 years of age, to prevent a marriage with Lord STEWART, the brother of Lord CASTLEREAGH, a person more than double her own age.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 319.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A NEW farce was produced here on Monday, called, Who's my Father? The title arises from the character of a foolish footman (LISTON), a sort of Malvolio, who takes occasion of his having been a natural child to be always wondering what his birth was, and concluding it was noble. A young Lord (JONES) comes to court his master's daughter in the disguise of a gardener, and the old gentleman (EMERY) having had some notice given him on the subject, raises the footman's absurdities to a high pitch, by taking him for the unknown. The cause of this mistake is a very pleasant scene, in which the old gentleman thinks to discover the man by making all his servants dance to a fiddle; upon which Fitzcloddy, who had lived with a dancing-master, makes a prodigious operatical shew, while the young Lord thumps it away like an arrant clown. There is also another pleasant incident, which reminded us of the trick played upon Sancho Panza by the robber, who stole Dapple from under him while asleep, by propping him up with sticks. It is where the young Lord, in the disguise of an officer, is held down by the suspicious old gentleman, by the top of his military cap, while the latter goes on reading a letter: the gallant contrives to slip from under the cap, leaving it in the other's hand, who after shaking it once or twice, with "Keep still, Sir," turns round at last, and finds the gentleman gone.

There was a mixture of applause and disapprobation at the close of the piece; but it will amuse, we have no doubt, a good deal. It is, upon the whole, a strange sort of thing, by no means destitute of pleasantry, and with the appearance of having been imitated from the French; but some of the things in it are so over-farcical and unnatural, and there is such a crude unreal air in it throughout, that it has something like the mixed effect, half pleasant and half painful, of HOGARTH'S satirical picture of bad perspective. We should conceive it to be the work either of a very new author or of a superannuated one.

ITALIAN OPERA.

The fine substantial Opera of Don Giovanni had a crowded house here on Tuesday last, considering it was Tuesday; for the uninitiated must know, that although Saturday night is proverbially the enjoying hour of none of the most refined classes, and the good Bishop of London insists upon the ballet's being over by twelve to an instant, in order that that odd sort of impious fellow, ye!e!pt Merriment, may not crib into a foot of the Sunday,—yet Saturday is the favourite night here with the fashionable world. There is a greater crowd then than on Tuesday, a more vivacious and triumphant flush in the amenity of the audience; and the singers and dancers disburse richer notes, and more numerous presentations of toe.

Tuesday, however, has its advantages, especially for those who like as much silence and room as possible; and this house, to our minds, is always delightful. The very best part of the upper classes,—those who have the most sympathy with their species,—come there to look at their gracefulness, and to feel at their sociallest; and there is a general sense about you of ease, elegance, and kindness,—a sort of under-toned music of the passions, in harmony with the livelier business of the stage.

AMBROGETTI is as potent as ever in the part of Don Giovanni, if not more so. Tuesday's indulgences never seem to catch him napping; and either appearances were very unaccountable on the stage on this particular night, or a weight of effect was left for him to sustain which would have overwhelmed any other performer. He seemed to act, sing, and even dance for every body; for there was a want of the usual dancers during the ball scene, so as even to call forth the disapprobation of the audience; and while every body else concerned appeared to be either baffled or out of humour, he performed his part in the minuet with an air of double resolution.

After the opera, a new ballet was repeated, which was produced on the previous Saturday. It is called The Fairy Urgela, and proposes to tell us the celebrated story of the knight who was to be saved from death on condition of discovering what pleases the ladies most,—a secret which he is only enabled to find out by the help of an old hag, who makes marriage the condition of payment, and who in consequence of the wedding, has a charm broken that was upon her, and to his infinite relief, turns out to be a young and beautiful fairy. Of all the no-meaning of ballets,—a quality in which they are too apt to abound,—La Fee Urgée presents, we think, the most remarkable specimens. The knight and the hag appear occasionally, but the scenes are chiefly filled up with sets of figurantes, who have no visible connexion with the story, and whose eternal skipping and hopping produced some more marks of disapprobation in what has been well called “the temple of urbanity.” There were some devils and furies, we understand, on Saturday, with their torches of sulphur; but the spectators had had enough of this infernal nonsense, and abolished it at once. The story itself would be unintelligible but for certain charitable talkative pieces of board, which come forward to explain matters. Very long and very necessary explanations they give certainly; but when a ballet comes to this pitch of necessity, the spectators are naturally inclined, in another sense of the words, to turn upon it the memorable sentence of a father of the church, who threw an unintelligible book into the fire—“If you won’t be understood, you ought not to be read.”—We never saw before so much of the science of ballet.

We are happy to publish the following letter from Mr. PENLEY, who does not confine, we see, all his taste in paying compliments to the stage:—

“Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, April 18.

“SIR.—The author of Love and Laudanum having, in the Morning Post of Wednesday last, withdrawn the charge of plagiarism he thought proper to prefer against me, on the first representation of the Sleeping Draught, it would be unnecessary to enter into further discussion on the subject; but at the same time I cannot forbear expressing my sincere acknowledgments, for the portion my humble production was honoured with, of that well-known candour and liberality which ever so eminently characterizes the pages of the Examiner, and remain, Sir, your most obliged humble servant,

“S. PENLEY.”

NEW PLANS OF FINANCE.

Treasury Chambers, April 14.

It is proposed that books shall be opened at the Bank of England this day, for the purpose of receiving the subscriptions of persons desirous of transferring any sum in even thousands, not less than 5,000*l.* 3 per cent. Consolidated or 3 per cent. Reduced Annuities (such annuities to be specified at the time of subscribing,) into a new stock, at the rate of 3½ per cent., the interest on such stock not to be reduced, nor the stock paid off for ten years from the 5th of April, 1818.

Every subscriber, in consideration of his transferring 100*l.* 3 per cent. Consolidated, or three per cent. Reduced Annuities, to the account of the Commissioners for reducing the National Debt, and of his paying at the times hereafter mentioned, into the Bank, the sum of 11*l.* in money, shall be entitled for every 100*l.* stock so transferred, to 100*l.* 3½ per cent. stock, to bear interest either from the 5th of April, or the 10th of October, 1818, as hereafter mentioned.

The subscribers to pay the said sum of 11*l.* in money by instalments at the following periods:—

Upon the day of Subscribing	On or before 16th Oct. 1818	£1
by way of deposit.....	13th November	1
On or before 19th June 1818	4th December	1
24th July.....	15th Jan. 1819	1
7th August.....	5th February	1
4th Sept.....	5th March.....	1

Discount at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum, computed in the usual manner, to be allowed to subscribers on completing the payment of the said sum of 11*l.*

The subscribers to transfer their stock to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt at the following periods, viz:—

15 per cent. from Tuesday the 28th April to Monday the 4th of May, both days inclusive, holidays excepted, and 85 per cent. on or before Tuesday the 2d of June.

Persons subscribing not less than 50,000*l.* stock, to transfer the same to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt at the following periods:—

15 per cent. on Tuesday the 28th, or Wednesday the 29th of April, and 85 per cent. on or before Friday the 27th of November.

Every person having before Tuesday the 2d day of June completed the transfer of the whole of the stock subscribed by him, shall be entitled, as soon as the measure shall have received the sanction of Parliament, to the principal sum of 88*l.* in annuities, bearing interest after the rate of 3*l.* 10s. per cent. per ann. for every 100*l.* so transferred, such interest to commence from the 5th day of April, 1818, and shall, on the completion of his payments of 11*l.* in money on each 100*l.* so subscribed, be entitled to the further principal sum of 12*l.* like annuities, the interest thereon commencing at the same time.

Every person who, after the 2d day of June, and before the 27th day of November, shall have completed the transfer of the whole of the stock subscribed by him, shall be entitled to the principal sum of 88*l.* in annuities, at the rate of 3*l.* 10s. per cent. per annum for every 100*l.* so subscribed, the interest thereon to commence from the 10th day of October, 1818, and shall, on the completion of his payment of 11*l.* in money on each 100*l.* so transferred, be entitled to the further principal sum of 12*l.* like annuities, the interest thereon commencing from the 5th of April, 1818.

Every person subscribing 3 per cent. Consols, shall be entitled to interest for one quarter of a year on such Consols, to be paid on the 5th day of July, in case the whole of such stock shall be transferred on or before the 2d of June; and on the 5th day of January next, in case such transfer shall be made after the 2d of June, and before the 27th of November next.

The Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt to purchase 3½ per cent. stock, in proportion of at least 1 per cent. per annum in the capital created, whenever that stock shall be under par.

The new stock of 3½ per cent. to be transferable at par into Irish 3½ per cents.

The subscription books to continue open between the hours of 10 in the morning and 3 in the afternoon, from this day to Saturday the 18th inst., both inclusive. Lord Liverpool and the Chancellor of the Exchequer reserve to themselves the power of keeping the subscription open till the 24th inst. inclusive, upon notice thereof being sent to the Bank on or before the 17th inst.

Every subscriber to have the option of funding Exchequer Bills to double the amount of money subscribed by him, and to receive for every 100*l.* of Exchequer Bills subscribed, 64*l.* 3 per cent. consolidated, and 64*l.* 3 per cent. reduced annuities, provided such option is declared by the subscriber on the 28th or the 29th of April, or the 2d day of May; and every such subscriber shall, at the time of declaring this option, make a deposit at the Bank, in money or Exchequer Bills, of not less than 5 per cent. on the amount of Exchequer Bills subscribed, and the remainder of such Exchequer Bills shall be brought into the Exchequer Bill Office on or before the 1st of August, 1818, when the interest thereon shall cease and be paid in money; and in case the deposit shall have been made in money, it will be returned by the Paymaster of Exchequer Bills without interest, upon the whole amount of such Exchequer Bills being brought in as aforesaid.

The 3 per cent. consolidated annuities to be created by this subscription to bear interest from the 5th of January, 1818, but the dividends not to be paid until the 5th of January, 1819, and the 3 per cent. reduced annuities to bear interest from the 5th of April, 1818.

In case the sum of ten millions of money or upwards shall be subscribed, no Exchequer Bills, over and above those which may have been funded by the said subscribers, under the option aforesaid, shall be funded before the 1st of March, 1819, at any rate not exceeding 125*l.* capital stock in the 3 per cent. consolidated or reduced annuities for every 100*l.* principal money; and in case of any such funding, the said subscribers shall have the preference of being allowed to subscribe the same for ten days, to be reckoned from the date of any notice thereof to be sent to the Bank, specifying the terms on which such Exchequer Bills may be funded.

The following additional communication was on Friday made by Mr. Hase to the Stock Exchange:—

"Treasury Chambers, April 17.

"Lord Liverpool and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in pursuance of the condition mentioned in the notice dated April 14, have determined that the books for receiving subscriptions into a new stock, at the rate of 3½ per cent., should continue open until the 24th instant, inclusive, unless a sum of 3,000,000*l.* of money, at the rate of 1*l.* for every 100*l.* stock, in the terms of the former notice, shall be subscribed before that day; and when the subscription to that amount shall be completed, the books will be finally closed, and every person who has already subscribed, or may hereafter subscribe, will be at liberty to fund Exchequer Bills, on the terms already proposed, to an extent not exceeding the amount of the capital stock in the 3 per cent. Consols, or Reduced Annuities, subscribed by him. Subscriptions of not less than 2,000*l.* capital stock will be received. Every person funding Exchequer Bills, after having made a deposit of 5 per cent. at the Bank, either in Exchequer Bills or money, at the time of declaring his option to fund, will be allowed to deliver them at the following periods, instead of the periods mentioned for their delivery according to the former notice, viz.—

"On or before the 1st of August, 1818.	20 per cent.
31 of September	20 per cent.
1st of October	20 per cent.
31st of October	20 per cent.
26th of November	the remainder.

"All Exchequer Bills, dated on or before the 1st of August next, will be received at the Exchequer Bill Office, on account of the bills funded, provided they have not been advertised to be paid off at the respective days of payment; but the interest of such Exchequer Bills will cease from the 1st of August, notwithstanding they may not be brought into the Exchequer Bill Office till after that date.

"Money will be received instead of Exchequer Bills, on any of the above days, upon a payment at the rate of 1 per cent. in addition to the amount of the instalment, and also upon payment of an interest at the rate of 2*d.* per cent. per diem, from the 1st of August to the day of payment.

"About 14,000,000*l.* of the money, and Exchequer Bills, to be raised by this subscription, will be wanted for the service of the year; and the remainder of the money and Exchequer Bills subscribed will operate as a reduction of the unfunded debt."

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, April 11.

THE KING v. ALEXANDER MILNE AND OTHERS.

This was an indictment against the defendants, who were appointed to carry into effect the provisions of the Act for making a new street, charging them with a conspiracy to injure Mr. Pitt, the surveyor, of the Adelphi. The case was tried last term, and the defendants were acquitted.

Mr. Pitt appeared in Court this day, to move that this verdict of acquittal should be set aside. He put in a Petition and an affidavit. The Petition stated, that a conspiracy had been clearly proved against the defendants last term by five witnesses, but that evidence had been given by a clerk or servant employed by some of the defendants, relative to a transaction that had taken place in 1816 between the Petitioner and some of the defendants concerning a house in the Haymarket, not included in the New Street Act, which the Petitioner believed was misunderstood both by the Jury and the Judge; and he further submitted that any act of his in 1816 could not affect the guilt or innocence of the defendants, for acts committed in 1815; and that the Lord Chief Justice, in the case of Lord Cochrane, had laid it down that the improper acts of one person could not be set off against those of another.—The Petitioner therefore prayed that the verdict of acquittal should be set aside.—The substance of the affidavit was, that the deponent had been employed by many persons, for two years, as Surveyor and Agent to procure them compensation under the New-Street Act,—that finding an empty house in the Haymarket, which the owner wished to dispose of to the Commissioners, and thinking it would suit some of his employers, he made an agreement to purchase it, but learning afterwards that a new market was to be built, which would require the back of the premises, and being told by the defendant, Thompson, that it would be cheap at 2000 guineas, he offered it to the Commissioners at that price, which they declined,—that however, after some correspondence, he received from the defendants a Contract of Reference, which was immediately filled up, but which had not been proceeded with, and that this, as well as other business of the defendant, had fallen off, without his being able to ascertain any fresh ground of complaint against him.

When Mr. Pitt opened his business, Lord ELLENBOROUGH said he recollected the case, and thought that the defendants had acted too leniently by Mr. Pitt, considering his misconduct. After the above statements had been made, his Lordship merely added, in reply to Mr. Pitt's application, "It can't be done."

Tuesday, April 14.

Mr. RIGBY moved for a Habeas Corpus to bring up the body of Mrs. Jane Maria Pearse, under circumstances, as the Learned Counsel stated, bordering upon romance. The application was made on the affidavit of Mr. Edmund Pearse against Capt. Thomas Pearse, both sons of Mrs. J. M. Pearse: it stated, that for five years previous to 1815 Mrs. J. M. Pearse had resided with the deponent, who was her favourite son, but that on Saturday, April 15, 1815, while the deponent was absent from home, Capt. Thomas Pearse came to his house and forced his mother away. On the following day he returned, and carried with him property belonging to his mother and to the deponent. When the deponent returned home, he applied to a magistrate at Union-hall, and accompanied by two officers, went to the house of Capt. T. Pearse to demand the restoration of his property, and to insist upon seeing his mother. Neither of these points were accomplished, but Capt. T. Pearse promised to attend with his mother at Union-hall in the evening. The deponent went there accordingly, but found neither Capt. T. Pearse nor his mother there: after some negotiation, a meeting was appointed at a house in Bloomsbury, from whence it was agreed that the parties should adjourn to Queen-square Police-Office, that all matters in difference might be arranged by Mr. Fielding. When the deponent, Mr. E. Pearse, reached the place of appointment, instead of finding his mother and brother there, he was seized by two strange men, who forced him into a carriage, and drove him away to a private mad-house, whence he made his escape in December last. In the mean time, Capt. T. Pearse went to the War-Office, and, under an alleged warrant of lunacy, received pay belonging to the deponent. The affidavit went on to state, that the deponent had been examined by the Medical Board, and had obtained the certificate of Dr. Gordon that he was perfectly sane. This affidavit was supported by another made by Mr. Pattison, an attorney; this gentleman had applied on the part of Mr. Edmund Pearse to Capt. T. Pearse for the restoration of the property of the former, and for an interview with his mother, Mrs. J. M. Pearse; to the first demand the answer was a reference to a schedule made by Capt. T. Pearse when he was discharged under the Insolvent Act; to the second demand, Capt. T. Pearse replied, that there was no law which could compel him to let any person see his mother, and he never would allow Mr. Edmund Pearse to see her.—The Court granted the writ.

ASHFORD v. THORNTON.—AN APPEAL OF MURDER.

Mr. CHITTY, for the appellant, entered into a long legal argument, endeavouring to shew, from old authorities, that the appellant was excepted from the obligation of fighting with the appellee. He contended that where there was, as in this case, violent presumption of guilt, the Court should leave the whole case to the decision of a Jury.

In the course of the argument, Mr. Justice BATLEY observed, that there appeared to be nothing to show that the pressure of the figure upon the grass, the stains of blood, and the footsteps near the pits, had occurred after three in the morning. There were modes by which Mary Ashford might have come to her death consistent with the innocence of the appellee; she might, perhaps, have destroyed herself in remorse for her imprudence, and in dread of its consequences; or she might have fallen into the pit from weakness, having gone to the brink for the purpose of washing herself.

Mr. CHITTY answered, that the presumption was violent, that the same person who had had an illicit connexion with her had murdered her, and the appellee confessed that he had had that illicit connexion. It was not likely that remorse had induced her to destroy herself, either under the supposition of consent or resistance to the appellee; because in the one case, despair did not arrive so soon, not until the consequences of her imprudence were apparent; and in the other, thirst of revenge, and a sense of injury, would have induced her to prolong her existence.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, that the usual mode of proceeding in these cases was by battle, unless it can be shown that the case falls within some of the old exceptions, in which all probability of innocence is precluded, such as finding the bloody knife in the hand, &c. Such did not exist in the present case, and liable as the trial by battle may be to objections of various kinds, it must be resorted to, unless it may be considered that the appellant has declined this mode, and that on this account the appellee is entitled to go altogether without a day; which is a point upon which I do not at present pronounce any judgment. In this stage of the proceeding, however, it appears to me ripe for the decision, that this is a case in which the trial by battle ought to take place.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY was entirely of the same opinion.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT also thought the counterplea insufficient to oust the appellee of his trial by battle.

Mr. Justice HOLROYD (before whom Thornton was tried) concurred in what had fallen from the Bench. Mary Ashford, in the course of the night, went to Mary Butter's alone, and returned alone, and there was no allegation in the counterplea that she and the appellee ever met again, or to show that she could not have fallen into the pit either from dizziness or weakness, she having gone through much fatigue, and having lost a great deal of blood. If the illicit intercourse had taken place before Mary Ashford went to Mrs. Butter's (and there was nothing to show the contrary), there could afterwards have been no motive on the part of the appellee to destroy her, though she might be impelled to put an end to her own existence. Various witnesses proved the alibi, and upon the whole, the facts stated did not amount to anything like a strong presumption of guilt.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH added, that whatever prejudice might exist, whether justly or unjustly, against this ancient and indisputable law, it was the duty of the Court, in administering the law, to award that the battle should be waged, unless upon further deliberation it found reason for thinking that the appellee should be allowed to go without a day.

Mr. GERNET requested time for his client, the appellant, to consider whether he should pray for the further judgment of the Court. The matter was consequently postponed until Monday.

POLICE.

QUEEN-SQUARE.

SHOOTING AT LORD PALMERSTON.

Lieutenant David Davies was on Wednesday brought up for further examination.

Lord Palmerston deposed, that on the 8th instant, at a little past one in the afternoon, he entered the door leading from the arch-way at the Horse Guards up to the War-office, and proceeded to ascend the staircase. He had not ascended many steps when a pistol was discharged at him by some person who stood behind him. He felt himself wounded in the back, but continued to mount the staircase. He entered his room, and desired a surgeon might be sent for. A short time after, Mr. Astley Cooper and Mr. Leigh arrived.

Mr. MARLAND desired to know if his Lordship, in going up the staircase, observed any person near him.

Lord Palmerston answered he did not; only from the flash of the pistol he saw the figure of some person, but nothing distinctly.

Mr. Astley Cooper stated, that about a quarter past one o'clock, he was requested to go to the War-office, on account of Lord Palmerston's being shot. When he entered the room, he found his Lordship writing a letter. Lord P. requested witness to take a chair, till he had finished. His Lordship finished, directed, and sealed the letter, and then said to witness, "Now, Sir, you shall examine."—Witness found a large hole in the coat, one rather smaller in the waistcoat, both of which were much torn, which appeared to be occasioned by powder and wadding. The braces were shot through, apparently by a ball, and the shirt was torn the same as the coat and waistcoat. On the loin a little to the left side of the spine, there was a contusion nearly the size of a half-crown; and in the centre of this contusion there was a darker spot, such as a ball would occasion by striking the part, the whole of which he believed to be the effect of a ball. This had so much the appearance of a wound, that it was impossible at the moment to ascertain whether the ball had entered the body or not; but after an examination of about half a minute, he was able to assure his Lordship, that though the contusion was severe, he considered his Lordship would do well.—To some questions, Mr. Cooper said, his opinion was, that the larger contusion was occasioned chiefly by the wadding and powder, and the smaller by the ball; but he firmly believed the ball to be the primary cause of the whole wound.

The Court then ordered the prisoner's trunk to be produced, which was brought in by Gilmour, who deposed, that on the evening of Wednesday he and Dew went to prisoner's lodgings at Chelsea, where they found the trunk produced, which was locked. On being opened there were found in it a pistol, supposed the fellow to that he fired at Lord Palmerston, some powder, six balls, with sundry papers and letters. Witness said further, that Mr. Thompson, a pawnbroker, at Chelsea, informed him, prisoner had redeemed a pair of pistols from his shop that same morning, between 11 and 12 o'clock, which he had pledged some time ago.

Prisoner was fully committed for trial.—He behaved during the whole time with the greatest propriety. The eleven 12 Bank-notes, and other articles found on him when taken into custody, were all restored.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Tuesday evening, about half-past seven o'clock, an alarming fire broke out at the house of Mr. Higgs, a hat manufacturer in Webber-row, Great Surrey-street, Blackfriars-road. It appears that Mr. Higgs and journeymen had all quitted the house, leaving his wife up-stairs undressing the children. She soon smelt fire, and with her infant went below to ascertain the cause; when on opening a door the flames burst with dreadful violence on her; she dropt the infant and flew up stairs to save the other two, but the flames and smoke followed her with such rapidity as to render the attempt impossible. She was lost in fire and smoke, and on her regaining the passage she could not find her infant, and with the greatest difficulty reached the street, where, in an almost frantic state, she told the sad tale. A young man instantly rushed in, for whose safety great apprehension was for some moments entertained, but he returned with the infant, who, with himself, was dreadfully burnt; the former is not likely to recover, and the young man has been sent to a hospital. After he had saved the life of one fellow-creature, he learnt that two other children were still in the house; and, had he not been restrained by the lookers-on, he would have attempted to save their lives: but by this time no doubt existed of their having been burnt to death, so rapid were the flames. The bodies of the two children, the one six, the other four years of age, were dug out of the ruins. The man who saved the child is a soldier.

Tuesday morning, about half-past five o'clock, a fire broke out at Mr. Clarke's, oil and colourman, in Skinner-street, Somers-town, and it for a short time raged furiously, threatening destruction to the houses adjoining; but by the arrival of the engines, the devouring element was confined to Mr. Clarke's and the upper part of the adjoining house. A few minutes after six o'clock the premises fell into the street with a tremendous crash, blocking up the corner of Hertford-street. Mr. Clarke's family escaped through the back part of the premises, leaving the whole of their property to the destruction of the flames.

REFUSAL OF LARGE GRANTS TO THE PRINCES.

THE real secret of this business has not yet been given to the public as far as we are aware, except in the paragraph in our last week's paper. We say so with the less scruple, inasmuch as it requires no profundity to find it out, though it does require a little sincerity, out of the pale of ordinary party, to mention it. Thousands indeed, who are not writers, know it too well already. It is simply this,—that an Oligarchy of Boroughmongers rules this country; and that according as their immediate views require, they care neither for accommodating Prince nor People. They will sometimes gratify the former at the expence of the latter, sometimes the latter at the expence of the former, sometimes neither, but always themselves. The Constitution is bought and sold in traffics "notorious as the sun at noon-day." The Princes (as we shall shew further presently) are alternately worshipped and treated with contempt, according as the people are to be kept under with the tool Legitimacy, or the Ministers, the real servants of the Oligarchy, are to be made to know their real masters. The people are plundered nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, for the benefit of the Boroughmongers, and then are to be enjoined the thousandth by a shew of sparing their pockets, when the Princes are the only ones that suffer. The farce is consummated by referring to this thousandth, we should rather say millionth defeat of the Ministers, as a proof, in the teeth of the old logical one, of the independence of Parliament! a proof of that, which is daily disproved in every other instance! The fact is, that the Parliament are independent of Ministers; and so are the tradesmen that serve a family independent of the servants, when the master of the house chuses to controul them,—but in no other instance. The establishment is patriarchal, only with the little drawback of a total want of all pastoral beauty. The Parliament as well as the Ministers are the under and upper servants of the Oligarchy; the people are their flocks and herds, pent up in pinfolds; and the Princes are the idols, which they occasionally lug forth to overawe with, and thrust among their lumber when not wanted.

This is the sum and substance of all that has just occurred in Parliament relative to the rejected calculations of the Princes and Ministers.

It was rumoured that the PRINCE REGENT had been greatly disgusted on this occasion, and threatened we know not what of anti-ministerial and solitary proceedings. We know not how his Royal Highness's indignation might have acted; but it were greatly to be wished, that circumstances of this nature could open his eyes. We do not mean to say that what the Princes, or the Ministers for them, demanded in this particular instance, was reasonable; but the people know too well that it is not the unreasonableness of a demand upon their pockets which gets them spared in general; and it would have been well for royalty's share in the Constitution, had it been induced to think of this a little, instead of letting its supposed servants at home and its despotic brethren abroad go on turning the eyes of nations to North America.

That the Ministers will continue to regret this awkward business, we do not believe, except inasmuch as they betrayed their own dependence upon the Boroughmongers a little too openly: but that they should feel sore at the moment is natural both to their real and ostensible importance; and it is curious to see how their more immediate servants, the hireling journals, venture to be a little splenetic with the parliamentary majorities, who are such objects of their praise in general, and to shake their heads at the ungracious treatment of Princes whom we have known them to treat with the utmost contempt.

The Courier pretends just now to great sympathy with the Princes. He thinks it "peculiarly ungenerous" that when they come to Parliament for money, the necessity of their demands should be publicly scrutinized; and he is further of opinion, that while the Royal Marriage Act with a melancholy necessity hinders them from becoming the husbands of ladies who are not royal, it is "squeamish hypocrisy" to lament the absence of "feelings favourable to domestic felicity." Now the first and more tearful of these amiable resentments is in answer to a charge against the Princes, not of having asked for money, but of having asked for enormous additions to their money; and the second and more indignant one is in special defence of the Duke of CLARENCE, who is thought by many to have gone about for a wife with a mixture of eagerness for the rich ones and indifference for the royal ones, somewhat beyond the contemplations of the state, and to have raised awkward associations in the mind between the Royal Marriage Act and the Hawker and Pedlar Act. With these too, unfortunately for the state necessities of his Royal Highness, comes in upon us the memory of an amiable woman, lately deceased in France, who was long the charm of the nation, and who was also his Royal Highness's wife in still better senses than any in which forms could make her. And finally, as if circumstances conspired to give his proceedings as heartless a character as possible, and turn his very defenders into accusers, his chief advocate is MR. CANNING!—MR. CANNING, the Ogden man!—who with his usual callosa felicitas went on, from sentence to sentence, exposing his royal friend, and making out that a royal marriage was nothing in the world but that very thing which other newspapers have been abused by the Courier for regretting. It must be said for the Honourable House, that they seem to have laughed as much at him in this instance, as they did with him in a former deplorable one.

We dislike hypocrisy as much as the Courier, and a little more; for we do not treat the Royal Family at one time with homage and at another call them "Great Babies fit only to fill up ball-rooms;"* neither do we cry out with indignant zeal for the letter of religious institutions at one time, as the Courier did in the case of the Parodies, nor set it aside in favour of reasons of state, as he does now. A pretty mockery, according to him, must the marriage ceremony be among princes,—the going before heaven, the invocation, the promise and vowing, the praying, &c. &c.!—a pretty subjection of heaven to earth! And yet if, for this among a quantity of other reasons, you find fault with the religious part of marriage, and with those forms and bindings which so generally defeat their own object, or at least turn affection into a matter of formal right and exaction, or produce so much misery and bad conscience,—you are a Jacobin, an irreligious fellow, very likely a great practical rascal, and fairly want to inundate this "vale of tears" instead of doing away the appellation. We make no hypocritical demands upon princes, any more than we make impudent demands upon the people. We only want them to behave with decent kindness to the wives, whom the calculations of state, and sometimes other calculations, may have already given them; and to remind them, that whatever may be said or sung,—that is, canted,—of their unfortunate situation in these matters, there is, in fact, scarcely any one of them who may not have a wife of his own choosing, at least within the pale of royalty; and the branches are pretty numerous. The Duke of CAMBRIDGE, for instance, is understood to have married a companion of his own choice; so is the Duke of CUMBERLAND; and the lamented Princess CHARLOTTE, much to her honour and happiness, contrived to do as much. Now the Duke of CLARENCE is not a fixture, if the Heir Apparent is. What hindered him from going abroad like his brothers, and paying those unhappy women called Princesses the compliment of at least knowing their suitor? Instead of this, he sends a parcel of messages to beg that one of them would be so good as to come and marry an elderly gentleman not in the greatest request!

As to the succession to the throne, the Protestant cause, which the present family were brought in to support, is not at all likely to be injured, supposing even the immediate issue should fail; and in very gratitude to our ancestors, who thought the interest of such issue secondary matters to the public welfare, we must be frank enough to say, that we really cannot see the inexorable necessity of raising children to the succession from the elderly sons of his present unfortunate Majesty. We make but one observation on this subject, for obvious reasons; but for reasons that must be obvious also, we have not suppressed it.

A word or two as to the personal property of their Majesties, and to the Duchess of CUMBERLAND. People wonder exceedingly, and they well may, at what can be done with all the wealth that has been accumulating in the venerable royal purse, if no use has been made of it to prevent the necessity of these inordinate applications to Parliament. It is her MAJESTY, of course, that must now be responsible to public opinion on this subject;—a subject, observe, which whatever delicacy may be observed towards it, has been suggested to the mind of the community by the indelicacy of others;—and there is a line in things, at which indelicacy can no longer be suffered to turn delicacy to account. It has been urged, with a feeling which we would rather not characterize, that all splendour ought not to be taken away from the King in his present unhappy condition. As if any body wished such a thing, or as if this had any thing to do with the destination, whatever it may be, of the accumulated riches in question! Let the King, in decency's name, have about him such splendour as befits the occupier of a royal residence; let him have it, if for no other reason than to shew that others think of him;—and would to heaven, in the same name of decency, others shewed that they thought of him a little more! But what has this to do with the QUEEN's hundreds and hundreds of thousands?

There is mystery also in the treatment of the Duchess of CUMBERLAND; and one mystery, under all the circumstances, gives the public a right to enquire into the virtues of the other. Why is her Royal Highness not received at Court? We do not know whether she has any ambition to go there; if so, tastes only differ; but we have no reason to believe she has, except perhaps an obvious one to a lady so connected. Indeed, we are entirely ignorant of every thing respecting her Royal Highness,—not in the sense of some of our brother journalists, who are ignorant only where they pretend to be otherwise,—but really and truly unacquainted with any thing about her. We have heard but one rumour against her, and that is, that before her marriage she was supposed to be inclined to gallantry, perhaps had the reputation of it. This is very likely false; but if not, is it for this that her Royal Highness is excluded the Court of her MAJESTY and her Son! This, for which so many others are not excluded! The public will be slow to believe it, especially when so many quarrels have occurred even in royal families from causes of so many kinds. But if it does, thus much we must say;—that in our opinion, and in those of many other persons, there are vices that are infinitely more injurious to humanity than this, and that ought infinitely more to exclude people from respect and society. The spirit of money-getting and sordidness, for instance, is one of them. A good deal of the unhappiness arising from the former is artificial, and the fault of society's own mistakes; but the vice of avarice is in its essence base, unsocial, and exclusive; it arises from an admiration of nothing beautiful; it belongs to no glad or gladdening impulses; it is never even connected with a generous error; it gets all, denies all, and disgusts all.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, APRIL 20.—We lately announced, on the authority of the Swiss journals, that the Prince Jablonowsky (charged to claim the mortal remains of Kosciuszko) had failed in his mission. The Gazette of Lausanne, on the contrary, states, that the body of the Polish General has been conveyed from Solvère to Poland, accompanied by the Prince Jablonowsky and M. Zeltner of Solvère, the intimate friend of the deceased. The Emperor of Russia has designated the town of Cracow as the depository of his remains, and it was this Monarch himself who caused a proposition to be made to the Government of Poland, that a monument should be erected to his memory.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

POISONING.—On Tuesday, William Knightson alias Bayley, was committed to York Castle, charged with administering a certain deadly poison, with intent to murder Joseph Dodsworth, his brother-in-law; Ann Dodsworth, his wife; Thomas Dodsworth, his father-in-law; and John Hawe, a boy of about ten years of age; all of Arkendale.—Arkendale is a village about four miles from Knaresbro'. Mr. Thomas Dodsworth and his son Joseph Dodsworth are wheelwrights, and previous to Christmas, these two persons, with the prisoner and his wife, who was the daughter of the elder Dodsworth, lived in the same house; Mr. Joseph Dodsworth inherited, as the heir of his mother, certain copyhold property, and had also the reversionary interest in the freehold property then in the possession of his father. Mr. Joseph Dodsworth being at this time forty, and unmarried, the prisoner had some expectancy that the property of the family might ultimately come to his wife, the sister of Joseph Dodsworth. A few days, however, after Christmas last, Mr. J. Dodsworth married, and his prospect of succeeding to the property was destroyed, and to add to this disappointment, the prisoner and his wife were obliged, in consequence of this marriage, to quit the house of his father-in-law; these events are supposed to have laid the foundation for that deadly rancour, which led to that series of crimes we shall now proceed to detail.—On the 25th of March, the prisoner and Joseph Dodsworth, went to Boroughbridge; in returning they called at a public-house at Minskipp, where the prisoner treated Dodsworth with some beer, and a short time after they had left it, the prisoner took from his pocket a penny-roll, broke a small piece from it, and gave the remainder to his brother-in-law, who remarked "that there was a whitish dust upon the broken end;" prisoner said, "Oh, it is nothing but the flour;" and without making any further observation, Dodsworth eat the roll. He had not however proceeded far before he became most violently sick, and it was not without much difficulty that he reached Arkendale. He was visited soon after by the prisoner, who expressed much concern, and proposed to fetch some mint-water to allay his sickness; this offer was accepted, and he returned shortly after with a small quantity in a tea-cup; the wife of Dodsworth observed, that it was very muddy; he replied, Mrs. Webster said that she was sorry she had no better, but it was all she had; but, said he, "put some sugar in it and give it to him, and it will do him good."—Mrs. Dodsworth accordingly gave the mint-water to her husband, but instead of allaying, it greatly increased the sickness. It was now thought necessary to send for assistance, and some medicine was sent for which somewhat relieved him. On the following morning he was visited by Mr. Sedgwick, a surgeon and apothecary at Boroughbridge, who found Mr. Dodsworth extremely ill; he said it was necessary that some person should return with him to bring the medicine which he should prepare. The prisoner offered his service, and the medicine (a saline mixture) was given to the prisoner, who delivered it to his father-in-law, with this message, "that Mr. Sedgwick had given strict orders that the bottle was to be well shaken every time the medicine was administered, and that two table-spoons full was to be given every four hours; a powder was also to be given along with it."—Mrs. Dodsworth scrupulously complied with these directions, but she had no sooner given the medicine to her husband than his sickness, pain, and vomiting, greatly increased. The same effect was produced when the second dose was administered, and he was then so alarmingly ill that it was thought necessary to send for Mr. Sedgwick, who unfortunately was engaged; he expressed much surprise to the messenger at the effect which the medicine was stated to have produced, and desired that the powder might be omitted. But though the medicine was administered the third time without the powder, it still continued to aggravate every unfavourable symptom. Mr. Dodsworth was afterwards visited by Mr. Sedgwick, and medicines exhibited which somewhat relieved the unhappy victim, but he continued in a dangerous state the whole week. We now come to a most important part of the case, and to the consummation of the wickedness of the prisoner. On Wednesday evening, the first of April, Mrs. Dodsworth had set upon the fire a pan containing some veal, for broth for her husband: about seven o'clock the prisoner came in, and inquired what was preparing, and he was told that it was broth for his brother-in-law. The prisoner was observed by a boy, John Hawe, nephew to Mrs. Dodsworth, to hold his hand over the pot, occasionally opening and shutting his hand. The prisoner soon after went out; when Mrs. Dodsworth looked at the broth, she found an unusually thick skinning upon it, which she took off; she then tasted the broth, which she found to have a peculiarly bad taste. She asked her father-in-law to taste, and also the little boy, and though the whole quantity taken by them did not exceed what might be contained in three table-spoons, they were all seized almost instantly with very severe vomitings, and every other symptom which attends the administration of arsenic. It is hardly necessary to add, that no part of this poisoned mess was given to the sick man. The taste of the broth was very acrid, and it almost immediately inflamed the tongue and throat of the persons who had tasted it; a very small quantity was given to a cat the next morning, which was immediately seized with violent agonies, and expired in a very short time. A portion of this broth has since been analyzed, and found to contain a large quantity of arsenic. The bottle, containing the dregs of the medicine, brought from Boroughbridge by the prisoner, was also ascertained to contain arsenic. As soon as the prisoner was apprized of the investigation that was going on he absconded; and though a reward for his apprehension was immediately offered by advertisement, he was not apprehended before last Sunday afternoon: he was taken at Guiseley, near Otley.—It is clearly established, that the prisoner purchased, about the 21st of March, a quarter of a pound of arsenic, at the shop of Mr. Lambert, druggist, at Knaresbro', for the alleged purpose of killing rats. This purchase was made a few days before the first portion of arsenic was supposed to have been administered in the roll of bread. The medicine, which was also proved to have contained arsenic, was prepared by Mr. Sedgwick himself; and he states that the medicine, when delivered by him to the prisoner, did not contain a single particle of this deleterious drug. The mint-water delivered to the prisoner was perfectly clear, nor did Mrs. Webster make any apology to him on account of its being all she had; the fact being, that she had a considerable quantity, and the quantity given to him was much greater than he had produced. The prisoner, since his apprehension, and previous to his committal, affected to display a good deal of indifference. As he was passing through the streets of Knaresbro', he exclaimed, "I am not hanged yet!"—The whole of Mr. Dodsworth's family, with the exception of his son, have nearly recovered, and there is every reason to believe that his life will be saved, though a very considerable time must elapse before he is perfectly recovered from the effects of the powerful poison with which his constitution has had to combat.—The prisoner was examined on Tuesday before Mr. Wilson. The examination occupied from nine in the morning until seven in the evening; the result of which was, that the prisoner was fully committed. The Magistrate thought it proper to order the prisoner to be conveyed to the Castle at York the same evening.—Leeds Mercury, April 18.

EXECUTIONS FOR FORGERY.—On Friday week, amidst an immense assemblage of spectators, Ann Bamford, aged 60; Ann Dickons, aged 40; William Stewart, aged 42; and William Gray, aged 22, were executed on the New Drop, at the front of Warwick gaol. They were convicted, with six others, before Mr. Baron Garrow, at the last Assizes, for dealing in and uttering forged Bank Notes. Considerable interest had been made, to save the life of Gray, the crime for which he was convicted being his first offence: he was a mere youth, and had been entrapped into the commission of the crime; he had been married little more than 12 months, and his wife is near the period of her accouchement. The untimely death of her husband has reduced her to such a state that she is not expected to survive—grief has broken her heart! The following Petition was presented by the unhappy woman a few days since to the Prince Regent:—

"May it please your Royal Highness—Despairing of all other human help, a distracted wife prostrates herself at the feet of your Royal Highness, and most humbly, but pathetically, petitions for the life of her husband, who now lies in Warwick gaol, under the awful sentence of death for forgery. The unfortunate woman who presumes to apply at the fountain of mercy and goodness, though now overwhelmed by present and prospective calamity, is the daughter of the late Colonel J. Rann, a man distinguished for his loyalty and patriotism, who, for the defence of his King and Country, raised a regiment called the Birmingham Loyal Fencibles. Oh! gracious Prince! save his family from the infamy of an ignominious death. Oh! save his daughter's life, and that of her unborn and innocent child, which hang upon the life of her husband. Great Prince, look with an eye of compassion upon us, and permit me to state such reasons as will justify your Royal Highness in the dispensation of mercy to my poor husband. Think, Royal Sir, upon his youth and inexperience—only 22 years of age. Reflect, great Sir, that this is the first offence; that by the accompanying testimony of his last employer, J. W. Wright, of Birmingham, while in his employ, "he conducted himself in a remarkable sober, industrious, and honest manner." Permit me to state to your Royal Highness, that when brought up for trial he repeatedly pleaded guilty, and was with difficulty and reluctance persuaded to retract his plea; that others, equally guilty, who persisted in their plea, are recommended to mercy, while my husband, through his ignorance and agitation in the hour of trial, is left on the awful list of those who are to die. Oh! gracious Prince! suffer not my poor husband's ignorance and inexperience to prove fatal to him. Oh! grant him his life, and banish us to any part of the world, where we may hide our heads from the shame of general contempt. Oh! spare his life, gracious Prince! Oh, suffer me not to be driven from this last hope! So may the petitions of your Royal Highness, in that hour which equally awaits the Prince and the peasant, meet with a blessed answer from the King of Kings. Were my husband a man of cruelty and depravity, I would not dare to pollute the sanctuary of your Royal mind by exciting its sympathies for him; but when I reflect on his love and tenderness, and generosity to myself; when I further recollect, that it was his misguided love for me, and his anxiety to supply me with those comforts to which, in better days, I had been accustomed, which precipitated him into the crime for which he is doomed to die, I cannot help indulging the hope that your Royal Highness will stretch forth your benevolent hand and snatch my poor husband from the jaws of death. And your Petitioner will, as in duty bound, for ever pray, &c.

"FANNY GRAY."
Ann Bamford had been more than fifteen years a dealer in forged notes: four of her relations were convicted with her, viz. her son, his wife, a nephew, and a niece: they pleaded guilty, and were transported for 14 years: her husband, with two other relations, were transported a few Sessions ago.

The Birmingham Chronicle of Thursday, says, "Ann Bamford, William Gray, and William Stewart, have been reprieved until Friday next, on which day it is expected they will suffer the awful sentence of the law. Joseph Latchford and Rebecca Hodges are understood to have been reprieved until the Royal pleasure is known respecting them."—[The above account of the execution, copied into our journal from another paper, must therefore be erroneous.]

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 20.

STATE OF THE CURRENCY.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE made a variety of observations on the state of the metallic and paper currency of the country, and the prospect there was of a return to cash payments by the Bank. In the course of them, he denied that foreign loans could have had any effect on the question, and maintained that the regulations of the Mint must prevent a return to cash payments. He said the real reason of the continued restriction was, the advances made to Government by the Bank, and its increased circulation of Notes, of which there had been recently two millions added. The average issues of the Bank amounted to twenty-nine millions, which proved that no progress had been made towards diminution. The purchases made by the Bank of Government securities, the Noble Earl said, were illegal by the Act of William III. He believed, on his conscience, that cash payments were at a greater distance than ever: the whole business was a complete juggle between the Bank and the Government, and the country was completely their dupe.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—In fact, the Bank had the complete regulation of the price of commodities.—The scheme respecting the country notes was, in his judgment, a bad one, the effect of which would be to sacrifice the country bankers to the favoured Bank of England. When observed his Lordship, he recalled to the memory of the House our paper of four species, our gold coin, our silver coin, with a seigniorage of one value in England and of another value in Ireland, it was in vain to say that paper would maintain a uniform value. Had the Noble Lord considered the value of the sovereign? it passed for 10s less than it was really worth. Sir Isaac Newton had said that if guineas would fetch 4s only more than the sum they passed for, it must very soon drive them all out of circulation; and their Lordships had all heard of the silver currency being melted down long ago, for a very small profit.—The Noble Earl concluded by moving that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into the metallic and paper currency of the United Kingdom, and into the propriety of the resumption of cash payments by the Bank of England.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL said he was most anxious for a return to cash payments, and had come with regret to the opinion, that it would be injurious to the interests of the nation to remove the restriction immediately. He admitted the fact, that our gold was exported, but it was not owing to the cause assigned by the Noble Earl. Gold coin was melted down for exportation, not because it was of most value, but because no price was put on gold as coin above its bullion price.—As to the plan respecting the country banks, he contended that if we could not recur to entirely metallic currency, and if it was necessary to allow country banks to supply its place, to a certain extent, by issues of small notes, these banks ought to be placed under some regulation for the general security of credit, and with the view of preventing those convulsions that might result from their failure. There would be difficulties in carrying the measure into execution; but he did not think them insurmountable. It was pretty well known what was the proportion of small notes issued by the Bank of England, and the time they continued in circulation without being renewed. The average might be reckoned about 8,000,000, and the time the notes lasted about two or three years. He considered the condition of France as the great cause of the unfavourable state of the exchanges. In 1816, and during part of 1817, the exchanges were in favour; but when those great transactions began to take place which were necessary for the adjustment of the claims of the different countries of Europe, then, and not till then, the exchanges began to be unfavourable. An inquiry would lead to no other result than to bring forward the mere speculations of two or three individuals.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN made various remarks, giving it as his opinion that the plan respecting the country banks could occasion no other advantage than an artificial rise in the funds—a rise, which was no more a proof of wealth, than a forced colour was an indication of health. If it should be decided, that the Bank Restriction ought to be continued, he should think it his duty to call the attention of their Lordships to the effect of the continuance of the paper circulation on the morals of the people. He was perfectly convinced that something might be done: and their Lordships must feel how desirable it was to relieve the community from the dreadful operation of that criminal code from which Judges and Juries now shrink with equal pain.—(Hear, hear!)

Lord SIDMOUTH gave his hearty concurrence to all that had been said on the necessity of giving every encouragement to ingenuity to invent means of preventing the forging of Bank Notes. Considerable mistakes prevailed on the subject of the number of persons tried and executed for forging Bank Notes. By a return on the table it appeared that in 1806, no person was executed: four were executed in 1807: two in 1808: two in 1809: five in 1810: none in 1811: seven in 1812: two in 1813: one in 1814: three in 1815: four in 1816: and five in 1817. Those who were executed for forging country notes only amounted to seven. In the 13 years previous to the Bank Restriction the number of persons prosecuted for forging Bank Notes was four; but for forging the current coin 808 persons were tried. During the twenty-one years since the passing of the Bank Restriction, the number of persons prosecuted for coining was 3,099, and for forging Bank Notes 988; so that the prosecutions by the Bank did not amount to one-fourth of the number of persons prosecuted for coining.

Lord LAUDERDALE replied, insisting that all that had been advanced showed still more decisively that inquiry was necessary. Two years ago it was solemnly promised by Ministers, that the restriction should not be renewed. Then they asked for one year more, and then for another, engaging that when those periods had expired, cash payments should be resumed. Now, however, the restriction was, for the third time, to be continued, and all the reasons that had been now urged in its favour would equally prevail on the 5th of July, 1819.

The question was then put, and the motion was negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

[Nothing of moment before the House during the rest of the week.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 20.

POOR'S BILL AND PARISH VESTRY BILL.

Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from the Ward of Bishopsgate against the Parish Vestry Bill.

A Petition to a similar effect was received from the Parish of St. Sepulchre.

Mr. BROUGHAM presented a Petition from St. Leonard's, Shore-ditch, stating many objections to the Bill, objecting to select vestries, and to the mode of voting according to the rates of individuals, which he conceived to be contrary to a principle of the British Constitution, which recognized every man's consent to be taxed, by which it was possible that one man might command a clear majority of votes. There were other objections to be made, such as to throwing the burdens on the owners instead of the occupiers of houses, and the parish taking children from parents when application was made for relief.—Ordered to lie on the table.

TRIAL BY BATTLE.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he should shortly move for leave to bring in a Bill respecting the Trial by Battle, in cases of appeal of murder. (Hear.)

THE BUDGET.

Mr. VANSITTART observed, that all the principal branches of the public service had already been voted, therefore he could give, with a few exceptions, a general state of the finances. The sum intended for the Army Extraordinaries was 1,400,000*l.*, the total amount for the Army being 8,970,000*l.* The sum voted for the Navy Supplies last year was 7,596,000*l.* This year the sum was 6,456,000*l.* The sum voted for the Ordnance, including votes of parts of the Ordnance Supplies among the Navy Supplies, was, this year, 1,245,000*l.* Last year it was 1,250,000*l.* The Miscellaneous Services of this year were 1,720,000*l.*, not including, however, the sums required for building new churches, which would be provided for on their own grounds, but including 100,795*l.* for increasing small livings. The total supplies for the year were 18,392,000*l.*; last year the total supplies were 20,374,000*l.* In addition to this, there were 2,000,000*l.* on Exchequer Bills to be provided for, and 560,000*l.* for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. In consequence, the total amount to be provided for was 20,953,000*l.* There were also several extraordinary services of the year. The first was a grant voted by the House for the fortifications of the Netherlands; but there was no occasion to refer to the finances of the year, as it would be provided for out of the French contributions. The sum was 795,000*l.* There was, besides, the sum of 400,000*l.* voted in consequence of the Treaty with Spain for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. And the only other sum was a deficiency which would be found by referring to the accounts on the table for the year 1817. After the supplies of the year had been voted, a sum of 300,000*l.* was voted. It had been usual to give a general vote of credit to Government out of the Land-tax; but last year it was thought better that a vote of supply should be given rather than a power of anticipation; but this vote was given at too late a period for the Ways and Means, and therefore a deficiency now arose of 259,000*l.* The total extraordinary services were 659,000*l.*—The complete service of the year required 21,611,000*l.* thus:—

Army	8,970,000
Navy	5,456,000
Ordnance	1,245,000
Miscellaneous	1,720,000
Interest on Exchequer Bills	2,000,000
Sinking Fund	560,000
Spanish Treaty	400,000
Deficiency of Ways and Means last year	259,686
Total	21,612,086

Now the ways and means by which those supplies would be provided, were those which he was about to submit for their approbation. The first was a sum of 3,000,000*l.* to be raised by annual taxes. This was precisely the same as in former years. The second part was, the sum of 3,500,000*l.* from the Excise duties, which were to continue till 1821. The Excise duties amounted on the 6th of January last to 3,124,000*l.*, but this year he was confident they would amount to 3,500,000*l.* The third, was 250,000*l.* to be raised by a Lottery.—(Hear, hear!)—The fourth part was 250,000*l.* from the sale of naval and old stores. This yielded last year 400,000*l.* The fifth, was 250,000*l.* of the arrears of Property-tax: 350,000*l.* of arrears were still to be collected. The sixth part, was a sum of 21,448*l.* of profit, arising from the assistance afforded by Parliament to public works last year by the issue of Exchequer Bills. The total sum raised by those ways and means was 7,271,448*l.* He calculated on no surplus on the Consolidated Fund, although he felt assured that there would be a surplus; yet, he resorted to that for the payment of arrears that might arise. Next year he hoped to be able to give them a more satisfactory account of the produce of the Consolidated Fund. The sum then provided, compared with the total supplies, left 14,000,000*l.* to be still provided. To provide then for these 14,000,000*l.*, and for the reduction of the funded debt, he had now to submit for the approbation of Parliament the Plan which he had adopted.—(Here the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered upon the details of his new plan, which we gave at length in our last Examiner.) His great object, he said, was, to reduce the unfunded debt, which had been increased last year eighteen millions. He said that the total amount of new stock created for the service of the year would be 31,900,000*l.* of which 27,270,000*l.* would be vested in the 3½ per cents., and the remainder in the 3 per cents. The difference in the rate of interest would be about 153,000*l.* In examining the interest as receivable upon Exchequer Bills at present, and what their conversion into stock would produce, the whole charge would appear not to exceed 3*l.* 8*s.* 2½*d.* per cent., a very small sum when viewed in reference to the magnitude of the transaction. He hoped that the Committee would be inclined to support this new plan. It was his intention, if nothing preferable should be suggested, to propose that the Sinking Fund should be so charged, this year, as to make good whatever deficiencies might appear upon the fullest comparison of the expenditure with the revenue. In 1813, he recollected to have held out the prospect of realizing a fund of 100,000,000*l.* He had the happiness of now stating that this fund amounted to 94,000,000*l.*, of which 84,000,000*l.* were subservient to the purposes of the act of 1813. The manner, however, in which he intended to apply it would not interfere with the operations of the Commissioners in the reduction of capital debt. This part of the plan, however, he should reserve for consideration on a future day. He should now rather choose to call the attention of the Committee to the improvement in the different branches of our revenue. The favourable rise in the Excise Duties had led him to estimate them at 3,500,000*l.*, and the total excess of produce, as compared with 1815, was 515,000*l.*, or more than 10 per cent. on any former returns. In the last quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the former year, there was an improvement of 121,000*l.* in the Excise War Duties. There was a proportionate increase in the Customs, the last quarter exhibiting an excess, notwithstanding the anticipation of between 500,000*l.* and 600,000*l.* sugar duties, paid in the preceding quarter. Upon all these different views, he conceived that he was justified in calculating upon a surplus in the Consolidated Fund. The Right Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his first resolution with respect to a new subscription to a 3½ per cent. fund.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that it appeared to him upon a general view of the subject, that the plan now submitted was calculated mainly to conceal the true nature of those operations to which the Right Hon. Gentleman proposed to have recourse. The statement of facts resolved itself into this—that upon a comparison of the revenue with the charges upon it, there was a clear deficit of 14,000,000*l.* which it was necessary to make up some how or other. By the present plan it was proposed to borrow this sum, but not in the ordinary mode. The loan was to be cast into a different shape, and the interest payable upon it, amounting to 1,200,000*l.* per annum, was to be charged on the Sinking Fund. This being the true result of all the Right Hon. Gentleman's calculations, and the upshot of the case being, that in the third or fourth year of the peace we were still to borrow to this enormous extent, he could not, for one, join in those flattering congratulations which the House had received on the growing prosperity of the country. So far, indeed, was the country from any prospect of making the two ends of expense and revenue meet, that new means must be provided for discharging the interest of loans, and as the old war taxes were run quite dry, it had become necessary to apply to the Sinking Fund. He really deemed it wise and prudent in such circumstances to abstain from any expression of triumph at the flourishing state of the national finances.

Mr. GREENFELL stated that the House was at length in possession of the Minister's plan of finance; and he must declare, that he looked with dismay at its probable results. He had already more than once communicated privately to the Right Hon. Gentleman his opinion, that he was making a most extravagant bargain for the public. By this scheme the three millions of money to be raised would cost the country an interest of four and a half per cent.; for the Right Hon. Gentleman proposed to give an annuity of 3*l.* for every 66*l.* which he borrowed.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, it was stated, that there was a deficiency to be provided for of 14,000,000*l.*; but it must be remembered that a very considerable part of that sum arose from extraordinary charges, which had been growing from the increase of the unfunded debt. Under that head the charge for the last year was 1,600,000*l.* Next year, we might confidently expect that the amount of Exchequer Bills would not exceed 40,000,000*l.* instead of 60,000,000*l.*, and then the charge would be reduced 900,000*l.* As to the deficiency of the Consolidated Fund in the last year, it was something less than 2,000,000*l.*

Mr. HUSKISSON observed, among other things, that he protested against the doctrine that there was no available Sinking Fund. If things appeared likely to find their level, and the extra expense was not charged on the supply of the year, there would be found a real Sinking Fund, of the difference between the 14 millions before alluded to, and the covering of the ways and means.

Mr. J. P. GRANT said, it appeared to him, that the appropriation of the Sinking Fund to the payment of the interest of a debt to be raised, was almost equal to the worst possible application of that fund. The country had no real Sinking Fund as things were at present managed, but a most expensive and complicated machinery. We were in a situation where the income did not reach the expenditure, and where the Sinking Fund was of necessity to be applied, as far as it would go, to supply the deficiency. It was much to be wished that the Right Hon. Gentleman would come forward to state what was his permanent plan of finance, or whether he meant to go on from year to year, neither admitting nor denying that the income was equal to the expenditure, and contracting loans for the payment of our accumulated expenses.

Mr. LYTTELTON strongly objected to the resource of Lotteries, and commented on the pliant morality of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

After some further conversation, Mr. Vansittart's resolutions were agreed to.

PARISH VESTRY BILL.

The Parish Vestry Bill went through a Committee, in which a clause proposed by Mr. Alderman Wood, preventing the Bill from extending to London, was agreed to.

POOR LAWS' AMENDMENT BILL.

The House then went into a Committee on the Poor Laws' Amendment Bill, in which there was considerable discussion on the different amendments proposed in the various clauses, most of which were adopted. On the clause by which the children of paupers might be taken and provided for by the parishes, under the authority of the magistrates, by apprenticeships, &c., there was a considerable difference of opinion, and the discussion was at length postponed.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, April 21.

On the motion of Sir JEAN ONSLOW, a Committee was appointed to consider the effect of the Laws to regulate or restrain the Interest of Money—(the Usury Laws.)

IRISH WINDOW TAX.

Mr. SHAW moved that the Petitions from Ireland respecting the Window Tax be referred to a Committee with a view to its repeal. He made many remarks on this tax, which was peculiarly obnoxious to the Irish nation, and which the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer had officially declared, was to be considered merely as a War Tax.

Mr. VANSITTART said, that the tax had been pledged by the Irish Parliament for loans raised, and it should be considered that England was at this moment paying between two and three millions of war taxes. The taxes of Ireland, though it was painful to say so, were not now equal to the interest of the Consolidated Fund. Ireland had brought to this country no addition of revenue, but a large addition to the national debt. The distress of Ireland was now coming to an end; the comforts of the people were increased. Parliament must make a firm stand, and grant relief in urgent cases only. He thought some relaxation should take place, and had therefore prepared a scale of reduction in the tax, of 25 per cent. on the whole produce.

Mr. POLYKETT contended that they were pledged to repeal this tax. Since the Union, Ireland could not pay her charges, which were increased three-fold since that period. Ireland was taxed far beyond her strength, and this tax was peculiarly odious and oppressive. The sense of the Irish nation should be yielded to, as the sense of the English people had been, when the Income Tax was repealed. Every visit to Dublin affected and distressed him, when he saw the wretched beings, with pale and famished faces, that every where presented themselves; and not less was he grieved to observe the melancholy despondency of the better orders, who could not, with all their industry, encounter the pressure of the taxes, or conceal the misery of their circumstances. (Hear, hear!)

After some further debate, the House divided—For the motion, 51—Against it, 67—Majority, 16.

The order made for a return of the amount of the income of the High Bailiff of Westminster was discharged, after some conversation and a division, when the Speaker gave the casting vote, there being an equal number, 46.

FORGED BANK NOTES, &c.

Sir J. MACKINTOSH observed, that the Suspension of cash payments, by increasing the number of notes, had corrupted the morals of a large class, and occasioned an increase of crimes with a velocity unexampled. For seven years previous to the suspension, the Bank had not instituted a single prosecution; but for the seven years subsequent they had instituted no less than 222. Was not this a frightful leap? In the 14 years previous to the suspension, there had been only four prosecutions, and in the 14 years afterwards no less than 469—(Hear, hear!)—and in the 21 years previous to the suspension, only six prosecutions; while in the 21 years after it they had increased to the enormous sum of 850. The proportion was therefore six to 850; and he would ask if the history of the criminal law afforded a parallel instance of such a sudden augmentation? (Hear, hear!) The Mint prosecutions had also augmented, though not in a ratio so rapid; for while the offences for imitating the coin had only doubled, those of forgery had increased 120-fold. What course could be assigned for this melancholy change? What but the enormous increase of Bank notes, more especially of small notes, which at first had only been dispersed to the extent of one million and a half, and now had ascended to seven or eight millions. Upon this statement, he would make only one reflection to the admirers of capital punishments, which could not be too often repeated, viz. that while the crime was visited with the utmost severity, it had not been able to repress it; but, on the contrary, the more the promoters of capital punishments cried, hang! hang! the more the offence was committed, and the more numerous were the offenders executed—(Hear, hear!)—The Bill lately introduced for decreasing country notes should be entitled "a Bill for the better promotion of forgery," for country notes were rarely forged. The Bank of England had refused payment of 100,000 forged notes for its own benefit, but had done nothing to guard the public against impositions. Nothing could be more true than that a direct tax of 25,000*l.* a-year was laid by the Bank upon the order of society least capable of detecting the fraud, and of sustaining the loss. If a tax to be so raised were to be proposed in Parliament, there was not a man who would not start from it with horror; yet the effect upon the poor was the same, and the Bank were the gainers. The crime of forgery was often attended with peculiar aggravations: it had not unfrequently been the means of seducing the unwary into guilt, and women (from their nature dependent, and incapable of the more arduous duties) were competent to the commission of this offence, as far at least as the uttering of forged notes constituted a part of it. Whole families were sometimes involved in the same crime; and instances were not unknown, where a father, his wife, and children, en masse, stood at the Bar to receive sentence for its commission—(Hear, hear!)—The Bank should have resorted to some mode of preventing the forgery of their notes. This might be difficult, but they were bound to attempt it, and it was his intention to make a motion on the subject, if necessary.—Sir James concluded by moving, "That there be laid before the House an account of the total amount of the nominal value of forged bank-notes presented at the Bank from Jan. 1816, to April, 1818, with the number of public prosecutions with reference to forged notes, together with the expenses of prosecution for the same period."—The Hon. Gentleman also moved for an account of the total number of forged notes discovered from Jan. 1812 to April, 1818, distinguishing the kind of notes, &c.

Mr. MANNING said, he was as anxious to have forgeries prevented as the Hon. Member could be; but he ought to recollect that, within a limited period, there had been 3,099 cases of forgery of metallic currency, and only 998 of forgeries on the Bank. After some other statements, the Hon. Member concluded by expressing his opposition to the motion, on the ground that an account of any other part of their expenditure might be required, as well as their expenses in prosecutions for forgeries.

Sir C. MORDAUNT mentioned that the people of Birmingham were so much affected by the number of forgeries, that they intended to petition the House on the subject.

Mr. Alderman Wood, in the course of some statements on the subject, mentioned, that an unfortunate woman, who was to be hanged on Friday, had been incited to the crime, and her brother, who appeared much more guilty, had been suffered to escape by the police-officers.

Mr. GREENELL took that opportunity of mentioning the plan of Mr. Tillock, which a number of engravers had so highly praised. He thought it was incumbent on the Bank not only to show their anxiety, but to prove that they had something in hand on the subject.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER conceived that the giving of the numbers of prosecutions and convictions would answer every reasonable purpose, and that there then would be no necessity for a statement of the expenses the Bank had incurred in the conduct of prosecutions, in the view of a just and moral consideration of the subject.

Mr. BENNET said the matter was not sufficiently disclosed. He wished for information on the subject of parties pleading guilty on prosecutions, of which there were 90 in 1817. There was an expression in law which spoke of compounding felony. He believed that the Bank paid rewards to police officers as well as others. One man received 30*l.* for the conviction of two lads. The Bank, he understood, paid at the rate of 15*l.* a man. Capital punishments, at the extent to which they were carried, defeated their objects, and in the execution of them there was a great inequality. Lately a woman was tried for forgery of senmen's wills and convicted; but Baron Wood did not leave her for execution. Whatever the Chancellor of the Exchequer might find it convenient to borrow under the system of frequent capital punishments, the country would not think it fit to go along with him. If the Bank were not yet satisfied with the blood already shed, they would not be permitted to shed much more. The opinion of the country would force them from the continuance of a system disgraceful to the public character.

Mr. THOMPSON remarked, that the Bank notes were such as a bungling engraver could imitate, though the Bank Committee were said to have sat 15 years on this subject! Country bankers had issued notes executed by good artists, and of them there were very few forgeries indeed. He knew people in the country were afraid of a Bank of England note. At Birmingham there were manufactories of forged notes. Devices of different descriptions on both sides of a note rendered forging of them more difficult; but the Bank of England notes were easy of imitation.

Mr. DICKINSON had seen a letter from the Bank Solicitor, which showed an eagerness for prosecutions. Perhaps the Bank ought to be obliged to pay forged notes. Long ago, Bishop Burnett remarked, that the Bank were getting so much power, that in a short time they might not be controlled by the country. If one of their clerks was now committed for an assault, there was his reward in 200*l.* or 300*l.* from the Bank. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. BABINGTON said, the mischief of these forged notes had been stated at 25,000*l.* a-year to the country. He believed it might be double that sum. A great number of them never found their way to the Bank.

Mr. B. SHAW regretted, that, although the Directors had made every investigation, no mode of preventing forgery had been invented. A public reward should be offered. No public money could be better repaid.

Mr. H. DAVIS said, the best artists had been employed by the Bank to contrive a preventive of forgery in vain.

Mr. S. THOMPSON contended, that Bank prosecutions had been conducted with the utmost possible moderation. No expenses had been incurred for the purpose of entrapping persons. To prove these assertions, the accounts of the Bank would be presented without any objection. (Hear.)

The motions were carried without a division. When the last motion relative to the expenses of prosecutions was agreed to, the Opposition benches returned several cheers.

The Report of the Finance Resolutions was brought up, and leave was given to bring in a Bill in order to give effect to the 1st and 2d resolutions.—Adjourned.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

Mr. BENNET presented a Petition from persons confined in the Fleet prison for Contempt of Court. They stated that they had done all they could do to do away their offence, and were ready to do every thing that might yet be necessary. They mentioned the peculiar hardships suffered by six persons who had been situated similarly with themselves, one of whom was in prison 34 years, and another 18 years, for contempt, and died in confinement. He hoped that the attention of the high legal authorities would be called to this subject. He confessed that, after the indifference that had been shown, he had no great hopes of success; but he had done his duty in presenting the Petition.—The Petition was received, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC CHARITIES.

Mr. BROUGHAM presented a Petition from some person in Berkshire, who stated that he had examined the state of the charities in that county. The income of the Berkshire charitable institutions had been stated at 7,000*l.* a-year, but the Petitioner believed they amounted to 20,000*l.* of which more than three-fourths was wholly unaccounted for; only a third was stated in the returns. In one case of a charitable institution, there was a balance due of 10,000*l.*, which was not stated in the returns. Orders would be insufficient, unless the Commissioners had power and instructions to investigate minutely.—Ordered to lie on the table.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES IN IRELAND, &c.

On the motion of Sir J. NEWPORT, a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the state of Ireland, as to the contagious diseases of the last and present year, and the causes which led to this destructive malady, and to consider of remedial and preventive measures against the progress and recurrence of the evil.

In the course of the conversation on this topic, Mr. PEEL said that a low fever had prevailed in Ireland for three or four years past, which in September had become peculiarly alarming. All the medical men attributed it to the extreme poverty of the lower orders, the defective quality of their provisions, the depression of mind resulting from want of employment, and the unpromising prospect before them. Besides, there had been a very wet season, which greatly deteriorated the food they generally subsisted upon, and also deprived them of another necessary of life, a stock of fuel. These accounts had concurred from all quarters. Many attributed one cause of the spreading of infection to the great number of wandering beggars, rendered so by want of employment. Another peculiar cause was said to be the practice in that country, of assembling in great numbers at funerals, where a deceased individual might infect all that were present. It was also a consideration, lamentable and affecting, that the contagion was actually spread in some degree by the kindness and hospitality of the lower orders in Ireland, who would not shut their doors against the unfortunate mendicant, whose sufferings they sympathized with; to which they would sacrifice their own personal security. The proportion of deaths in the hospitals varied from 1 in 13 to 1 in 10. The last accounts stated that there was a considerable abatement of the calamity. The difficulties attending the employ of the poor were great, and the evils were much to be lamented.

Mr. BENNET spoke of the fever hospital in this metropolis, which he recommended to the attention of Government; and on his motion, a Select Committee was also appointed to inquire into the state of contagious fevers in the metropolis, and the condition of the institutions for their cure.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. WILBERFORCE moved for various papers respecting the condition and treatment of the West India Slaves, the prevention of illicit importation, the state of the free coloured population, &c. &c. He made various observations on the subject. Mr. Brougham's Act, he said, which made the traffic in slaves a felony, did infinite good; but more was required. It was necessary to take care that slaves could not be imported, by guarding against every possible evasion. He lamented that the necessary measures could not be left to the Colonial Legislatures; but he never felt sanguine as to those quarters. It was only on the mother country that he could place reliance; and it was the duty of the House to watch over the interests of a million and a half of beings, who were at length recognized as their fellow-creatures.

After some conversation, the motion was carried; and several other papers on the same subject were also ordered.

CRUELITIES IN DOMINICA.

Sir S. ROMNEY then noticed the condition of the Slaves in Dominica, and the administration of the laws in that island. He stated, that in the spring of 1817 several cases of great cruelty came before the Grand Jury, who threw out the bills of indictment. One was a charge against Dr. Birmingham, who had cruelly scourged several slaves, after they had been acquitted of the misdemeanours with which they had been charged. Another was the case of John McCorry, Esq. who had immoderately whipped his slave Jerry. A third was a most horrible case, that of Alex. Le Goy, who had confined a female slave in an iron chain, padlocked upon her neck, arms, and legs—and had maintained, mutilated, and cruelly tortured her, by causing her arm to be fractured! This bill too was thrown out by the Grand Jury, who had moreover thought fit to declare, that these several indictments were nuisances!—Mr. Glanville, the Attorney-General, had therefore deemed it necessary to have recourse to informations, for the protection of the black population, considering it not right to trust to Grand Juries again. He was sure that the House could not but be sensible of the necessity of affording the greatest encouragement to the government of these islands to take the slaves under their protection. The laws were beneficent—but what availed the laws, when the unhappy slaves could not avail themselves of them? Neither the slave nor his family, nor friends, could obtain any redress against the cruelties of his master. The slave was cruelly treated, and the white population sympathized with the master. (Hear, hear!) It was the duty of the Government to protect the laws, and, without that protection, no security could be afforded. There was a general concurrence in opinion in the islands, that nothing was more improper than to interfere between master and slave: it was thought to have a tendency to excite a disposition on the part of the slaves to revolt. The only effective remedy, in his opinion, would be that which had been recommended by Mr. Burke, which was to constitute the Attorney-Generals guardians of the slaves—to make it an essential part of their duty to interpose between the master and the slave when there should be a necessity. By such a regulation, it would become their duty to see that the slaves were properly treated.—The laws of Dominica were most oppressive. No man of colour on the island could obtain his liberty without paying a tax of 16 pounds 10 shillings. Those not born there must pay 35 pounds. Men of colour found on the island, if not claimed by their masters (and if they had none, they could not be claimed) were taken up and sold for the public benefit. Since the abolition, it was right to encourage rather than restrain manumission, and to improve the general condition of the negroes. The slaves were the King's subjects, and it was the duty of Government to afford them every protection.—Sir Samuel then noticed the conduct of a planter in Nevis, named Huggins, who sometime ago was prosecuted for cruelty to his slaves, and who had been now ill-treating those of another. He had caused two young boys to receive 100 lashes each, though the law allowed only 30; and because two females, relations of the boys, had shed tears over them, this Huggins had them whipped for it! He was brought to trial, and though the facts were proved, he was acquitted;—such was the prejudice that existed against interference between master and slave!—Sir Samuel concluded by moving for various papers on these particular cases, and on the general treatment of slaves in Dominica.

Mr. GOULBURN made a few remarks, but did not object to the motion.

Mr. A. GRANT complained of the injurious tendency of the speech of Sir Samuel, and observed, that in order to confirm injurious impressions, whenever punishment was mentioned, the House heard of the cart-whip, by which an idea of cruelty was meant to be conveyed.—(Hear, hear, from Sir Samuel Romilly, who asked across the table, was the instrument of punishment not a whip?) Most undoubtedly it was a whip; but why use the odious term of a cart-whip, implying a brutal infliction of severity, instead of a necessary correction? In what the Hon. and Learned Gentleman had said about chains, there was the same tendency to mislead. He did not deny that forced labour in chains did exist in Jamaica. These chains, however, were employed more for the purpose of preventing escape than inflicting punishment: and the work to which they were compelled was rather intended to promote their health than to gain any thing by their industry in this situation.

Mr. A. BROWN said, that the females had not been punished for shedding tears, but for being guilty of yells and cries to stop the punishment: they were not tears of sorrow, but of obstinacy. The Governor had approved of the acquittal of Huggins.

Sir J. MACINTOSH observed, that the barbarities of Huggins had excited universal detestation. He did not know how the Hon. Gentleman could so nicely distinguish between yells of horror and yells of obstinacy. To weep at the sufferings of those who were dear to them were considered expressions of mutiny! How did he know that? Perhaps this was the only instance in modern barbarity of spectators having been punished for a mere expression of sympathy. Never but once had it occurred even in Roman history. The Hon. Gentleman had added, that the Governor of Nevis had written a letter expressing his approbation of Huggins's conduct. In what part of the performance of his duty had the Governor done this? Were we to suppose that the Governor had any connexion with this Huggins—(Hear, hear!)

that he could in any way communicate with one so polluted, so degraded, and so abhorred? It was clear that justice had not been done, that the laws had been scorned, and humanity violated, and it was their duty to restore the island to the blessings of equal law.

Mr. MARRYATT stated, that the Grand Jury had not said that all indictments were nuisances, but only those which were presented without evidence, as was that relating to Mr. Birmingham; for the only witness, the Clerk of the market, was not produced. The law proceedings were generally drawn up incorrectly. The same Jury had recently convicted of murder a white man, Mr. Stranok, for shooting at his female negro, who was running away.

Mr. WILBERFORCE observed, it was dreadful when women were punished for weeping, and when fathers, as he knew, had flogged their own sons most severely. Shocking as such individual acts were, it was the system, the slow, grinding effects of slavery, which degraded both master and servant, that was the greatest evil. In Dominica the slaves were better off than in Jamaica; but there was no sympathy even there; and in no place were they worse off in this respect than in Barbadoes, though it was called Little Britain. It had been said, that those who spoke on this subject treated the whole people of the West Indies with harshness; but surely while such an instrument as the cart-whip was ordinarily employed, much more severe in its inflictions than the cat-o'-nine-tails, because it cut even masses of flesh, how was it possible to speak with mildness? It was important to improve the education and morals of the negroes, to raise them from their present state of degradation, and to advance them by degrees to a condition of domestic competence and comfort. He was well convinced that the Africans were as capable of improvement, intellectual and moral, as any other uncivilized people.

Mr. W. SMITH had been most happy to have heard to-night, for the first time, the slaves of the West Indies recognized as subjects of the Crown of Great Britain: had this been earlier attended to, 9,000 persons in the island of Nevis would not have remained subjected to 500 white persons, at the head of whom was Mr. Huggins, with whom, after all that had been said and known, the Governor himself did not disdain to associate.

The question was put and carried, as was one for Copies of all Letters, &c. relating to the case of Edward Huggins the elder, tried in Dominica for cruelty to slaves.—Adjourned till Friday.

Friday, April 24.

REFORM.

Twenty-six Petitions for Reform and Universal Suffrage, signed by 20 persons each, were received from Preston, presented by Mr. Hornby.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. C. WYNN brought up the Report of the Committee appointed to consider the letter written by Mr. T. Ferguson to Mr. Dyke, which had been referred to them. They had examined into the matter as far as related to Mr. T. Ferguson, who had admitted that he was the author and writer of the letter produced, and that its object was to influence Mr. Dyke's vote; but that any accusation of his having the authority of Lord Douglas for doing so, was false and groundless. The said letter was considered by the Committee as a corrupt attempt, and a high breach and contempt of the privileges of that House.

The report, of which this was the substance, was agreed to. Mr. C. WYNN moved that Mr. T. Ferguson be taken into custody by the Serjeant at Arms, for the said offence.—Ordered.—Mr. C. Wynn said, that as soon as Mr. T. Ferguson was in custody, he should move that he be committed to the gaol of Newgate.

POOR LAWS' AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, some conversation took place between Mr. STURGES BOURNE, and a Member, who contended that it was contrary to the intention and spirit of the Poor Laws to give parish aid to able bodied men, which was a great evil to the public, and a greater evil to the men themselves; yet that the provision in the present Bill for sending the children of the poor to school was liable to objection on this ground.

The House went into a Committee, and the Bill was read clause by clause.

Several amendments were proposed to the clauses, on the proposition of which, a long conversation took place. At the instance of General THORNTON the gallery was cleared for a division, on the clause to render the owners of houses rented at not more than 40*l.* per annum, nor less than 4*l.* liable to the rates (at least to the amount of half the rent), when the occupiers failed to pay them. The numbers were—For the clause, 54—Against it, 0.

The clause for enabling parish overseers to advance money, by way of loan, to industrious paupers, was agreed to.

The clause that Scotch or Irish vagrants may be removed to their own countries without being whipped or imprisoned, was agreed to after some conversation, in which Mr. Alderman Wood proposed an amendment to extend the same provisions to other vagrants. After a long conversation about verbal amendments in other parts of the Bill, and the proposal of clauses by several Members, the Bill passed the Committee, and was ordered to be printed, as amended.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, APRIL 26.

News from the Continent has been very barren this week. The most important piece of intelligence from abroad is a letter from Mr. ADAMS, the American Secretary, to Don LUIS DE ONIS, the Spanish Ambassador, which, in terms which the hireling journals among us find exceedingly provoking, speaks very quietly and decidedly of the United States having declined the mediation of Great Britain, and of their leaving the question with Spain just as it was, for said Spain to get out as it can. The beginning has an air of irony:—

"You perceive, Sir, that the Government of the United States is not prepared either to renounce any of the claims which it has been so long urging upon the justice of Spain, or to acquiesce in any of those arguments which appear to you so luminous and irresistible."

There follows, a little after, a passage extremely calculated to set the subjects of European monarchies thinking just now:—

"It has hitherto been the policy, both of Europe and of the United States, to keep aloof from the general federative system of each other. The European States are combined together, and connected with one another, by a multitude of important interests and relations, with which the United States have no concern, with which they have always manifested the determination not to interfere, and of which no communication being made to them by the Governments of Europe, they have not information competent to enable them to estimate their extent and bearings. The United States, in justice to themselves, in justice to that harmony which they earnestly desire to cultivate with all the Powers of Europe, in justice to that fundamental system of policy which forbids them from entering the LABYRINTH of European politics, must decline soliciting or acceding to the interference of any other Government of Europe, for the settlement of their differences with Spain."

The heads of these Governments, it is now said, are to have a Congress at Aix le Chapelle, "the ancient capital of CHARLEMAGNE,"—a sly touch, we suppose, at NAPOLEON, who continues somehow or other to be extremely provoking to these gentlemen. They may have a Congress, for ought we care, at the Five Asses Heads; for they will soon cease to influence Europe as individuals. They must either give into the just, decent, and long-promised demands which they owe to their disgusted preservers, or an entirely new account will be commenced with them.

In the very teeth of the much more criminal delays, which the Bank are perpetrating, with respect to the prevention of forgeries, some executions peculiarly distressing to humanity have taken place in the course of the week. We allude to the case of Harriet Skelton, which has the appearance of being a very distressing one; and to that of the young Bridegroom Wm. Gray, which unquestionably is most truly so.—(See our 3d page.)—This case has furnished a harrowing specimen of the present state of social government,—of the fatal facilities left open for the temptation of some of the best feelings, while the most selfish ones may safely pursue their unjust and after all unhappy aggrandizement, and lay claim all the while to the reputation of virtue. Yet the Courier, of L'Eclair notoriety, and the defender of all sorts of high delinquents (and there are higher than people suppose, even in money-matters of extraordinary description) thinks to do away with the objections of the philosopher on these points, by asking whether all detestation of the crime is to be done away with, merely because the criminal has yielded to temptation! Whoever said such a thing? Whoever said any thing about the detestation of the crime, or gave such a reason for not detesting it? What was said was this,—that if any one is more criminal than another, it is the tempter, and that whether criminal or not, all crime (even when punished, or rather, most when there is a necessity of punishing it), ought to be considered as so much dreadful and unnecessary misfortune, which it is the very first business of Government to endeavour to do away,—yes, to do away, by practising justice itself, and disseminating the knowledge of it among others.

Calcutta papers to the 29th of November, bring some particulars from India, which, however, add little to the sum of events or to our general understanding of the state of affairs in that quarter. But they contain an afflicting statement of the prevalence of an epidemic disease, which has fallen with fatal severity on the central division of the British army. The native troops are the principal victims; though, in some instances, Europeans also have suffered from it. The malady has assumed the form of a cholera morbus, and its ravages are nearly proportioned to the scanty sustenance to which those who are seized with it have been habituated. An insurrection is announced to have taken place in Ceylon, for the purpose of raising to the throne of Candy a relation of the legitimate tyrant who was lately deposed by General BROWNRIGG.

The letters this morning from China, state a circumstance of much interest. A serious misunderstanding has arisen between the Chinese Authorities and the British traders, respecting reported smuggling by the country ships. Bonds had been demanded from the owners, which had been peremptorily refused: a general search of all British vessels had been threatened. In consequence of this high language, Capt. CLOVELL, of the Orlando frigate, had proceeded from Macao to Canton, accompanied by several merchants and supercargoes.—Courier—Saturday.

Montreal Papers to the 6th ult. have arrived. The disputes between the Hudson's Bay Company and the North West Traders are expected to be immediately decided at the Session of Oyer and Terminer, Montreal. On the 2d March, bills of indictment were found against CUTHBERT GRANT, ALEXANDER FRAZER, THOMAS M-KAY, and fourteen others, for the murder of Governor SEMPLE and twenty others, near the settlement of Red River, on the 19th of June, 1816. True bills were also found against a number of persons as accessories before and after the fact, and for pillaging and burning the settlements on the Red River.

Mr. HILEY ADDINGTON has retired from his situation as Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, which he has filled for above five years. He is to be succeeded by Mr. HENRY CLIVE, M.P. for Ludlow.

SOUTHWARK MEETING.—There was a Meeting on Monday in Southwark of the friends of Sir R. WILSON. Among the company were Mr. MARSHAL, Mr. HALL, Mr. BENNET, Mr. LAMBTON, Mr. BRUCE, Capt. HUTCHINSON, Mr. WAITHMAN, and other friends to liberty. Various animated speeches were delivered.—Sir ROBERT, when speaking of the treatment he, as a military man, had received from Ministers, remarked, that they owed him as well as the country a commodity in which they were bankrupts—Justice! (Loud applause.)—Mr. BENNET said he had known the gallant Candidate for years, and knew him to be a man of talents, of spotless character, and independent in the highest degree.—Mr. LAMBTON exposed the evils of the present system, which were all owing, he said, to the want of independent men in Parliament: he therefore trusted the Electors would return Sir R. W., who possessed both firmness and independence, and who could use his tongue against corruption as well as he had used his sword against the enemy.—Various resolutions were passed; and it appeared to be the intention of the Electors to exert themselves for Sir R. W. and Mr. CALVERT, and thus, as in Westminster, give Southwark a potent voice in support of freedom and reform.

The PRINCE REGENT does not complete his 56th year till the 12th of August next; but as that month falls too late for the fashionable season, it was thought expedient to anticipate the celebration of the birth-day, and St. George's Day (Thursday) was fixed upon, in imitation of the foreign practice, being what is abroad termed the name-day of his Royal Highness. The weather was inauspicious, but the ladies were not to be deterred, even by the danger of spoiling their magnificent dresses. They flocked to the Court in great numbers, and the assemblage was altogether the most numerous since the marriage of the lamented Princess CHARLOTTE.—Some of the carriages were kept in the ranks three hours; and though the QUEEN remained in the drawing-room till five o'clock, yet several ladies experienced the mortifying disappointment of being too late.

ROYAL INCOMES.—From papers laid before Parliament, it appears that the Duke of CLARENCE receives 21,782l. 9s. 8d. per annum. The Duke of KENT, 25,205l. 4s. 2d. The Duke of CUMBERLAND, 19,008l. 10s. 10d. The Duke of SUSSEX, 18,000l. The Duke of CAMBRIDGE, 18,882l. 15s. 7d. —It also appears, that these Royal Dukes have each had out of the Admiralty Droits, in the years 1805-6, the sum of 20,000l.—that, in 1813, a loan of a similar sum was advanced to the Duke of CLARENCE, to be repaid by quarterly instalments of 500l., of which six instalments have been repaid;—and that a loan of 6000l. was advanced to the Duke of KENT, in 1806, of which one-sixth has been repaid.

Erroneous impressions having arisen out of the late proceedings in Chancery, we are authorised to state, that the Lady of rank so much alluded to in the course of the discussion, is not Lady CASTLEREAGH.—Courier.

A punster, conversing on the practice of adulterating Wine and Tea, the former with the juice of the Sloe, and the latter with the leaves,—observed, that we now got at the meaning of the remark of the Doctors, "that Wine and Tea were slow poisons."

In the King's Bench, on Tuesday week, the CHIEF JUSTICE refused a rule for a new trial, saying, and repeating with some indignation, that "it would be a penalty on truth." Has any change taken place in his Lordship's opinion with regard to the Law of Libel?

SUICIDE.—Thursday, Mrs. ROSS, a respectable widow lady, of Poplar, was found in bed with her head nearly severed from her body, and a razor stained with blood lying by her. A series of misfortunes, which she has encountered since the recent death of her husband, had, it is conjectured, overcome her reason, and led to the dire catastrophe.

FORGED BANK NOTES.—On Wednesday a numerous and respectable meeting of the Inhabitants of Birmingham took place on the subject of the alarming increase of Forgeries on the Bank of England; and to adopt such measures as may have a tendency to call the attention of Parliament to the subject. WILLIAM COTTERELL, Esq. High Bailiff, took the chair. The Rev. J. H. SPRY moved a series of Resolutions, enforcing the imperious necessity of such an immediate alteration in the style of engraving the Bank of England notes, as may prevent those numerous trials and frequent executions which are occasioned by the present extreme facility of fabrication, and which are alike shocking to the feelings of the humane, and a disgrace to the character of the country.—The Resolutions and Petitions to Parliament were carried unanimously.

As a means of preventing the Forgery of Bank-notes, a Correspondent begs to recommend to the notice of Parliament, that every person convicted of forging such Notes, —as they are manufactured at present,—shall be hung by a Bank Director, the said Bank Director himself performing the office of Executioner. Our Correspondent professes to have been some time deliberating with himself, whether it would not be still more effective if the Forger were to hang the Director.

JEREMY BENTHAM, ESQ.

The following is the Resolution of Thanks to this eminent person, which was passed at the late Westminster Meeting:—

Resolved, "That the Thanks of this Meeting are given to that profound Reasoner and pre-eminent Writer on Legislation, Jeremy Bentham, Esq. for the philosophical and unanswerable vindication, in his 'Catechism on Parliamentary Reform,' of the Right of ALL the Commons of this Realm equally to share and annually to exercise the franchise of choosing Members to serve in Parliament, as well as their farther Right to a sure protection by the application of the Ballot against injury or oppression, for having freely exercised that sacred Franchise."

"James-street, March 24, 1818.

"DEAR SIR,—We the undersigned, having been desired to communicate to you the Vote of Thanks of your Fellow-citizens in General Meeting legally assembled, of which the foregoing is a copy, have done ourselves the honour to wait on you with the same; and sincerely wishing you a continuance of life, with health to prosecute your invaluable labours for the benefit of our country and mankind, by inculcating true principles of free government, legislation, and jurisprudence, we subscribe ourselves, Dear Sir, your friends and brethren in the love of truth, freedom, and justice,

"Jeremy Bentham, Esq.

"JNO. CARTWRIGHT.
"PETER WALKER."

To which Mr. BENTHAM thus replied:—

"TO JOHN CARTWRIGHT, ESQ. AND PETER WALKER, ESQ.

"Queen-square, Westminster, March 25, 1818.

"GENTLEMEN,—Allow me thus to repair my misfortune in not being at home when you favoured me with your call. When penning the little work in question, little did I expect to receive any such reward as that which has been thus communicated to me, and which has been so highly enhanced by the venerable character of the hands through which it has been transmitted. The honour thus conferred on me is of that sort, the value of which will be still increasing, when those which are conferred by a single hand, for obsequiousness to a single will, will be as the glory of King Solomon in a puppet show. Believe me to be, with all respect and gratitude, yours,

"JEREMY BENTHAM."

[The work above alluded to being out of print, we hear with much satisfaction that it is about to be re-published, in cheap numbers, with the style adapted to the popular reader. Mr. BENTHAM's last work on the Church Establishment, we hope soon to see re-published in the same way.]

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 320.

COVENT-GARDEN.

This has been a rich week in theatrical novelties, especially as they have all been successful. Covent-Garden has produced a new tragedy; and Drury-Lane has revived a tragedy of MARLOW's, a musical opera composed by HOOK, and produced a new burlesque interlude. Here's a piece of anticlimax, natural to lists of things!

The new tragedy is entitled Bellamira, or the Fall of Tunis, and is from the pen of Mr. SMITH, author of the Apostate. Manfredi, a Neapolitan Nobleman (Mr. CHARLES KEMBLE), is a captive at Tunis, and conspires with his fellow-prisoners to regain their freedom. During his efforts for this purpose, he suddenly encounters, to his great astonishment, his wife Bellamira (Miss O'NEILL), who has been made captive also with her infant, and who, after undergoing with him some agonizing delays and hindrances, obtains the sympathy of the renegade Governor (Mr. YOUNG), who, partly from weariness of his own offences, partly from regard for his countrymen, and partly from love of the very name of Bellamira, which was that of his own child, assists and urges them to escape. Their flight, however, is prevented by the interference of Amurath, another renegade Italian (Mr. MACREADY), who, on account of the Governor's doubtful disposition towards the slaves, is appointed in his room, and ordered to put the principal among them to death. Amurath, a violent vindictive man, has seen in the condemned list the name of the man he hates most upon earth, Manfredi; for the woman he loved had chosen the latter in preference, and it was for an attempt to seize her by force that he was beaten down by his rival, and branded by the executioner in the public place at Naples. To his double delight,—the delight of what he calls his love, as well as of his malice,—he finds this very woman a prisoner also; and the main part of the piece is occupied with his endeavours to make the one a victim to his lust, and the other to his revenge. In the former attempt he is prevented by the heroism of Bellamira herself, who in a struggle with him snatches a dagger from his girdle, and defends herself; he rushes out for the purpose of killing Manfredi, but the deposed Governor, who has in the mean while found out that Bellamira is his child, has in the mean time set the Christians free; and though the conspiracy is discovered, and he and others thrown into prison, yet the city is successfully attacked by Christian troops; the prisoners, who with the exception of the Governor had been led out to death, join them, and assist in the victory; Amurath going in his rage to the dungeons mortally stabs the Governor, and after going out again to fight, returns staggering with his wounds, and finds Bellamira and her infant with her father. All the flood of his passions rushes back with bitterness on his heart; and though wishing to think for a moment that he could not do harm to an infant, his habitual vindictiveness prevails; he crawls towards the mother and child, in spite of her outcries, in order to sacrifice the latter, when Montalto the father, who was not yet dead, totters between them, and returns the mortal stab. At this crisis, the others come in victorious, and the piece ends with the deaths of the two unequal renegades, and the salvation of the husband, wife, and child.

This piece is far from being destitute of merit; and as the author, we understand, is young, has still more promise in it. There is a good deal of interest and suspense in some of the incidents; the language, though not marked with originality, and tending to declamation, is nevertheless instinctively kept under by a lurking better taste; and the sentiments are not only excellent, but the author has given proofs that they are sincerely felt by him;—

first, by the instinctive better taste just mentioned, which always feels that truth can do without declamation; and second, by an animated burst against the cold-blooded neglect of Captives in Africa by common-place conquerors in Europe,—an obvious allusion, which though appealing to the natural impulses of humanity, and pretty sure of the approbation of a mixed audience, might nevertheless have excited individual enemies among them, who might have done the author mischief in other passages. Now we like this sincerity, and defiance of petty chances, exceedingly. It is what the time has wanted, and is another mark of its growing intellectual power. It does honour to Mr. SHIEL, his country, and even his species.

The fault of the new tragedy is the fault of a young ambition, ardent for its purpose, without the experience requisite to obtain it;—it is a tendency to mistake improbability for interest, vehemence for strength, the impatience of lowness for the attainment of height, and excessive tragic effect physically overpowering for real effect at once carrying away and sustaining. Mr. SHIEL might have selected even from the very dagger-room of Italian story,—the novels of GIRALDI CINTIO,—a story of Tunisian captives, which might have suggested a less convulsive set of incidents than his present one. The repeated trick of contriving a woman's movements by shewing her child or her husband to her and threatening his life, and a continual putting in play of daggers, denunciations, villainies, bodily and mental agonies, and shrieks, mean nothing but that the author has not yet got the abundance of ideas which can enable him to dispense with the common property of horrifiers. The mother, in fact, would not have survived such an outrageous set of trials. The child is almost made a tragic doll of in this piece, for the purpose of snatching up and laying aside when the mother pleases; and very like a doll it behaves accordingly, acquiescing in every thing with a truly waxen passiveness; and sitting, when not wanted, on the first bench or parapet wall next it, with a face as indifferent to the storms in front of it as the head of a ship. Some of these superfluities have, we dare say, been subsequently retrenched. We have not time to say more; but Mr. SHIEL has quite sense and spirit enough to know how to pursue the hints we give him and to avail himself of them. Let him earnestly cultivate his reading, and still more his observation of human nature, and the love of the external world, the former of which is the flesh and blood of genius and the latter its beautifier; and he will neither require so many violent incidents another time, nor leave any that he retains without the reconciling graces which repay us for what we suffer.

We have scarcely room to say any thing of the performers, albeit they are great people now-a-days, and sometimes, we believe, insist upon giving the finishing hand to an author's scenes and conceptions,—which is one cause perhaps of so many damnations:—but in the critic's hands, at any rate, they must be content to take their station below dramatists. The part of Bellantira is well suited to the habitual tragic nature of Miss O'NEIL's style; and she was excellent in particular passages, particularly in those of sudden emotion. Her very best touches perhaps are those in which she deprecates and protests against any thing. Her No, no, no! for instance, is very natural, hurried, and absorbing; but she should take care how she uses it too often. Mr. YOUNG was very judicious as well as powerful in the Governor, especially in the sullen and gathered-up despondency of his latter moments in the dungeon. CHARLES KEMBLE is not at his best in a part that indulges him too much in frowning; but he always looks well, and in passages acts well. The most striking actor in the new piece is Mr. MACREADY, who has got rid of more of his tendency to declamation than we expected so soon, and gave the malignant villainy of Amurath its best because most quiet effect. We are very glad to see this proof of his better knowledge; for actors are too apt to be seduced by a notion of what tells, as the phrase is; whereas it is not what tells at the moment that is to be desired, but what tells in the long run. Mr. POPE's declamation tells,—but it is a very poor story; Mr. KEAN tells to some tune.

DRURY-LANE.

A musical opera, called the Lady of the Manor, with new music by the original composer, Mr. HOOK, was revived here on Thursday. We know not the author. It is something in the mediocre but mild and pastoral taste of the dramatic writings of BICKERSTAFF and Mrs. BROOKE. The story is that of two ladies, (Miss KELLY and Miss BYRNE), who disguise themselves to try the nature of two gentlemen. Miss KELLY performs her part with her usual address and meaning. The music, like the general run of this venerable composer's writings, is in some parts very pleasing, in others very common-place. The difference seems to depend upon whether he has the Italians or Vauxhall in his mind. We do not know which were the new or the old pieces. One of them, a song for several voices on Rural Hospitality, sets out with a delightful movement; but is Mr. HOOK the author of the Scotch air of Down the Burn, Davy, Love?

MARLOW's Jew of Malta was acted on Friday with great success. The reader is probably acquainted with this piece, in consequence of the great and laudable republication of our old poets by the better part of the lovers of black-letter. The story is that of a Jew, who having been oppressively treated by the leading Christians in Malta, has an outrageous hatred for the whole sect, and besides a multitude of indiscriminate murders which he sums up to a servant of his with great satisfaction, contrives that two lovers of his daughter, one of them the Governor's son, shall be killed by each others hand; strangles a friar who comes to tell him of his daughter's consequent death and to remonstrate with him; poisons a courtesan, a bully, and his own servant who had conspired with them against him, escapes from prison and delivers up Malta to the Turks, and in fine, turns every machination of his enemies upon their own heads, till the final scene, when having undertaken to betray the Turks to the Governor, and at an entertainment blow them up, the latter contrives that he shall be killed instead, in presence of the invited guests. The performance is said in the play-bills to be founded on MARLOW's tragedy; but we do not see the reason of this word; the tragedy is the old tragedy itself with only a few alterations in the nature of the Jew's crimes and catastrophe,—poison in wine being substituted for a poisoned flower (and we think not for the better) in the scene with the Courtesan, and Barabas being blown up or rather fetched down from a gallery with shots, instead of being tricked into a burning cauldron,—a piece of consideration certainly for our nerves, and extremely well managed.—Mr. KEAN's performance of the Jew is in his very best taste of self-hugging revenge and triumphant Machiavelism. He also delighted the audience with a song, somewhat too much in the manner of BRANHAM perhaps for an amateur, but very sweet and even scientific in the under tones and graces.

We find ourselves inclined to say so much on the subject of MARLOW and his prototype of SHAKESPEARE's finer flesh-and-blood Israelite, that we shall not trust our pen in its present narrow limits, but return to the subject next week, when we will also give an account of Amoroso, King of Little Britain, which an accident prevented us from seeing. Those in the mean time who are not acquainted with MARLOW may become so by referring to the Collections of the ancient British Drama, to some separate old plays lately published, and to that excellent work, LAMB's Specimens of English Dramatic Poets, where he will find one or two masterly critical paragraphs upon MARLOW's genius.* The possessors also of a new series of publications, entitled Select Early English Poets, by Mr. SINGER, to which we have long owed the tribute of our approbation, are gratified to find that they are to have the poem of Hero and Leander, the united production of MARLOW and CHAPMAN. We shall take opportunity of it to say a few words on this very elegant and desirable publication, especially on the part in it borne by our old, rugged, reverend friend CHAPMAN, who, if he has all the roughness, has also all the oracular majesty of an old oak of Dodona.

* Our readers will be glad to hear that the writings of Mr. LAMB, which contain so much profound criticism and sentiment, have been collected for publication by a spirited bookseller, and are now in the press.

FINE ARTS.

SPRING GARDENS EXHIBITION.

THE many Artists who have contributed to this Exhibition, have nearly stood still in talent for several seasons past. They have now, however, except a few, made a start into new excellence, and have rendered their this year's Exhibition more substantial than any former one. The condemnation of the critics formerly seems to have properly filipped their lagging emulation, and most beneficially to themselves and us, pinched the ear of their genius.—FIELDING, though indifferent in some pieces, such as 106, Caernarvon Castle, which is a sort of mixture of TURNER, CLAUDE, and himself, has many improved Landscapes. It is the same with CRISTALL, whose pencil has in many instances refined into true classical feeling, and a representation of the profound sequesterations of wild and of Arcadian views, notwithstanding his heavily touched foliage. Though ROBSON has much of mannerism, he has some elegant scenes, with highly agreeable and aerial perspectives. Mr. J. VARLEY too, is much mannered in colour, and especially in his touch; but he is still greatly improved in power, as is evident from 287, A Thunder Storm, which has a degree of grandeur in his accumulation of cloud, and in his buildings, and in the tempestuousness of wind, lightning, and rain.—Mr. DEWINT is, we think, more rich and vigorous than ever. Among other beautiful Landscapes, 265, A Landscape, which flashes with a rich variety of colour and light, so as to remind us, but without plagiarism, of RUBENS, and is a powerful contrast to the sober View of Jerveaux Abbey, most properly seen in shade which relieves from a placid light sky, both shade and sky inducing that still feeling so delightfully felt when all is calm and beautiful in nature. Mr. PROUT, too, is still more extended and more rich than in his last year's Landscapes. Mr. HOLMES has described with force and elaborate finishing the antipathy of the School-boy in Going to School, and 313, A Girl protecting her Chickens from a Hawk. Mr. LINNELL's View by Moonlight, 68, is good, though a little too distinct perhaps. In some of his other pieces his colouring is too yellow; but his Evening is a beautiful piece of nature. Mr. F. C. LEWIS's Scene on the River Dart, looks as if it was made up of bits of soap. Miss WALTON has improved in the delicacy and truth of her Flowers and Fruit. We prefer the lightness of effect in 154, Fruit and Flowers, to 153, Flowers.—Mr. KIDD has some rich effects of Dead Game; and Mr. HEWLETT some charming Fruit and Flowers. One hardly need mention with praise the universally admired Miniatures by Mr. A. ROBERTSON. The talent is considerable in those by Mr. C. J. ROBERTSON. Mr. UWINS has some elegant little Historical Drawings. Mr. BARRETT's Happy Valley has the embosomed retirement, verdure, and beautiful variety of object so well described in Rasselas. Messrs. VINCENT and STARK warm our admiration with their delicious sunny scenes in English Land-scape. Their pictures alone would elevate the character of this Exhibition, but when we add the Fighting Dogs getting wind, by our English SCHNEIDERS, young Mr. E. LANDSEER, and the masterly Drawings and Painting by Mr. HAYDON, we give overflowing evidence of the justness of our preference of this year's Exhibition. It behoves the Keeper of the Room to be careful now he admits any animals of the same species before the Fighting Dogs, when we recollect the exciting effect which a Mastiff by this young Animal Painter had last year upon a canine judge admitted into the room. We hope that E. LANDSEER will not deviate from his large touch into a littleness of style. His may be called the great style of Animal Painting, as far as it relates to the execution and colour; and the natural, as far as it concerns their portraiture. Did we see only the Dog's collar, we should know that it was produced by no common hand, so broad is it, and palpably true. But the gasping, and cavernous, and redly stained mouths, the flaming eyes, the prostrate Dog, and his antagonist standing exultingly over him, the inveterate rage that superior strength inflames but cannot subdue, with the broad and bright relief of the objects, give a wonder producing vitality to the canvass. Mr. HAYDON too—but Mr. HAYDON ought to have an article devoted to himself. This then we will shortly have the satisfaction of giving.

SIR J. F. LEICESTER'S GALLERY OF BRITISH PAINTINGS.

Independently of the pleasure produced by a consideration of the benefits which have and will be derived to British Art from the British Institution, constituted as it is of numerous individuals of influence and taste, we have hitherto never felt, in all our critical experience, so vivid a pleasure as that which has been produced by the opening of Sir J. LEICESTER's Gallery. Viewing the probable consequences of this circumstance, our pleasure warms into exultation. In it we see, that the vernal season of native genius, which commenced a short time before the Royal Academy, and further bloomed in the British Institution, is gradually maturing to a genial summer. For it is a self-evident truth, that as long as the highest honours and regards are almost exclusively bestowed on the great Artists who formerly existed, and whose works are only too highly appreciated when they are suffered to shut out our sensibilities to the opening attractions of the younger-born sons of genius in our own time and country, a blight is produced in the atmosphere of the Arts, which stunts their growth. Those, then, who do their utmost to foster the early genius of England in the Fine Arts,—for it is as late as the present reign that it has been but cradled in England,—deserve best of the rising family of Art and of their country. Among the first, if not the first, of this estimable description, is Sir JOHN FLEMING LEICESTER, a name that will ever reverberate in the hearts of the genuine lover of Art, as that of the first individual who has done it in the most effectual way, by appropriating a noble Gallery exclusively to its honour, and of opening it for a time to the community of taste. This, this is in the true spirit of ancient Greek patronage. It has all its cordiality and greatness. To the pecuniary remuneration of the Artist, it adds the more deserved and better reward of deference. It has, in fine, all the qualities of genuine patronage, for it is earnest in its regard, just in its object, comprehensively useful in its views and effects. It is at once a satire on Government, and its example, that Government which unconscientiously creates sinecures of thousands a-year for lazy, worthless courtiers and constitution-killers, but never expends a guinea in furtherance of British genius in Painting. It says to the wealthy Collector,—Come, we have done something for our Artists, but let us do more; let us do all we can! Let us not be lukewarm in a noble cause!—Let us not make unnecessary, invidious distinctions between our own Artists and the past ones of the Continent, and while we raise galleries and cabinets for past excellence, let us not neglect any longer to do the same for present! Our BARRYS, our REYNOLDSSES, our WESTS, our STOTHARDS, our HAYDONS, our WILKIES, our LAWRENCES, our TURNERS, &c. &c., will justify our determination, and if, as our venerable President has justly said, "the encouragement extended to the genius of a single Artist, though it may produce but one original work, adds more to the celebrity of a people, and is a higher proof of true patriotic ardour, and a love for the progress of Art, than all the collections that were ever made from the productions of other countries," what will not the encouragement thus extended to the aggregate genius of our Artists produce? What a noble effect will not such a new example have on our patrons—what a stimulating effect on our painters! An enlarged and enlightened patronage, not of the Government only, but of numerous individuals, was the main cause of the stupendous attainments of the French, Italian, and Greek Artists. It produces an ardent desire of fame, which operating against a love of ease, occasions that intensity of application, that rousing up of the dormant powers of the human mind, which results in greatness. It does not create genius, but it brings it into useful and glorious action. It is the solar principle of all that is great in intellect. It raised the irresistible impulse, the glowing spirit, that swept the terrific forms along the canvas of the impetuous MICHAEL ANGELO, and moved, with a more beautiful energy, the unequalled hand of RAFAEL.

The Gallery which is thus so exemplarily devoted to our Artists, has been open three days, and is to be further viewed on every successive Monday for some weeks longer. It is spacious, elegant, and most admirably lighted, for in every part the pictures are clearly and completely seen. It is complete for its purpose in convenience and beauty. The pictures are hung at proper distances so as not to interfere with the due effect of each, but rather recommend and set off each other, as you pass along them, by the variety of their styles, so that we have an undiminished enjoyment of the treat that is spread before us by REYNOLDS, WEST, GAINSBOROUGH, HOPNER, ROMNEY, LAWRENCE, TURNER, DEVIS, HOWARD, OWEN, CALLCOT, COLLINS, WARD, and many of our other Artists.

As a small but still as a suitable token of our esteem for their truly British Patron, we shall commence with 62, Portrait of Lady Leicester. It is one of Sir T. LAWRENCE's master-pieces, for though a Portrait, it embodies such a variety of imagination and feeling, in the personification of Hope as described by SPENSER in his Fairy Queen, that it belongs to Poetical as much as to Portrait Painting. While Sir THOMAS has accurately rendered the face and form of Lady Leicester, he has as closely followed the ideas and incidents in the following lines, so justly descriptive of Hope:—

"With him came Hope, in rank, a handsome maid,
Of cheerful look, and lovely to behold;
She always smil'd; and in her hand did hold
An holy water sprinkle, dipp'd in dew,
With which she sprinkled favours manifold
On whom she list, and did great liking shew—
Great liking unto many, but true love to few."

Cheerfulness, beauty, a graceful movement, and the expression of her favours, are here the circumstances which the Painter has translated with a delicate vivacity on his canvas: She seems — "To whisper promised pleasure,

And bid the lovely scenes at distance hail;
reassuring the desponding heart with the animating dew and smile of expectation. She is very properly represented as among dark clouds, which brighten as she advances. The Painter's invention shows itself also in the beautiful children which surround her, thus shadowing out the new born felicitations attendant on Hope. Two of them are eagerly soliciting her favour, one is warmly pressing her hand. Their foreshortenings, playful attitudes, and passionate expression, are auxiliaries to the interest and the poetic feelings which the main and lovely figure of Hope produces, but which of itself rivets our eyes and hearts to the canvass. It is a graphic translation of the amiable and animated Poet SPENSER, elegant as POPE, with more simplicity and more closeness to the text. The colour and the light are spread with a mild radiance eminently suited to the soft but cheerful ideas impressed by Hope. Grey light clouds softly blend into the dun and lowering ones, and give ample but not an untender relief to the figures, keeping up, together with the subdued yellow dress of the chief figure, and the delicate texture of the white muslin folded on one upper arm and gracefully carried round the waist, the soft but still impressive emotion that belongs to Hope. The lively refinement of feeling pervading this picture, would, were there no other in the Gallery, render it well worthy of being visited. The Painter's pencil has here been the wand of sensibility and grace.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Tuesday, April 21.

TEMPEST v. ORD; OR, TAYLOR v. THE COUNTESS OF ANTRIM AND OTHERS.

In this case it will be necessary to recapitulate the previous proceedings. The first application to the Court was on the part of the Countess of Antrim, who applied to have it referred to a Master, to know what settlements would be proper in a marriage between her daughter, Lady Frances Vane Tempest, a Ward of the Court, and Lord Stewart (brother of Lord Castlereagh). The next application was from Mrs. Taylor, wife of M. A. Taylor, Esq. the other Guardian of Lady Frances Vane Tempest, under the will of her father. The purpose of this application was, that the Countess of Antrim should be restrained from having communication with her daughter, except in the presence of her governess; because, without application to the Court, and without consent of Mrs. T., the Countess of Antrim had promoted a marriage between her daughter and Lord Stewart. As to the first application (of the Countess of Antrim) the Court had been of opinion, that it was irregular to refer any proposal of marriage to the Master, except on the application of the person making those proposals. As to the second application (that of Mrs. Taylor), the Countess of Antrim entered into an undertaking not to see her daughter, except in the manner above mentioned, until Lord Stewart's proposals should be decided on by the Court. Meantime, Lord Stewart, in his own behalf, had made an application to the Court to be allowed to have his proposals referred to a Master. He had made affidavits respecting the charges made against him in common with the Countess of Antrim—and Lady Antrim had also put in an affidavit respecting her own conduct.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY this day moved, on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, that Lady Antrim might be restrained from having any intercourse with her daughter during the litigation. The Learned Counsel read and commented upon the affidavits of the different parties, which were in substance as follows:—The affidavit of Mrs. Taylor stated, that in the spring of 1816, when Lady Frances Vane Tempest was 16 years old, the Countess of Antrim had endeavoured to bring about the union of her daughter with an Irish Nobleman, who came over to England for the purpose of being introduced to the young Lady. This negotiation was, however, broken off. On the 25th February last, Lady F. Vane Tempest was presented at the Queen's Drawing-room, and was conducted to her carriage by Lord Stewart, who did so, Mrs. Taylor believed, by desire of Lady Antrim. The day after the drawing-room, Mrs. Taylor heard a report that Lord Stewart was to be married to Lady Frances, and received an anonymous letter to that effect, which she communicated to Lady Frances and her Mother on the 5th March, when the latter denied that Lord Stewart had any such intentions. Mrs. Taylor received more anonymous letters to the same effect, and had besides a conversation at the theatre with a lady of high rank, in which the negotiation was alluded to by the lady, and Lord Stewart was termed by her "an agreeable Nobleman." Lady Antrim, however, treated all her apprehensions with indifference, until the 13th March, when Lord Stewart was invited to dine with Lady Antrim, in company with the Prince Regent. Lady Antrim then no longer professed ignorance of his Lordship's affection for her daughter. On the 6th and 8th of April, Lord Stewart met Lady Frances at her mother's house, and on the 9th, when, Mrs. Taylor believes, they were left alone together, he made her an offer, which she accepted without any previous consultation with her guardian: this was the substance of Mrs. Taylor's affidavit. It appeared from a letter of Lady Frances, that Lord Stewart, understanding that Lady Frances did not think it discreet to dine with him on the 13th of March, had kept away.—The affidavit of Lady Antrim alleged, that, until a few days previous to the 9th of April, she had no idea that Lord Stewart had any desire to marry her daughter; that on the 9th the whole matter was explained to her, and that on that day she gave her consent to the proposal. She had not authorised the interference of the lady of high rank, and did not know of the conversation. She had represented to her daughter, that, in her opinion, Lord Stewart was exalted in honour and reputation, and a fit match for any lady; and she did not believe in the personal objections which had been stated.—The statements of this affidavit were confirmed by other affidavits of Mr. McDonnell, Lady Antrim's husband, and of Lord Stewart. The latter stated that he had not, before the morning of the ninth of April, requested Lady Antrim to communicate his intentions to her daughter. Having now gone through the circumstances of the case, the Learned Counsel called upon the Court to protect a young Lady from precipitately entering into a marriage upon which the happiness of her life depended. The objections of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor to the match were, a want of sufficient fortune, and certain personal considerations.

Mr. HUNT said, that the present motion was wholly unnecessary, as Lady Antrim had consented not to communicate with her daughter. He could not conceive upon what ground it could be contended that Lady Antrim had used undue influence over her. Lady Frances had been left to decide for herself, and her mother had merely expressed her opinion upon the merits of a man whom she had known and respected for many years, who had gained so many honours abroad, and who was so much beloved at home. With respect to the insinuation that, in 1816, Lady Antrim had endeavoured to induce some Nobleman to contract a marriage with her daughter, it was irrelevant to the matter at issue. He hoped his Lordship would dismiss the case, by sending it to the Master, the fittest person to discuss the question as to the propriety of the marriage.

The further hearing was postponed sine die, the Lord Chancellor being unable to fix a day.—Lord Stewart, who, it is said, is countenanced in this affair by the Regent, is the Officer who gave the following toast at a public dinner in Ireland,—"The best Cavalry Officer in Europe,—the Regent."

Friday, April 24.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL this day addressed the Chancellor in favour of Lord Stewart. He complained of the gross accusations against his Lordship, founded on anonymous letters sent to Mrs. Taylor. Mrs. Taylor's affidavit stated that she could not think Lord Stewart a fit match for her niece, Lady Frances Vane Tempest; that his Lordship was 40 years of age, and youngest son of an Irish Nobleman; that she verily believed his Lordship was now in embarrassed circumstances; that his habits were dissipated and irregular, and that there were circumstances in the family which raised a decided objection to the proposed union. These were broad assertions, said his Counsel, made with what foundation the Court would presently see. First then, the fortune was stated as insufficient: but how was this assertion met by the affidavit put it by Lord Stewart himself? As a Lord of the King's Bedchamber, and by filling two other offices, he received the annual salary of 3,700*l*. As Ambassador at Vienna, he received 12,000*l* a year. He was also tenant for life, in possession, of certain landed property in Londonderry, from which he received an annual sum of 2,000*l*. On his father's death, and that of Lord Castlereagh, without issue, then he would be tenant for life in no less than 8,000*l* a year; besides this, his Lordship possessed personal property to the value of 26,000*l*, exceeding his debts, which were merely his current expenses. Was it probable, he would then ask, that a Nobleman possessing this large fortune, of between 18 and 20,000*l* a year, should be induced to pay his addresses to a young lady merely from lucrative motives? That his Lordship was not in embarrassed circumstances was, he believed, tolerably certain, when he had positively sworn that he was not in debt, and possessed this large amount in personal property. Of the same unfounded nature was the next most gross and indelicate imputation, that his Lordship "was a man whose habits were dissipated and irregular." These assertions were no less indelicate than groundless. The next circumstance alluded to in Mrs. Taylor's affidavit, "that there were circumstances existing in the family of the Nobleman which raised a decided objection to the proposed union," was one noticed also in the letter of the young lady herself. He should not descend into particulars upon that head, from a sense of delicacy; but he thought it due to Lord Stewart to state, that that was not an objection to his Lordship personally; but those circumstances were supposed to exist in the family of the Noble Lord, for which suppositions, however, there was not the slightest foundation.—The Learned Counsel then went into a variety of statements respecting Lord Stewart's addresses to Lady Frances. His Lordship positively denied the existence of any plan between himself and Lady Antrim, so as to prevent any other person from becoming acquainted with Lady Frances; and his Lordship asserted that he never had been privy to any communications which might have been made to Mrs. Taylor by a lady of high rank or other persons. His Lordship was now 38 years of age: he was introduced into the company of Lady Frances, at certain public places, prior to the 13th of March, 1818, and never saw her but on one occasion out of company. Attracted by her peculiar character of mind and by her excellent qualities, he had conceived an attachment for her, and on 9th April last had accomplished his wishes by obtaining the lady's consent. Upon the whole consideration of the case, therefore, he saw nothing dishonourable to his Lordship: during the whole transaction there was nothing reprehensible, nothing which could impeach either his honour or his character as a gentleman. He conceived that there was not the slightest pretext for saying that the matter should not go before the Master, and with these observations he left the case in the hands of the Court, conscious that nothing but strict justice would be done to all parties.

Sir A. PIGOTT and Mr. HORNE, as Counsel also on the part of Lord Stewart, made speeches in favour of the claim of his Lordship.

Sir S. ROMILLY replied. He said, that Lady Frances had had no opportunity of seeing the world; she had as it were been tied to this Nobleman, and the parent was endeavouring to hurry the marriage, to the prejudice of the future welfare of this interesting young lady. The question required the most mature consideration. In the hands of the Court the young lady was safe. He wished his Lordship to consider Lady Frances as his own child. His Lordship had not such ambitious views as the young lady's family appeared to have: they seem to be dazzled themselves with the splendour of Lord Stewart's titles, and ridiculously thought that they would necessarily contribute to the happiness of Lady Frances. If the Court was of opinion that an order should be made for a reference to the Master, he hoped that the Master would be instructed first to inquire whether the marriage be approved of, reserving the question of settlement for a future consideration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—With respect to this case, I think it requires consideration. I do not see that there is a possibility of my being able to give judgment before Tuesday next. I think I should see the young lady in the mean time, and I think that will be the earliest day upon which I can give judgment. If, however, I have an opportunity of seeing Lady Frances between this day and Monday next, and the parties are very anxious to have my opinion on the case, I will endeavour to come here on Monday morning at nine o'clock for that purpose.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Monday, April 20.

ASHFORD v. THORNTON.

This case was finally decided this morning, and, as might be expected, great interest was excited to learn the result. Thornton and Ashford appeared at an early hour, as heretofore.

Mr. GURNEY—"Your Lordships having appointed this day for the parties in this plea, to consider whether judgment should be prayed, or that defendant be suffered to go at large without a day, I have now to state to the Court that I have no prayer to make."

Mr. READER—"On the part of the Appellee, I have to move your Lordships that he be discharged from this plea without a day."

Mr. Justice BAYLEY—"The course, I believe, is, that the Appellee cannot be discharged until he be first arraigned by the Crown."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL having appeared, he was asked by the Court if he was aware of the trial, and if he admitted the acquittal of Abraham Thornton for the murder of Mary Ashford.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL—"My Lords, I admit the acquittal." Lord ELLENBOROUGH—"The judgment of the Court then is, that the defendant be discharged from this plea, and that he be suffered to go at large without a day."

Upon the judgment being pronounced, there was a considerable sensation excited; and upon Thornton's removal from the Court, an immense crowd had collected, evidently for the purpose of expressing their displeasure towards him. The sensation, in fact, became a ferment, and it was found necessary to convey him out by a private way.

Tuesday, April 21.

ARTICLES OF THE PEACE.

Mrs. Ann Cori exhibited articles of the peace against her husband, Mr. Thomas Cori, on the ground that her life was in danger from the brutality of his conduct. The parties lived in Mile-end, Mr. Cori being the Captain of a ship trading to Barbadoes; and it appeared that he had frequently used personal violence towards the exhibitant.—Mrs. Cori was dressed in a splendid crimson pelisse, and a very large lace veil descending far below her waist. She took the usual oath that she did not exhibit the articles against her husband from malice or ill-will, but from the fear lest he should do her some bodily harm.—The Court ordered that the articles should be registered in the ordinary form.

SHERIFFS' COURT, BEDFORD-ROW.

Wednesday, April 22.

CRIM. CON.—FRAZER v. BRITTLEBANK.

This was a proceeding instituted to assess damages in the case of Simon Frazer, Esq. against W. Brittlebank, Esq. for criminal conversation with Susan, his wife. The defendant had suffered judgment to go by default, and the damages were laid at 10,000*l*.

Mr. Serjeant BEST addressed the Jury. Mr. Frazer, he said, was a gentleman who had enjoyed an estate of considerable value in the island of Berbice. He was 36 years of age, or upwards, and about 17 years ago had married the daughter of the Governor of Berbice. The defendant was also a resident of Berbice. The plaintiff and his wife up to 1813 lived in the island in a state of perfect happiness. One son and three daughters were the fruits of their union. The plaintiff, during his residence at Berbice, had unfortunately entered into a speculation with a gentleman named Robinson, which failed, and in the year 1815 he returned with his wife to England. The defendant, who had previously been on terms of close intimacy with the plaintiff, was now selected as his most sacred friend, and it was determined upon that he should undertake the management of the property which the plaintiff had left behind. Such were the circumstances of embarrassment in which the plaintiff was placed, that while he endeavoured to procure a situation, his wife went on a visit to Scotland. Soon after her absence he determined upon a voyage to India. Just, however, as he was about to sail, he was arrested. His wife without delay flew from Scotland to join him in his disappointments. They lived after this for some time in London, and at length matters were settled, and his Indian voyage again determined upon. Mrs. Frazer, it was arranged, was to go out to Berbice, taking with her one of the children, and leaving the others to the care of a relative. The plaintiff pursued his voyage to India, and soon after his arrival, was appointed to a high situation in Batavia. In confirmation of the strong feelings evinced by Mrs. Frazer towards her husband, Mr. B. produced letters; the second, dated from Berbice, 17th October, 1815, was in this strain:—

"My ever dearest Simon,—I have written twice since my arrival, and have now to inform you that I have been again attacked with my customary illness, and have, as before, had recourse to salivation. I am now, however, thank God, recovering my old stock of health, but have passed many melancholy weeks for want of the presence of my ever darling Simon. You may, however, judge of my ecstasy and surprise, in receiving your letter by the last packet, which informed me of your safe arrival and good health in India. Your dear little Adriana is my only comfort here; she is the picture of her father, and the admiration of all who behold her. She is, in fact, the sweetest little creature that e'er God made, and was certainly sent from Heaven to bind us in our loves, and comfort us in our afflictions! She sends you a lock of her beautiful hair and a million of kisses."

Such was the woman, however, who was made the victim of base destruction by the defendant; by him, who having intrusted to him the management of his dearest friend's interests, took advantage of his pecuniary embarrassments, and violated his wife.

Several witnesses proved the affection of the man and wife, and after a speech from Mr. Gurney, the Jury gave 1,250*l*. damages.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

EXECUTION.—John Ward and Harriet Skelton, convicted of uttering forged Bank of England notes, were on Friday morning executed at the debtors' door, Old Bailey. The case of Harriet Skelton was a subject of deep and general interest. The Duke of Gloucester visited Newgate on Wednesday, and had a long interview with the two unfortunate culprits. His Royal Highness conversed with Harriet Skelton for nearly an hour, learnt the particulars of her life, and all the circumstances of the case which led to her wretched fate. After shaking hands with her in the most cordial manner, he departed, for the purpose of waiting upon the principal officers of the Bank of England, with whom having had an interview, he instantly repaired (as we understand) to the seat of Royalty itself. Mercy, however, was not extended towards them. From the moment of their fate being announced, each of the parties evinced much resignation. Harriet Skelton distinctly avowed her guilt, but asserted that she was entrapped into the crime by a near relative, who has escaped. She vindicated herself from the opprobrium that had been cast upon her former life, and declared in the most solemn manner, that she had been engaged but five weeks in the traffic of passing forged notes. Several distinguished characters, among whom were Lord Rocksavage, Mr. Bennet, and others, most deeply interested themselves in her behalf; and some of them having investigated her previous character, found it undeserving of that heavy reproach which had been cast upon it. On Thursday morning, the Reverend Mr. Cotton attempted to administer the sacrament to the unhappy convicts, but found it impossible, the woman having been seized with hysterics, and Ward having also swooned away. In the evening, however, they became each composed, and had the sacrament administered separately in their cells. The parties were attended up to a late hour on Thursday night, by several religious friends, after which Ward retired, and had considerable rest. Harriet Skelton slept but little. Upon being brought forth on Friday morning, they appeared resigned, and both parties expressed the fullest confidence in their hope of mercy in a better world. Ward exhibited the utmost fortitude, as did the female culprit, until her approach to the scaffold. Here the poor creature was supported by three or four persons, until a few moments before her fall. Ward, who was first introduced, embraced her on the scaffold, and both having prayed fervently for a few moments, they were launched into eternity.

BIRTHS.

Friday morning was safely delivered the wife of T. Holdsworth, R.N. of Dartmouth-street, Westminster, of two boys and a girl, and they are all doing well.

MARRIAGES.

On the 20th inst. at Heckfield, Capt. Charles Clyde, R.N. to Mary, daughter of the Rev. Wm. Milton, Vicar of Heckfield.

On the 9th inst. at Preston, Richard Atkinson, jun. Esq. of Castle Park, Lancaster, to Frances, second daughter of Nicholas Grimshaw, Esq.

On Friday, at St. Olave's, Thomas Morgan, Esq. Savage-gardens, to Elizabeth, daughter of the late John Augustus Bonney, Esq. Percy-street.

DEATHS.

At Freeland, in Kent, in the 76th year of her age, Mrs. Moore, relict of the late Archbishop of Canterbury.

On the 15th inst. at Garrendon Park, Leicester, the Rev. William March Phillipps.

On Monday, at Wimpole, the Rev. Thomas Sheepshanks, A.M., Rector of that place.

On the 17th inst. at Grove, Nottinghamshire, the Rev. John Hardolph Eyre.

On Saturday week, Anne Maria, youngest daughter of Sir Robert Kingsmill, Bart. of Sidmonton, Hants.

DEBATE ON THE EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN MANUFACTORIES.

We shall occupy the beginning of our present number with a few cursory notes on an interesting debate that took place in the House of Commons on Monday, respecting that outrageous employment of children, of which so much has been said in our paper. The debate is important in more respects than one, and not the least so in exhibiting what in itself is exceedingly unimportant,—the extraordinary futility of the arguments which Members of the Honourable House are in the habit of bringing forth. The shallowness of the reasoning into which they get, and the self-satisfied air of power with which they splash it's little stagnancies about, are indeed remarkable specimens of what the people are obliged to contemplate on these occasions. In one point of view, it is as if the Romans had been assembled to witness a paper-boat naumachia, or to be ridden down by the hopeful sons of their future emperors, looking grand upon ponies. In another,—but we will not illustrate by a pleasantry the rising aristocracy encouraging the sordid tyrannies of a set of money-getters.

The first blessed logician whom we encounter on this occasion is my Lord STANLEY. His Lordship, after setting out with saying that things were better than they used to be in Cotton Manufactories (as if that were any proof of their not being very bad still) kindly overturns his next argument for us himself, though it is not worth the trouble. He says,—“Had the present measure been limited in its operation to apprenticeships—did it not interfere with free labour, and with the children of free labourers, he should not have felt it his duty to oppose it. Was there a single precedent in the history of the manufacturers or trade of the country, to justify such a principle of interference? He did not mean to say, that the Legislature of the country had not a right to prohibit the pursuit of any trade that was radically injurious to the health and morals of the people.”—Why this is the whole question!—His Lordship proceeds:—“This was no new trade. But what remedy did the present Bill apply? It applied a minimum of age, and fixed hours for working.” Well, what then? The reader can see nothing astonishing in this. His Lordship might as well raise his eyebrows and extend his hands, and say,—“This was no new wound; but what remedy did the present surgeon apply? He applied a plaister, and fixed hours for resting.” Does his Lordship mean to say that there is to be no minimum (as this blinking arithmetical pedantry calls it) of age, and that any age may be made to work for any length of time? There is certainly no answering such arguments as these in one sense of the word;—they can only be parodied.—“With respect to the minimum of age, the fact was, that manufacturers never did wish to employ children very young. It was at the desire of their parents, that the children were employed; they worked under the eye of their parents, until gradually they obtained such a dexterity as afforded them more advantageous salaries. The effect of the adoption of the minimum would be, that parents would be deprived of this addition which the industry of their children produced. Would such a diminution of wages not disqualify them from attending to the comforts and morals of the people? He feared also that the measure now proposed was calculated to create great disunion between the master and his labourer—between the child and his parent. These were interests not to be interfered with on slight prospects of advantage.” Were there ever such beggings of a question as these? What is meant by “very young,” is not said. Very young children may be old enough to perform their part in the business, or the public know enough of the master manufacturers to know that those extremely considerate gentry would not employ them. But it is “at the desire of the parents,” and parents would be deprived of their additional profit,—and there would be disunion among all parties! Yes; the whole of the secret is this:—a miserable grasping system, both in political power and in money-getting, has excited the powerful and the money-getting to get all they can at any expense but that of their own authorities and pockets;—this drives the natural inequalities of society to all unjust and dreadful extremes; there are extremely powerful people, extremely rich people, and extremely poor people; the last must get their bread at any rate, even, it is supposed, by the sacrifice of their children to the Moloch of avarice; and so because avarice will not alter, the artificial necessities of poverty must be tortured into arguments for their own continuance; while the Aristocracy, partly from it's anti-popular love of power, and partly from fright lest this very injustice should madden the people, stands by, and in the very midst of it's opposition to an improvement of the system, pretends to sympathize with the small and degraded voices that are occasioned by its inhumanity. The whole of the Noble Lord's speech, and of the speeches of those who agreed with him, as we shall see presently, went upon these enormous assumptions, though of course they were not acknowledged. Look, for instance, at another strange passage:—“The present Bill, while it professed to benefit the health of children, deprived them of that support by which alone their health could be maintained; and while it professed to allow them time for education, deprived them of the means of obtaining education.” That is to say,—“The money-getters, who realize enormous fortunes, will not pay as much for less work;—the money-getting system will not leave the poor to more healthy employments; there must be so much wealth for the employers, and so much galley-slaving for the employed; the children must work just as their masters require and their poor wretched parents are tempted to agree to, or they can get money neither for food nor education;”—in other words, "You say the children are unhealthy; but if they are not to be unhealthy from too much work, they must be so from too little food:—you say also they have no time for education; but if they have no time for it now after their 14 hours work, they can have no money for it with less." Such are the alternatives to which avarice drives its victims, and such are the arguments with which power defends it!

The next logician is my Lord LASCELLES. This noble person sets out with begging the question, as usual, in favour of the money-graspers. "Those," he tells us, "who have embarked capital in any branch of trade, were bound to look about them to see what was coming after." Very good; but this is not all they are bound to look after, though they seem to think so. They are bound to see that the crew do not sicken and rot during the voyage: they are bound to see that the crew are not overworked and given such little food, as to be obliged to have their own children overworked also; they are bound to see that these children are not put to unnatural employments, and made pale, squalid, and melancholy, in order to earn the owners a superfluous wealth; in short, they are bound to see that the many are not sacrificed in the most scandalous manner to the few. But, says this Noble Senator, "If the effect of the Bill would be to prevent the employment of children under 16, then these children would be thrown on their parents, and ultimately on the parish. It was nonsense to say, that if the children were not employed in factories they would be employed in education—they would, in most cases, remain in a state of idleness."—Idleness! Another pleasant mode of begging the question, and making words mean what one pleases. Idleness, we suppose, is running about the fields and in the fresh air, gathering flowers in this month of May, playing trap and ball,—in short, getting health, and strength, and a proper growth, as children do who run about idly in parks and have horses instead of a stray donkey to ride on. Oh but these are children of the privileged orders. Privileged! Be it so; but if childhood is not privileged also,—if the common demands of humanity are not privileged,—if a young human creature is not at least privileged to have his health and ruddiness, cheerfulness, and proper growth, in order to fit him for manhood, then there is no such thing as privilege, and least of all is there or ought there to be an artificial privilege for the few to dispense with the natural privileges of the many. We do not attribute this part of the argument to Lord LASCELLES; but it has been insinuated in the course of the question, and we very sincerely warn those who use it what they are about. It is one of the results of sickly temperament in certain stages of society to be extremely subtle and enquiring, especially in matters that concern human nature and its condition; and artificial privileges, especially when thrust, by those who enjoy every other also, in the teeth of those who are not even left in possession of the common privileges of humanity, are the most provoking weapons in the world, and the most likely to be snatched away and turned against those who use them. To have done with Lord LASCELLES,—who to say the truth argues in a sorrier manner than even his noble precursor, what do our readers think of the following "edge-tools," which his Lordship draws forth in behalf of the manufacturers?—"If he had thought this measure originated with the Hon. Baronet (Sir R. PEEL), he should have considered it entitled to a very different share of attention; but the fact was, it did not originate with him—it originated with a person well known from the public prints. One of the projects of this individual was the rendering Cotton Factories a perfect school of morals and education; and it was his opinion, that by reducing the number of hours, you increased the quantity of work done—an opinion which he could not well understand. He could not help thinking that the measure originated with Mr. OWEN; and that the first Committee and subsequent measure were got up by him."—And suppose it did originate with Mr. OWEN,—we are sorry to use two such unceremonious monosyllables,—but again we must say, what then? Why should an argument be less attended to, if it is a good one, because Sir ROBERT PEEL only approved it, but it originated with another well known person? With a person well known too for his knowledge and humanity; and with a person, it should have been added, who is himself a manufacturer! As to the unintelligible nature of Mr. OWEN's opinion, "that by reducing the number of hours, you increased the quantity of work done," we will give a lift to his Lordship's understanding towards reaching it. My Lord LASCELLES talks two hours for instance, and makes little or no way with an argument;—Mr. OWEN talks one, and makes a good deal;—the reason is, that somehow or other, Mr. OWEN's understanding has been made stronger.

The arguments of such of the Cotton Manufacturers as are Members of the House themselves, are only worse than these inasmuch as for an obvious reason they are still more revolting. One of these persons, a Mr. PHILLIPS, tells us with a contented air of triumph that "the number of children employed in Mills, who attended Sunday Schools at Manchester, was equal to that of other children; that their morals were as good, and it would have been strange if habits of order, industry, and regularity had produced immorality."—Strange enough; but not at all strange if habits of order without justice, of industry without relief, and of regularity without cheerfulness or without any thing but a sense of being sacrificed to the selfishness of others, should produce bitterness and wretchedness, a doubt of human goodness, and an ultimate contempt for order itself. A mill-horse, that is flogged seven times a minute, may have habits of order, industry, and regularity; and with all these he may be a very miserable being, and his master worse. Then as to the health of the children, "If the House," says Mr. PHILLIPS, "instead of looking to opinions without any facts stated in support of them, looked to the facts themselves, and to opinions founded on an examination of them, they would find that the statements respecting their health were as devoid of truth, as those respecting their education and morals. In the Manchester House of Recovery, the patients who had been employed in Cotton Mills were as one to twelve to those engaged in other occupations. In the Infirmary, in Feb. 1817, the patients who had been employed in Cotton Mills were as one to six to others. In March 1818, the in-patients who had been employed in Cotton Mills were as one to 11, the out-patients as one to five or six to those who had been otherwise employed. The Hon. Member also quoted the evidence of Dr. BORDSLEY, Dr. SYMONDS, and Dr. HARDY, in support of the opinion that the children were healthy. Mr. RANSOM, an eminent Surgeon, said, that from 13 years observation in the Manchester Infirmary, he found the children who had been employed in Cotton Mills much less"—What does the reader think?—less unhealthy, generally speaking, than certain other children?—no, but "less subject," only less subject, observe, "to glandular swellings, scrophula, and white swellings," than—whom?—"than the weavers!" "Here be proofs!" Good God! What have children in a beautiful and fertile country like England to do with glandular swellings and white swellings? The Hospitals, Infirmarys, and Workhouse are not the places to shew how many children have grown up with that sickness of temperament which generally speaking is worse than any particular disease,—still less are they the places to shew how many children have died. What say the Bills of Mortality?—Oh, says Mr. FINLAY, another manufacturing Member of Parliament,—the deaths in my Cotton Mill at Glasgow are not a fourth part so many as those in the heakiest out-of-door spots in England!—The reader will think we are joking; but in pure weariness of such overwhelming arguments and assertions, we shall finish our paper with an extract from the speech of Mr. PERL, whose exertions in favour of common decency and humanity on this occasion do equal honour to his understanding and feelings. The way in which he turned round upon this betwitching evidence of Mr. FINLAY'S, was exceedingly happy. "To the evidence," said he, "which he had adduced, what was offered in reply? Counter-evidence, which if it proved any thing, proved that Cotton Factories were the most favoured spots on the earth.—There was a Cotton Mill of an Hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. FINLAY), in which 873 persons were employed in 1811, among them were only three deaths; in 1812 there were 891, among whom there were two deaths; and in 1813, 879, among whom were two deaths. When this statement was shown to Sir GILBERT BLANE, he expressed his surprise and observed, that if the fact were not stated by respectable persons, he should not believe it; and being asked why he distrusted it, he said, that the average number of deaths in England and Wales were one in 50 (in 1801 there had been one in 44). There were favoured spots certainly, Cardigan, in which the deaths were as one in 74; Monmouth, in which they were one in 68; Cornwall, one in 62; and Gloucester one in 61; yet in the Cotton Factories they were stated to be as one in 445! There was a Poem of THOS. WARTON'S which probably many Gentlemen would recollect, in which he invoked the Goddess of Health—

"Within what fountain's craggy cell,
"Delights the Goddess Health to dwell,"

And then very poetically described the different spots in which it might be supposed she would be found—the "tufted rocks" and "fringed declivities" of Matlock—the springs of Bath and Buxton—in all these places she rests—

"the dim retreat,
"Where the coy nymph has fixed her favourite seat."

But what would have been the surprise of the Poet, if he had been informed that this dim retreat was the Cotton Mill of Messrs. FINLAY and Co. at Glasgow (a laugh)? Not only that a Cotton Mill was more healthy than the favoured spots he had described, but that they were at least six times as healthy. This was the sort of evidence which had been brought to disprove the evidence of disinterested persons, of medical men, and even of persons who had an interest opposed to the measure before the House."

The reader will think that nothing can go beyond this: and yet Mr. FINLAY, at the close of the debate, contrived to give a practical illustration of the modest, patient, and self-knowing feelings of these possessors of the Cotton Paradise upon earth, which is a climax to all that went before. The thing wants nothing but plain copying from the debates:—

"Mr. FINLAY protested against any farther proceeding upon the Bill this night, after having been occupied in the discussion for so many hours, and expressed his resolution to avail himself of the forms of the House to give the Bill every obstruction in his power."

"Mr. LAMBTON observed, that the objection as to discussion for a few hours came with a very ill grace from those who were so indifferent about the laborious occupation of children for so many hours each day." (Hear, hear!)

Every corner of every Cotton Mill in the land, into which a newspaper can enter, will echo this Hear, hear! with it's hollow voices.

The House is to resume the subject.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

Sitting of the 25th of April.—At one o'clock the sitting commenced, under the presidency of M. de Serre.

The Duke of RICHELIEU—"At the commencement of your Session the King caused us to apprise you of the hopes he entertained of diminishing the charges that press upon our country, and of effecting the evacuation of our territory. We now present ourselves, to communicate to you the results of certain negotiations already terminated, and to demand of you the means of concluding those which will take place, we dare flatter ourselves, before you again assemble in this Chamber. In signing the treaty of the 30th May, 1814, the Contracting Powers reciprocally renounced the whole of the sums due to them; but in making this surrender of their own rights, the governments were bound to consecrate those of individuals. Special articles declared their guarantee. France formally engaged to pay the sums due by her out of her own territory, to individuals or foreign establishments, in virtue of contracts or formal engagements. Measures necessary for the performance of an obligation which France had imposed upon herself were in course of adoption, when the melancholy events of 1815 came to destroy all the hopes of repose and prosperity which we had been permitted previously to conceive. I shall not, Gentlemen, retrace to you those sad remembrances, still too present to your memories; but let me be permitted to say, the idea alone of mitigating them has sustained us in the painful task which it perhaps at that time required some courage and some devotion to undertake. Since that time the hope of lessening our calamities composed our whole force, and occupied all our reflections. After the disastrous epoch to which I have referred, France found herself under the weight of two sorts of charges. One relating to the debts contracted at different periods towards the subjects of foreign Governments; the other gave us the Government themselves for creditors. The former, those which have been the object of the negotiation which has been terminated, have had for their object, as you are aware, not as some people affect to believe, to procure indemnities to the inhabitants of the countries ravaged by the war, and still less to grant any to the Governments of those countries; but to assure the payment to debts contracted by virtue of positive acts of the government and legal obligations. Policy may change the relations of different countries, but individuals ought not to suffer by these changes. The two convey tions of the 20th of November, 1815, relative, the one to the subjects of the Continental Powers, the other to those of Great Britain, could only determine with more precision the applications of this principle, and regulate the forms of the liquidation, in applying to the payment of debts of this nature a capital of 7,000,000 of rentes. These conventions stipulated, that, in case of any deficiency, the French Government will be bound to provide for it. It was in pursuance of this, that the law of the 23d of Dec. 1815, created a supplementary provision of 2,000,000 of rentes. A year had been granted for the presentation of claims. It expired on the 28th of February, 1817. It was not until after the expiration of this term, and when the whole amount of the claims had been ascertained, that the French Government could discover that they formed such a mass, that in applying strictly to their liquidation the rules prescribed by the Convention of the 20th of November, the amount would far exceed the capital assigned for their reimbursement, and that a considerable deficit would still remain to be covered. This deficit would have formed an immense debt. If it had been impossible to calculate it, and to refuse beforehand to satisfy it, it was a duty to represent it as evidently exceeding the provision of the treaty of 1815, and the strength of France. This duty the King's Ministers hastened to perform, by apprising foreign Courts of the unexpected results which had been thus revealed. A negotiation was opened for representing to foreign Governments the situation in which France was placed by this stipulation, made in good faith, and in the interest of every people. The King spoke to them in the language of confidence and frankness; he addressed himself to Sovereigns worthy of hearing him. I would it were possible, gentlemen, to inform you of all the difficulties inseparable from such a negotiation, unexampled perhaps in the annals of politics. It was necessary to contend, not against general views, not against political combinations, but against the prejudices, frequently exaggerated, of a multitude of creditors solemnly invited to make good their claims, and who, from every part of Europe, pressed their own Governments to abandon none of them, and denied, as I may say, the right of disputing their claims. These obstacles, of a nature hitherto unknown, would have been perhaps insurmountable, were it not for the sentiments of equity which animated the Ministers appointed to examine and maintain the interests of the people, and the impartiality and moderation of the illustrious Mediator, whom the confidence of Europe had invited to preside over this important negotiation. It has been at length terminated. New Conventions with all the States which had been parties to that of the 20th of November, 1815, have definitively regulated the debts of France towards their subjects, and the means of liberation. His Majesty has commanded us to communicate to you the result, until he can lay before you the acts themselves, when they shall have obtained the necessary sanction to permit the publication of their tenour. One of these treaties concerns the Continental Powers. The amount which France has to furnish for liquidating her remaining debt towards their subjects, is definitively fixed at 12,040,000 fr. of rentes. By a particular arrangement with Spain, 1,000,000 is especially set apart for what is due to that power, by virtue of an additional article of the treaty concluded with her in 1814; but as this article is reciprocal, and applicable to the French creditors of Spain as well as to the Spanish creditors of France, it has been stipulated that the funds to defray this portion of our debts should remain in deposit, until the Spanish Government shall have, according to the bases and principles of the treaty, satisfied the just claims of the French. A separate convention, which has been concluded with England, to guarantee the execution of the additional article of the treaty of the 30th of May, 1814, and of the Special Convention of the 20th of November, 1815, fixes at 3,000,000 fr. of rentes the definitive completion of the funds, of which the payment has been stipulated in the 4th article of the convention, relative to the liquidation of the debts due to the subjects of His Britannic Majesty. Thus, gentlemen, the arrangements that have been concluded, impose on us the obligation of creating 16,040,000 fr. of rentes. His Majesty has commanded us to present the law for inscribing them upon the Great Book. By this, Gentlemen, will be finally closed that abyss of which, in 1815, it was impossible to measure the depth, and which threatened to swallow up the public fortune. It is doubtless distressing to us to present you with a charge so burdensome as a great consolation. More than once in the course of our efforts have we been penetrated with profound grief, in considering the burden our country would have to bear, even when we should have obtained all that we demanded. But now we have the consolation of thinking that we have neglected nothing to diminish it, and thence we lessen our resolution to bear the responsibility of submitting the treaty for the consent of the King. To appreciate the result of our efforts, it is necessary calmly to direct your attention towards the past, and to consider all the consequences of the disastrous system which had accumulated on France charges so exorbitant. The mass of claims presented amounted to 1,600,000,000 of francs; of this mass about 180,000,000 have been transferred to the fund of credit, created by the law of the 28th of April, 1815. About 30,000,000 have been declared inadmissible; and there remained 1,390,000,000 to be liquidated. Of whatever reduction this sum might be considered susceptible by a liquidation conformable to the regulations traced in the Convention of the 20th of November, it is impossible to believe that it would have remained at the amount of the capital represented by the rentes of 17,040,000 fr., which we now require you to create. To secure the exact payment of the sums destined to acquit our debts, it has been determined that the liquidation should be continued by the Powers themselves towards their own subjects. France will no further interfere in this labour than in giving the means proper for facilitating it. The epoch is now arrived in which France is to receive the price of her courageous resignation. Holding these treaties, of which she has fulfilled the most rigorous conditions, she will not demand in vain from Europe to fulfil, in its turn, those which are favourable to her. The treaty of the 20th November contains these words:—“The military occupation of France may terminate at the end of three years.” This term approaches, and every French heart thrills with the hope of no longer seeing on the soil of the country any other banners floating than those of France. The Sovereigns are going to assemble to pronounce upon this great question, which contains the destinies of Europe. These are no longer those conferences of Kings which history has so often traced as a melancholy prelude of the concert of strength against weakness. This august union will open under other auspices. Justice will preside there. The sentiments already manifested by the rulers of nations proclaim beforehand their decision. They will yield to the wish of the King, to that wish, which, after the example of his august family, all France repeats every day with an unanimous voice. They have already heard it, and know that the conditions of which you are going to vote the accomplishment are not the only ones which we have filled with a scrupulous exactness. In fact, the most perfect tranquillity reigns throughout France; our institutions develop themselves; they increase in strength with so much the more rapidity, as, at epochs so active as ours, days possess the importance of years. The charter, open to all parties, receives them; not to be invaded by them, but that they may unite, and lose themselves in its bosom. If they have appeared to revive for a moment, the wise firmness of the King has instantly disarmed them, and this experience has been for Europe, as for us, an evident demonstration of their impotence. Last year, of all calamities, that the most calculated to agitate a nation was cruelly felt. If amidst these circumstances the legitimate monarchy has already acquired so much strength and solidity, and displayed so much power, what can it fear for the future? and with what alarms can France, free under the beneficent sceptre of her King, inspire Europe? But that this favourable disposition of treaties may be carried into effect without obstacles, it is fit, gentlemen, to provide for the discharge of what will be still due upon the 700,000,000 which we must pay, according to the 4th article of the treaty of the 20th of November. The King confides in your zeal to put him in a state of approaching the term of the entire liberation of France. His Majesty has charged us, in consequence, to demand of you an eventual credit of 24,000,000 of rentes. Let this credit be eventual, because the employment of it will be subordinate to the event which alone can render it necessary, viz. the evacuation of our territory. In all these cases an account will be rendered to you in your next session. You will easily understand, gentlemen, that without this credit it would be difficult for us to press and to conclude the negotiation which remains for us to terminate; and it is not, undoubtedly, in such circumstances, and for so high an interest, the Deputies of France will hesitate to intrust to Government means which it would not know how to proceed without. Such is our situation, Gentlemen—such are the common wants of the throne and of the country. We have laid before you, with the most perfect candour, the result of the negotiations that have been terminated, and the hope of those to come. Undoubtedly, the past has, by its glory as by its disasters, bequeathed to us a heavy inheritance; but a long and happy future is allowed to nations which possess strong institutions, and among whom liberty, sustaining, amidst the most cruel reverses, the energy and fortitude of citizens, cannot fail to revive days of prosperity. It is in order. to enter speedily into possession of that fortune, we must hasten to close irrevocably the past, in resigning ourselves to the sacrifices which it still imposes upon us. It is a noble sight to behold a great nation, after so many vicissitudes, acquiring a new species of glory by its firmness in misfortune, its fidelity in fulfilling its engagements. France has passed through its days of trial; it has supported them with courage. We hope that, free to give a spring to its activity, it will direct it entirely towards the arts of peace; and that, after having thrown so much clot into the war, it will present a great example to nations, by the wisdom and strength which it has received from its King."

The Project of the Law was then presented, and ordered by the Chamber to be examined on Monday.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

EXECUTION OF ANN BAMFORD AND WM. GRAY.—(From the Warwickshire General Advertiser.)—Yesterday, Ann Bamford and William Gray, who were convicted of passing forged notes, underwent the dreadful sentence of the law, on the New Drop, in this borough. At an early hour they were visited by the chaplain in their cells, and engaged with him in religious duties for a considerable length of time. On reaching the scaffold they fully acknowledged the crime for which they were about to suffer—expressed much confidence in the mercy of their Creator through the Redeemer, and after remaining a few moments in fervent prayer, the fatal signal was given, and they were launched into an awful eternity. Gray, who had only reached his 22d year, it is supposed, had been entrapped into the commission of the crime for which he suffered; and there is every reason to believe that he had not been engaged in the horrid traffic which brought him to an ignominious end more than a few months; but his unhappy companion had been deeply and extensively concerned in it for more than 15 years. She had reared up the whole of her family in the guilty practice, and scarcely an Assize for this county passed, but some of her connexions fell a victim to their guilt and her artifices. She was between 50 and 60 years of age.—On the day previous to his execution, Gray was visited in his cell by his wife, his brother, and two of his sisters. The scene between him and his unhappy wife was truly heart-rending; and it was with difficulty that the separation between them could be effected. The situation of this interesting, unhappy woman, the offspring of respectable parents, is truly afflicting; she had scarcely attained her twentieth year, has been married but 14 months, and is now in the last stage of pregnancy.—Considerable interest, we understand, had been made to save the life of Gray, by the friends of his wife, who was the daughter of the late Colonel Rann, whose loyalty, patriotism, and private worth, are well known in this county. It was stated in some of the London papers, that the above convicts, together with William Stewart, Ann Dickens, Joseph Latchford, and Rebecca Hodges, were executed on the 17th inst. It is expected that the sentences of the four last mentioned criminals will be commuted to transportation for life.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, April 29.
WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

The Marquis of Lansdown, in rising to move that the papers relating to the pensions of widows of Officers should be printed, stated, that it was not his intention to take any farther steps on the subject, in consequence of what had taken place: he had learned with great satisfaction that the intention of abridging those pensions had been abandoned, and that it was intended to continue the allowances free from all deductions, which, if they had been made, would have had the appearance of an unworthy niggardliness; and have been quite contrary to their Lordships' usual strain of feeling. He hoped that the pensions to the widows of Naval Officers would be put on the same footing as those of the widows of Officers of the Army; and wished to know whether the widows of Naval Officers, on the Compassionate List, were still obliged, on receiving their pensions, to make an affidavit they continued single, which was a great hardship, and ought to be removed.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that the subject would be considered with a view to further the wish expressed by the Noble Marquis. There could be no possible principle under which the Navy was to be on a different footing from the Army.

Lord MELVILLE thought the pensions of the Navy ought certainly to be on the same footing as those of the Army.

GOLD COINAGE.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE had heard that a large gold coinage was intended for the year 1818, the expense of which would be 70,000*l.* 4,000,000*l.* had been coined last year, at an expense of 40,000*l.*, of which 2,500,000*l.* had disappeared, so that 25,000*l.* had been thrown away. In the same manner the proposed expenditure of 70,000*l.* would be thrown away also. He therefore moved for an estimate of the expense of the gold coinage for the year 1818, and an account of the loss arising out of the old silver, and the issue of the new.—Adjourned till Friday.

Friday, May 1.

CHANCERY SUITS.

A Petition was presented from Abraham Doubleday, of Nottingham, and others, complaining of having had a cause there 10 years in Chancery, to their great trouble, cost, and injury, and being without a prospect of its termination, they prayed for relief from the House.

The Lord CHANCELLOR said he would make inquiries on this subject, for he at present knew nothing whatever of the proceedings.

A Petition was presented from T. J. Waters, praying that a law might be enacted visiting the crime of forgery with a less punishment than that of death.—Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 27.

IONIAN ISLANDS—GENERAL CAMPBELL.

Mr. BENNER presented a Petition from Count Ladan, complaining of the conduct of General Campbell, when commanding in the Ionian Isles, and of his inability to obtain justice. The Petitioner stated, that General Campbell assumed a dispensing power, inconsistent with the existing laws of the country; that he had assumed the power of executing a person who had been absolved by the Court; that he set up a mode of disgraceful punishment—the pillory, which was peculiarly offensive to the country; that he inflicted it on several of the inhabitants; that he also introduced the punishment of the lash, and flogged the inhabitants as well as his own soldiers. The Count was of an ancient family in the country, and of high rank and station; yet, after being a suitor here three years, was referred to tribunals in the islands, which had not authority to decide on his complaints.

Mr. GOULBURN said, that the House was not the fit tribunal for investigating the complaints. General Maitland, who now commanded in the Ionian Islands, had expressed his readiness to go into all the charges, and give the Count the means of legal redress.

Sir C. MONCK said, that even according to the new Constitution of the Ionian Islands, there was no remedy in the Courts there against his Majesty's Commissioners or Officers.

Mr. BENNER observed, that perhaps the Petitioner had not the means of going to law with a rich individual. In such cases were persons to be referred to a law-suit as the only means of obtaining any justice? Were they to hear the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonial Department say, that a German prince might hang, and flog, and seize property, and circulate in the island fraudulent coin, and that redress was to be had only by going to a Court of Law? Whether he should bring forward the subject in another shape remained in his own discretion.

Mr. GOULBURN had never said that the King's officers were not responsible to the Government for their conduct abroad. But General Campbell had been here for some years since his command, and he could not see how Government could proceed to punish him, whatever might be the merits of these charges.

The Petition was received and ordered to be printed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. C. WYNN moved that Mr. T. Ferguson was guilty of a high breach of the privileges of that House, by a corrupt attempt, interfering with the freedom of election, in writing and sending the letter to Mr. Dykes.—Agreed to.—He then moved, that he be committed to Newgate, giving notice that, after the minutes were printed, he should move an address to the Prince Regent, for his removal from the office of Surveyor of Taxes. He also moved, that the Speaker should issue a warrant for the commitment.—The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN COTTON MANUFACTORIES.

Sir ROBERT PEEL, on moving that the Cotton Manufactories Bill be now committed, observed that the Bill was brought in to protect children of very tender years, who had no protectors, and, therefore, it was to be hoped that they would find protectors in that House—(Hear!)—The hours of labour during which those poor children were employed were not less than 14 hours a day; this was more than their strength could endure. There had been Petitions from Manchester, signed by 30 medical persons of great eminence, and by 21 clergymen. The persons who signed those Petitions had no other interests than the interests of humanity; they had no other object than to protect the children from excessive labour.

LORD STANLEY conceived that this question deserved the most serious consideration of the House. The Bill would be highly injurious to the parents of these children. While it pretended to protect the health of the children, it would take away from them much of the wages that were necessary for its preservation; while it gave them time for instruction, it would deprive them of the means. It would increase the difficulties under which the country laboured in manufactures compared with other countries. Under all circumstances, he should move, as an amendment, "That the House do resolve itself into the said Committee this day four months."

LORD LASCELLES followed on the same side. He said that the effect of the measure would be to throw the children off the parishes. It was nonsense, he begged pardon of the House for the expression, but it was really nonsense to say that the children would be improving themselves in the hours when they were not employed; the event would not be so. The time would be principally spent in idleness. He did not look upon the Bill as proceeding entirely from the Hon. Baronet. He believed that it principally originated with a man who was well known from the public prints, (Mr. Owen,) who had wished to establish a new system of morals. He had said, though the number of hours should be decreased, the quantity of material in the course of the labour was increased. That seemed to him a curious doctrine, though Mr. Owen appeared to have experienced the fact at Lanark. He could not help saying again, that the Bill was owing to the interference of that man.

Mr. PEEL said, all he wanted was, that the Bill should be considered on its own merits, even though it might have perhaps an indiscreet advocate in the person alluded to. The trade was carried on in a heated atmosphere. In some of the factories it was necessary that there should be a particular degree of moisture in the body, in order that the thread might adhere to it. The atmosphere was also, in some factories, polluted by small particles of the cotton flying about in it. In the majority the temperature was extremely high, and such as must of necessity be prejudicial to the human body. In Manchester there were 11,600 children employed. It was said that nothing was to be done for them, because it was an interference between the parent and the child. Every parent whose voice had been at all heard had said that they could not exercise a free discussion, and wished them to legislate for them. He implored the House to contemplate such a number of children occupied at the uniform toil of cotton-spinning for 13 out of every 24 hours of their existence—(Hear, hear!)—and to say whether such a system was to be longer endured. Every natural instinct was counteracted, every feeling and inclination natural to a child was thwarted and suppressed—(Hear, hear!)—He was not romantic enough to maintain that persons, even of their tender age, were not to work; he did not deny the necessity of young children earning their bread by the sweat of their brows; but was it therefore to be inferred that no limitation or measure should be set to their weary toil?—(Hear, hear, hear!)—The Noble Lord had taken his principal stand on the impolicy of interference with labour. He admitted, indeed, that during this Session the House had in one instance interfered with labour. They had abolished the practice of employing children in chimney-sweeping—(Hear!)—By that interference the House had, in fact, decided the principle of the Bill. It had declared, that neither the interests of trade, nor the humanity of masters, were a sufficient security for the proper treatment. But there was evidence brought forward to prove, that long continued labour in cotton-mills was most salutary; according to this evidence, cotton-mills were among the most favoured spots on the face of the globe—(A laugh)—In Cardiganshire the mortality was only one in 74; in several other counties it was less than one in 50; in Gloucestershire it was one in 61; but even in Cardiganshire, the most favoured spot, the mortality was one in 74; while in the Glasgow cotton-mills it was said to be only one in 445—(Laughter and cheering.)—Mr. Thomas Warton had addressed an Ode to Health, and anxiously inquires in what "craggy cell" the Goddess of Health delights to dwell. He imagines many places as her favourite habitation; and concludes his ode, by invoking her to bless his Majesty. But the poet never once imagined the real residence of the goddess. He had inquired in vain, "in what dim retreat," these were the precise terms,—

"In what dim retreat
The coy nymph has fix'd her favourite seat."

"The dim retreat" was the cotton-mills of Messrs. Finlay and Co.—(Much laughter and cheering.)—He begged to press upon the House, in opposition to such delusive statements, the evidence of persons to whom no suspicion of interest could attach. They all agreed in the necessity of some fixed limitation. They said, if there should be no Act of Parliament to regulate the hours of labour, the humane and merciful man injured himself, since others would not act on equal terms with him. If, then, to the evidence of medical men, of clergymen, of manufacturers, he added the feeling of every man, it surely was not too much to expect the limitation of labour to eleven hours per day.—(Much cheering.)

Mr. PHILLIPS contended that the morals, the education, and the health of children employed in cotton manufactories were superior to others. The labour was light, the wages regular, and the children were better clothed and fed than in other manufactories.—The taking children from their parents, and placing them under the control of others, had excited a great outcry in a discussion on the Poor Laws; it was equally impolitic in the present instance to attempt what never could and never ought to be effected. In a country like this it was dangerous to violate the most perfect freedom of arrangement between wages and labour. It was not enough to act under the impulse of humane feelings alone. To real charity many things were essential, besides almsgiving, which, when indulged indiscriminately, provoked the very evils it wished to alleviate, and caused nothing but idleness and discontent. The effect of interfering on behalf of the Spitalfields weavers had been to establish that manufacture in Cheshire. The general hours of work were from twelve to twelve and a half. The tendency of interference would be, first, to increase wages—workmen would do less and receive more; an increase of population would follow, and the increased competition for labour must in the end lower wages; while the temporary increase of price would give the continental manufactories a start, by enabling them to sell at a lower price; and thus by lessening our sale, lessen the demand for labour, while the demand for employment was increasing. Messrs. Lee and Houldsworth had reduced the hours of labour, and the people had been much worse off, and more discontented, and had withdrawn their subscription from the sick fund. If the present principle of interference were to be applied, there was no manufacture or employment to which objections might not be made: the farmer was exposed to the inclemency of the seasons, and subject to chronic complaints. Mines were of all places the most notoriously unhealthy, especially lead mines. Potteries were far from being salubrious; and the Right Hon. Gentleman in the chair was so much exposed, that there were more causes operating to injure his health in a single Session, then could happen in a well-regulated manufactory in two years—(A laugh)—Confinement in factories certainly gave people a delicate appearance; we did not see many ruddy complexions among them: there were not many ruddy complexions in that House—(A laugh)—The temperature in factories, whatever had been said, need not in general be above 63. Some fine spinning, indeed, required 74. However, nothing could be done by interference but mischief, and it was most dangerous to manufactures, by producing combinations among workmen—(Hear, hear!)—The purpose of those who petitioned for the Bill was to reduce the hours in order to increase the wages of labour. This, certainly, would be the first of its effects. But he besought the House to consider where they would stop if they interfered in the present instance. Every other class of manufacturers would come forward, and the regulation introduced in this case could not be refused in others. The principle now introduced would extend to all.

Mr. W. BOOTLE supported the Bill.

Mr. W. SMITH also gave in his warmest support. He did not object to the employment of children; but was it fitting that they should be confined to labour in a close manufactory, longer than adults in agricultural labour or in other healthy employments?

Mr. FINLAY contended that the remedy was worse than the disease, for it would drive people from a healthy to an unhealthy employment. He regretted that the hours of labour were so long;

but if they were shortened, as Mr. Owen had done, the superiority of British manufactures on the Continent would be at an end. He insisted that the children employed in cotton-factories were more healthy than in many other employments. He had never heard of a Bill so full of inhumanity and mischief, and should give it his utmost opposition.

Mr. JOHN SMITH supported the measure, referring to the Slave-Trade Abolition, which at first, by the planters, was called a measure of inhumanity and mischief, and yet was now admitted to be one of the greatest blessings. He contended, that the important allegation of Mr. Owen had not been contradicted, viz. that in the shorter time of work they were able to spin quite as much cotton as when they laboured a greater number of hours.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. ROBINSON, before he made up his mind, waited for this debate, and after a full and fair discussion, he was decidedly in favour of the Bill.—(Hear, hear!)—because he thought legislative interference would produce an important benefit, unaccompanied by the usual evils of such measures.

A division was then called for, the numbers were—For the amendment, 26—Against it, 91.

The House then went into a Committee on the Bill; and after some further business, adjourned.

Tuesday, April 22.

A Petition was received from Mr. Bradbury, of Manchester, respecting the difficulties occasioned by the number of forged notes.

A Petition was received from St. Mary's, Whitechapel, against the Parish Vestry Bill.

A Petition from the Parish of St. Giles, complaining of the monopolies and compromises of the Water Companies, was received.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR presented the Report of the Committee respecting the state of the Northern Circuit. He made various observations on the evils of the present system. Individuals, he said, had remained in prison eight, ten, and eleven months, before they were brought to trial, in the four northern counties of Northumberland, Durham, Westmorland, and Cumberland. Of these persons, many had been at last acquitted. It was unnecessary for him to attempt to influence the feelings of the House by any observations on the effects of such a practice, which involved so lamentable and so disgraceful a failure in the administration of public justice. He would leave this question for some weeks to Government and the House to take a proper view of it. If they did not, he should take the liberty of proposing an address to the Prince Regent for the adoption of some measure to remedy so great and growing an evil.

Mr. CURVEN corroborated what the Hon. Member had stated respecting the inconveniences suffered by the northern counties.

Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from St. Gregory's Parish against the Poor and Vestry Bills.—Ordered to lie on the table.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. LYTTELTON called the attention of the House to the effects of a recent regulation, by which an Officer's Widow, who might possess an annual income double the amount of the pension, would lose her right to such provision. The gross total of the Widows' Pensions, including Ireland, was 93,000*l.* odd. The amount of the pensions to individuals was comparatively small. A General Officer's Widow had 120*l.* a-year, a Lieutenant-Colonel's Widow 80*l.* a-year, a Captain's Widow 50*l.* a-year, and an Ensign's Widow 35*l.* a-year. Thus a General Officer's Widow, according to the amount of her income, might forfeit her provision. How a gentleman of condition was to be considered as provided for on such a principle, he did not know. How strong the case must appear, when a widow lady, having 200*l.* a-year, was to forfeit her provision on her husband's death! Marriages and settlements had been made by officers on the principle of calculating on the Widow's Fund. People must say, Good God! is it possible that it is the Officers' Widows' Fund that Government rely on for the retrenchment of expenditure? Is this to form the odious contrast between the way in which the civil servants of the Crown, basking in court favour, are to be provided for, compared with the mode of provision for the defenceless widows of those brave officers who have fallen in their country's battles? The pretence of economy made but a bad appearance, when it was found that in no other respect was economy consulted, and that no retrenchments were effected, where they were most loudly called for. The whole of the proposed saving would not reach 20,000*l.* a-year. He felt confident, that not only the feelings of the army, but the sense of the public was opposed to the regulation; with regard to which, therefore, he should accept no compromise.—(Hear, hear!)—He concluded by moving that an address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying him to annul the late warrant for regulating the pensions due to the widows of military officers.

Colonel DALRYMPLE seconded the motion.

Lord PALMERSTON said, that these regulations gave no pleasure to those who had to enforce them.—(Hear, hear!)—But the executive government were not to blame for any hardships that were supposed to exist with respect to these regulations. These were all regulations for which the House must be responsible.—(Hear, hear!)—They were regulations which had been held on the opposite side with regard to economy, (loud cries of hear), and, under these circumstances, he could not agree to the motion.

Colonel STANHOPE perfectly agreed that economy was necessary; but it was as necessary to provide for the defence of the country, and it was due to our character and reputation to reward such services. Economy, no doubt, was highly desirable; but it was an economy that should diminish the luxuries of the great, and which never should contaminate itself with the mites that fall from the table of the poor.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. CROKER made a few remarks in the way of explanation, in which he said that the Army was in a worse situation than the Navy.

Mr. CALCRAFT commented on the declaration of the Noble Lord, that the House was accountable for the niggardly regulation, which he said, had been thrust upon Government by the language of the opposite side. Such paltry and illiberal proceedings had never for a moment been contemplated or recommended. Who were the persons that asserted the necessity for such an economy as this? Why, they were those—and the country would not fail to notice it—that thought 50 or 100,000*l.* a-year, if given to the Princes, was not more than the resources of the nation could provide; but nothing could be given to those gallant heroes who had fought for our protection, and whose valour, as Ministers themselves had frequently boasted, had secured the independence and tranquillity of Europe!—(Loud and continued cheers)

Mr. WILBERFORCE could not help encouraging the hope, that the Noble Lord (Palmerston) would find himself compelled to accede to the motion. He thought that the Noble Lord, in referring to economy, had made a most unjust, unwise, and uncandid application.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—He firmly believed that the resources of the country were adequate to the accomplishment of the measure under consideration.—(Hear, hear!)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that what had taken place was one of those regulations which formed part of a great system of economy recommended by Parliament. (Hear, hear!) The grants to widows stood upon no ground of right whatever. They proceeded from compassion, and were given as relief to distress. It had been determined to adopt a restraint, however, which was not of too rigorous a nature in itself. The address appeared to him to be of too peremptory a nature, and would appear to dictate too much. As far as he could collect from the sentiments of many Gentlemen, it seemed to be the strong disposition of Parliament that some measure should take place, and he did not doubt but every facility would be given to such a measure. He could not but wish, however, that the Hon. Gentleman would withdraw his motion for the present.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. LYTTELTON said, if the Right Hon. Gentleman would engage to advise the Crown to withdraw the regulation entirely, he would withdraw his address. (Hear, hear!)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER thought that, by what he had said, he had engaged himself to represent what he understood to be the sense of the House.

Mr. LYTTELTON said, he should withdraw his motion in consequence of what had fallen from the Right Hon. Gentleman.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

NEW CHURCHES' BILL.

The House went into a Committee on the New Churches' Bill.—After a minute discussion of several of the clauses, the House resumed.

COTTON-FACTORY REGULATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the Cotton-Factory Labour Regulation Bill.—After some discussion, it was agreed that the operation of the Bill should not commence till the 1st day of Jan. 1819.—The next clause was, that no child should be employed under the age of 9 years.—On which Mr.

W. SMITH proposed an amendment to make the age 10 years.—The House divided.—For the original clause, 28.—For the amendment, 11.—Majority, 17.—It was then agreed that no person under 16 years of age should be employed in cotton-factories for more than 11 hours in a day.

Mr. W. SMITH objected to the postponement of the date for the commencement of the operation of the Bill till January next.

Sir R. PEES thought it necessary to take some time in order to prepare for conforming to the new regulations of the Bill.—The clause was then agreed to, as were the rest.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, April 29.

A Petition, presented from St. John's, Horsleydown, against the Parish Vestry Bill, was received.

Lord STANLEY presented a Petition from Bolton, in Lancashire, complaining of distresses and starvation, reproaching the conduct of Administration, and praying for Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LOAN.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a Committee on the Loan Bill.

Mr. J. P. GRANT expressed his surprise at finding that the Right Hon. Gentleman was, for the fourth time since the conclusion of peace, about to borrow to an immense amount, in order to carry on the service of the year. By the present plan, no less a sum than 14,000,000*l.* was to be raised by loan; the whole revenue, after discharging incumbrances, not exceeding 6,700,000*l.* or about a third of the whole expense of our establishments. This, then, was the extent of the actual resources of the country. The only means upon which the Right Hon. Gentleman seemed to rely for discharging the interest of these new loans, was by diverting to that purpose the proceeds of the Sinking Fund. He could not conceive what was the use of keeping up a fund of redemption, when a larger sum was annually added to the debt than the amount reduced by its operation. If an individual were thus to act in the management of his private affairs, his conduct would be considered as little less than insane. If he redeemed as many annuities as he granted, and the account was thus fairly balanced, still he would be at the expense of paying for agency. What could be the object of all this complicated machinery, except to throw a veil, and a very thin veil it was, over the real situation of the country? Now, in his opinion, the best way of meeting the danger was to expose it fairly, not for the purpose of inspiring fear, but of imparting confidence.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER felt himself called upon to say a few words in answer to the Hon. and Learned Gentleman. It appeared to him that his objections to the mode of raising the supplies resolved themselves into a disapprobation of the increase of funded debt; but it was to be recollected that the House had rejected one plan of finance which he had submitted for the purpose of preventing this evil, and he knew of only two modes of providing the requisite supplies—borrowing and direct taxation. During the last three years there had been an increase of the unfunded debt to the amount of 15,000,000*l.* and a reduction of no less than 50,000,000*l.*, or 40,000,000*l.* sterling. In the case of a private gentleman, therefore, who added 10,000*l.* a-year to his debts, for three years successively, and in the same period redeemed 60,000*l.*, he did not think it could be said that there was any unprosperous course of proceeding. At the end of the year he calculated that the result would show a reduction of the funded debt to the extent of 15,000,000*l.*, and of the unfunded, to that of all the addition it was now receiving.

The House then went into a Committee, and the chairman put the question on the clause respecting the allowance to the Bank for management.

Mr. GREENFELL moved the omission of this clause, on the ground of the enormous profits derived by the Bank from the public balances deposited in their hands. He held in his hand a statement of the amount of fees received by them, upon the different loans, during the last 17 years, and the Committee would be astonished to learn that it was no less than 324,000*l.* paid out of the national purse for this insignificant service.—(Hear.)—The total amount of the charge now made for managing the present loan was 13,000*l.* a part of which applied to the deposit of Exchequer Bills, this being the very first time that any charge of this nature had been made.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER could not consider the objections of the Hon. Gentleman justly applicable to a charge which had been uniformly made almost from the period of the Revolution. The present plan consisted of a complicated system for the creation of a new fund, by means of funding Exchequer Bills. The trouble and responsibility on the part of the Bank were much increased by the nature of this operation.

Sir J. NEWPORT complained that the effect of this complicated arrangement was to prevent competition, and to throw the whole transaction into the hands of jobbers.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that there never was an operation of this nature effected more completely in defiance of their endeavours.—(Hear, hear!)—He did not wish to speak injuriously, but the whole difficulty which had been experienced proceeded from the machinations of that class of persons. He did not believe it would have been possible to have negotiated an open loan, without a considerable augmentation of the whole charge.

Mr. GREENFELL observed, that if this charge was founded on any thing like equity, let it remain; but if antiquity only could be urged in its favour, he should object to it. Did not the Right Hon. Gentleman know, that at the rate of 34 millions there would be a permanent charge of 10,000*l.* per annum on the country? This was a charge contrary to every principle of justice, moderation, and equity; it was strongly indicative of that rapacity which had long characterized the whole of the transactions of the Bank.—(Hear.)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that the Hon. Member had fallen into an error; the increase would be only 2,000*l.*—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. GREENFELL contended that the Bank must receive something like 10,000*l.*—(Hear, hear.)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER admitted that he had mistaken the Exchequer Bills for stock.—(Hear, hear, and a laugh.)

The House then divided on the clause—For it, 46—Against it, 31—Majority, 15.

The Pardons under the Great Seal Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

Thursday, April 30.

COUNTRY BANKS.

Mr. VANSITTART announced that it was not his intention this Session to proceed with the Bill for regulating the circulation of country bank-notes, as some modifications were necessary, for which there would not be time.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. TIERNEY wished to know whether the measure had been withdrawn merely for the ascribed reason. A meeting, he said, had taken place between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and those interested, when it was withdrawn, for no better reason, as he believed, than that it would offend many, and prejudice a particular cause at the general election.—(Hear.)

Lord CASTLEREAGH objected to the practice of attributing the least charitable motive to the conduct of Government.

Sir M. W. RIDLEY stated, that there was not a single Banker at the meeting who did not strongly object to the measure as one equally injurious to their character and interest.

Mr. VANSITTART said, that his opinions were not changed, and that some modifications would remove all fair objections.—The order was then discharged.

Mr. BENNET's motion in favour of the Artillery Drivers, for an Address to the Prince Regent, that he would be pleased to order a sum of 3,500*l.*, being the difference between their full and their half-pay, to be paid to them, was negatived, after some conversation.

POOR LAWS.

Mr. S. BOURNE called the attention of the House to the state of the Poor Laws, particularly as they related to settlements, which, he said, had been much abused, and a remedy was loudly called for. With this view, it had been proposed to take away the laws of settlement altogether, and to relieve the poor in any place in which they might be found. It appeared to him, that it was unfair to call upon any one parish to maintain all that might apply to it. This was a system that would become quite intolerable. It would be worthy consideration whether a certain residence should not entitle a person to relief, and he thought that three years should be the period in which he should be entitled to that relief. There was, in his opinion, no better principle, than that the place which had had the benefit of his earnings should be liable to provide for him in his poverty or old age. No law, he was satisfied, could be made, in which no difficulties would occur. He should have to suggest that after a person had resided a certain time in a parish, he should go before the parish officers, who should grant him a certificate, specifying that he had resided in the parish during that time. At the same time, it would be proper to provide against temporary absence, and to allow that sixty days should be allowed for absence, provided that the party had not been guilty of any misdemeanour. This, he conceived, would create that feeling of attachment between the master and the servant that must be most beneficial. Another benefit was, that persons would not be rash in applying for parish relief. Knowing that their residence in a parish did not entitle them to relief, they would exert their industry, and suspend their application to the parish-officers, till the required period should have elapsed; and by doing so, they might, in many cases, become able to dispense altogether with parish aid. The period of three years was not in any case to commence till the pauper was 16 years of age. By a law thus defined, he hoped that an end would be put to the present complicated and vexatious litigation. Another alteration which he was to propose was, that, in case of appeal, no removal should take place till the appeal should be decided. If in any circumstances the parish should remove the individual before the decision, they should pay all the expenses. This measure might be thought a bold measure; it might be thought daring to make so great a change in the law of the land; but he begged to observe, that it was not an innovation; it was only a bringing back of the law to its ancient and original character.—(Hear, hear!)—He concluded with moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws respecting the settlement of the poor.

Some conversation arose, in which Sir S. ROMILLY said, he conceived the proposed alteration would be a great improvement, and one that would prevent much inconvenience, much expense, and infinite suffering. (Hear, hear!) He had often viewed it as the greatest cruelty to an unfortunate pauper to be, on account of a temporary illness, removed to a place where he would be surrounded with strangers, and where, if he recovered, no employment could be found. The distress to the pauper was very great, the expense of removal was great, and the ultimate burden to the public was often much increased by this cruel law. He would take another opportunity of considering the details of the measure, but he could not now avoid saying that he thought it the greatest improvement that could possibly be made.—Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

NEW CHURCHES.

The House went into a Committee on the New Churches Bill.

Sir W. SCOTT objected, with much earnestness, to the clause enabling twelve well-disposed persons to build a Church, and appoint a Minister with the consent of the Bishop, as tending to disturb the tranquillity of the Church by the introduction of dogmatical sectaries, and by infringing on the rights of patrons. He, therefore, moved the rejection of the clause.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER defended the clause, and thought that the Church should avail itself of all sources of assistance from private liberality. Those who were most interested had been consulted, and had expressed their acquiescence in the clause. The clause would not enable strangers to introduce sectarians; it mentioned only that twelve well-disposed householders of the parish, and others, (hear,) might build, and have no representations. As the law stood already, nothing could prevent parties from building and preaching, as long as they liked, doctrines the most opposite to those of the Church.

Mr. PEEL agreed entirely with the arguments of Sir William Scott.

After some further conversation the Committee divided.—For the clause, 22.—Against it, 47.—Majority, 25.

The Cotton Factories Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Labourers' Wages Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 1.

FORGED NOTES.

A Petition was presented from Birmingham, respecting the number of forged notes, their bad execution, &c.

Sir J. GRAHAM said, that in Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland, the people would not take Bank of England notes, for half of those presented there were forged ones.

Mr. THOMSON observed, that last year the number of Bank prosecutions for forgery amounted to 140. He believed that the forgeries amounted to some hundred thousand pounds. The greater proportion were never offered at the Bank, for fear of detection. Those stopped there last year amounted to twenty-seven thousand pounds. Why did not the Bank alter the form and structure of their notes, instead of hanging so many people? The Petition was ordered to be printed. The Loan Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE BANK.—STATE OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. TIERNY called the attention of the House to the present state of the currency, a subject, he said, of the very highest importance. In the third year of peace, we had a Funded Debt of 800 millions and 40 millions Unfunded,—making an appalling debt of 840 millions. It was said, however, that we were not without comfort, for there was a Sinking Fund of 14 millions; but then it occurred, that the whole of this sum was borrowed money; so our adverse situation was the same, till it was discovered how advantageously we borrowed this 14 millions! Ought a system of finance, under such circumstances, to be bottomed on a paper currency, not convertible into money?—(Hear, hear!)—Very few of the warmest admirers of the present system would, he believed, maintain such an opinion. How then was the Bank Restriction to be supported? Here Mr. TIERNY noticed the reasons urged for this measure,—the Foreign Loans, &c. In 1816, the preamble of the Bill for postponing cash payments stated that it was solely to give the Bank time to make the necessary arrangements for cash payments; and now this identical preamble, letter for letter, was copied in the Bill lying on the table.—(Laughter, and hear, hear!)—Nothing, certainly, could be more calculated for stage effect. There was nothing about Foreign Loans or travelling abroad; but the old ground was precisely taken, though the Bank said they were ready to pay in specie! Mr. TIERNY here entered on a variety of statements respecting the Foreign Loans, the price of gold, the new coinage, &c. He would ask the House, which did they think was best—that Great Britain should lose its character for good faith, or that the Bank should disgorge a part of its profits?—(Hear, hear!)—We should soon see, whether or no, if gold were sent abroad, it would come back again in a time of profound peace, in a time when there was no disposition on the part of any body to hoard gold. He would state, that the Bank had 10,000,000*l.* in their coffers now, and they had made a saving of 21,000,000*l.* by us, and yet we were now to be told, that the whole legislation was to be set aside on account of these Foreign Loans. These were points that ought to be inquired into. If the inquiry were granted, what would be the result? Why, either that the Bank was capable of resuming its payments, or that it was not. In the one case, a great good would be derived to the country; and, in the other, we should gain a great insight into our transactions abroad and at home, which would amply reward us for the inquiry. If Gentlemen would not vote with him on these grounds, they must make up their minds that the Bank would not pay at all: they might be assured, that a similar measure for continuing the restriction would be brought in from year to year. It was their duty in time of peace to provide for war; but if a war found them with their debt unpaid, and their cash-payments unresumed, there was an end to the British Empire that day.—(Hear, hear!)—It was impossible, under such circumstances, that the country could be prepared for war; but they encouraged attack. The Right Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving, That a Committee should be appointed to take into consideration the circulation of the country, and to inquire whether any and what restriction was necessary on the Bank's payment of their promissory notes in specie.

Mr. VANSITTART said, that if a Committee was appointed, the result could not be at all satisfactory: they would leave the House in as much uncertainty as ever. As to the foreign loans, there would not be in future such occasion for them as now. Alluding to Mr. Pitt's financial opinions, Mr. Vansittart observed, that none could have more respect for Mr. Pitt's opinions than those who now occupied his place, and imitated his conduct; and he would leave it to the House to judge in whose hands the finances could more safely be trusted, in theirs who always admired and adopted his principles, or in theirs who uniformly vilified his measures.—(Cheers from the Opposition.)—He allowed that there was ground of alarm if the Bank were unable to resume cash-payments, and this was certainly implied in the preamble of the Bill. But the preamble originated in mistake.—(Much and loud laughter.)—Some alteration of that preamble was required. What inconvenience could arise from continuing the restrictions another year? Neither the House nor a Committee could see, at present, whether by possibility a further restriction might not be necessary.—(Hear, hear!)—The constant increase of paper circulation in England had been known for many years. Since the peace, there was no country in Europe whose finances had so much improved. In no other country had the national debt been reduced. At the end of this year, we were altogether several millions less in debt than at the peace. The ground of this measure was simply this—the extraordinary situation of foreign countries, and the extraordinary relations of this country with them, were such, that no man of experience could think it prudent or safe to pay in specie. The attempt had been partially made last October, and what was the consequence?—two millions and a half of the gold currency had disappeared. It was only the inconvenience of continuing for one year longer, a state of things under which this country had enjoyed the highest prosperity, but a state of things which could not be permanently continued, because it might occasion danger on any sudden alarm. On the one side, then, there were great dangers and certain inconveniences; on the other, no inconvenience and fanciful apprehensions. On these grounds he should oppose the motion.

Lord ALTHORPE and Sir H. PARNELL argued in favour of the motion.

Mr. C. GRANT took the other side, and contended that Parliament had never pledged itself to compel the resumption of cash payments in July next. It had only said it would do all in its power to forward that desirable result. The subject, he said, was one of infinite difficulty, but a Committee would do no good.

Mr. J. P. GRANT argued, that this,—the difficulty of the question,—was the precise reason why a Committee of inquiry should be instituted; for the House ought not to legislate on the mere statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. HUSKISSON entered into various statements, and spoke much about the advantages that had resulted from our paper currency in promoting agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and in enabling the country to make such vast exertions during the war. He insisted that a metallic currency tended to depress wages, and consequently to check population; while it was a notorious fact that wages and population increased in proportion to the diminished value of money. He admitted that it was the duty of the Bank slowly, imperceptibly, to make preparations to resume payments in specie. They should be ready for the season when, without any shock, circulation might be brought into its proper state of convertibility at par. The present was not that season. To withdraw the restriction now, would soon force the country into its paper circulation with renewed and probably incurable evil.

Lord FOLKESTONE said that two years ago it seemed to be quite understood that the Bank should make preparations for cash payments, and yet now, without any inquiry, the House were called upon at once to embark in a new career of paper-currency, without seeing any end or limit.

Mr. THORNTON asserted that the Bank had done every thing that depended on them towards the resumption of cash-payments. Inauspicious circumstances, out of the control of the Bank, had occasioned these attempts to fail. As to the issues of the Bank, a restriction was, in his view of the subject, necessary at the time of the change of system; and he could assure the House it was the intention of the Bank to adopt it, but it must be done with great caution; and there might be circumstances which, even at the moment of resuming cash-payments, would render it expedient to pursue a different conduct. These matters of great delicacy, notwithstanding the reflections thrown out against the Directors of the Bank, he would say must be left to their discretion.

Mr. FRANKLAND LEWIS spoke at some length in favour of the motion for a Committee.

Mr. GRENFELL conceived that no sufficient reasons had been assigned for continuing the restriction.

Lord CASTLEREAGH represented the difficulties in which the Bank would be placed if it were obliged to supply the country with specie and to satisfy all the demands upon them, when it was a well-known fact, that the 2,600,000 sovereigns and half-sovereigns which had been issued, had been sent out of the country.

Mr. TIERNEY replied. He said, the present motion would probably be negatived; and he sincerely regretted it, because he believed it to be the last struggle upon the subject of the national currency. The consequence must be, to persuade the public that there was a powerful body somewhere, interested in maintaining the currency upon its present system. That the ultimate effects of this perseverance must be dreadful, he had no doubt. The day of reckoning would, however, arrive, and he should be sorry to be one of those on whose heads the shame must then lie.—(Hear, hear, hear!)

The question was then loudly called for. On a division, the numbers were—Ayes, 99—Noes, 164—Majority against the motion, 65.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then moved, that the Bank Restriction Bill should be read a second time.

Mr. BENNET immediately moved that the House do adjourn.

Mr. TIERNEY rose and quitted the House amidst loud cheers from the Opposition Benches.

Strangers were ordered to withdraw, but no division took place.

The Bill was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on Monday next.—Adjourned till Monday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MAY 3.

The news from France continues very barren. The people there are waiting to see how the discussions relative to the occupation of France and the reduction of its payments will end; and then we may look for intelligence of a very different sort. The Courier, we see, is for letting the payments be reduced. Ay; we dare say; and so will every other reviver of Divine Wrong be, while the reverse threatens its re-establishment. "The simple and direct principles," says this indignant denouncer of Parodies and defender of Mr. CANNING, "which serve as our guides in private transactions, never can be practically applicable to the more complicated machinery of political affairs." Such politicians as ALFRED thought otherwise, and so do all those who know the value of sincerity and can afford to have their intentions looked into;—but to resume the observations of this profound man of the world and indignant defender of religion and Mr. CANNING, "It is a pleasing dream," says he, "for theorists to indulge; that no other maxim is required, than the divine one of doing to others what we would they should do unto us; but it is only a dream, when taken in its literal acceptance. Human passions saucily interpose, and forbid its universal application." That is to say, the maxim is a very well-meaning enthusiastic sort of thing; but it knows nothing,—of us. Mr. CROKER, for instance, upon this principle, should not have preferred having the amount of so many widow's pensions, instead of sharing them among so many necessitous persons; but his passions, as usual, "saucily interposed," and so he pocketed the affront to the maxim. The whole secret of this diminution of French payment is, that the Allies know very well the reverse would be fatal to Louis; and there is one more secret which they suspect,—and that is, that events will be fatal to him whether the payments are all demanded or not.—It is the question relative to the military occupation that most perplexes them. A bon-mot on this subject, though apparently on another, is attributed to TALLEYRAND. To some one who was speaking of the revival of the KING's health, "Oh!" said he, "the KING has better health than any man in his Kingdom, and I assure you he will live to bury the Monarchy."

In the course of one of the French debates, it was "affirmed on one side and denied on the other that there had been a dreadful conspiracy at Lyons." Lyons is the place where BONAPARTE was welcomed with such rapture when he walked back to his throne, like a loanger down St. James's-street.

The accounts from India continue to tell us of successes on the part of the English, mixed with very odd appearances on the part of the natives. Those from Ceylon inform us, that an insurrection had broken out at the instigation of a Malabar Chief, who laid claim to the throne from which we have ousted the legitimate Sovereign. Your only wholesome legitimacy is an European plant, and becomes very poisonous in the East. Mr. WILSON the resident at Bardulla, who was sent against the insurgents with a small military detachment, was killed. He is said to have owed his death to his separating from the detachment in order to persuade the insurgents to disperse. A private letter dated from the Indian continent gives a much grander account of the proceedings of the Marquis of HASTINGS, who has set out, it seems, in a most princely style, with 400 camels and 150 elephants to himself, besides state-elephants with silver castles,—and after him 13000 men, with cannon, camp-followers, officers and 810 servants, grooms and grass-providers 1400, messmen ditto 120, Bazaar-men 900, 40 elephants, 400 camels, and a reasonable myriad of wives, mistresses, and children,—and all for what?—why, says the writer, with proper Indian gravity,—mixed with the due anti-plebeian indignation,—for "the entire annihilation of the Pindarees, a race of plundering scoundrels who have been annoying us for many years." What incorrigible disrespectful rogues! But is not this treating them with too great a consideration in return,— "13,000 men, and 190 elephants, some of them with silver howdas on their backs?" Is it not, as a friend says at our elbow, a little too much like sending a regiment of hussars to abolish a chimney-sweeper?—Ah, but those Pindarees are a whole race of scoundrels.—Oh, a whole race are they? and not to be easily subjugated?—We much doubt then whether the modern XERXES will do it, with all his camels, elephants, and currie-makers to boot. Heaven (or whatever else is interested in the business) grant, that some mischief may not even befall him from the multitude of Rajahs and other independent chiefs who are now "on their way to pay their respects to him."

In many of our churches, the track of the interior is entirely occupied with graves; and it is scarcely possible to conceive any thing more injurious to the health, and more repugnant to the feelings of the congregation, than thus assembling them amid the damps of the grave. In many of the church-yards, the soil has been so increased by the accumulation of the dead, that the surface is several feet above that of the church; and circumstances disgusting to the eye and distressing to the feelings, have been frequently exhibited. The French metropolis began to be cleared of this great evil about the beginning of the Revolution; in the course of it, the whole object was effected. All cemeteries are now removed from Paris.

We received at a late hour this morning a long account of "an interesting duel that took place on Saturday se'nnight, at Caen, in Normandy, between a professed French duellist and the son of Captain PICKFORD, of the Royal Navy. The ferocious Frenchman had provoked the meeting by every personal and national insult in his power. They met; and the Frenchman proposed the distance at twenty paces; but PICKFORD thinking that almost certain death awaited him in either case, insisted on two paces and a half only. This was at last agreed to, and Mr. PICKFORD had the good fortune to escape, and to lay his antagonist dead at his feet."—Bath Herald, May 1.

A Novel Exhibition took place on the Surrey side of the Waterloo Bridge yesterday morning: Mr. USHER, a Clown of the new Cobourg Theatre, undertook, for a considerable wager, to drive Four Cats in a machine of his own invention, which he performed in less than four minutes. The distance was 600 yards!

The following incident is taken from Mr. LAING's Voyage to Spitzbergen, a little work which contains much curious information respecting the whale fishery and the possibility of reaching the North Pole:—"During the stitching of the whales, there were generally a considerable number of sharks in the vicinity of the vessel. They were principally of that variety termed Squalis Pristis or Saw Fish. At this time, one more voracious than the rest approached close to the side of the whale's carcass, and seized a large piece of blubber, which was ready to be hoisted on board. Before he could make his escape, however, he was struck by a harpoon, and, his flight being thus obstructed, he was attacked with spears: a tackle was immediately fastened to his jaws, and being hoisted on deck, his belly was ripped open, and the blubber recovered. The carpenter, too, stripped a considerable quantity of skin from his tail. Notwithstanding this rude treatment, he was no sooner let down, than he swam away with great agility."

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

On Wednesday, the QUEEN visited the Mansion-house, to be present at an examination of the Children educating in the London National Schools, which took place in the Egyptian Hall. The Princesses ELIZABETH and AUGUSTA, the Dukes of YORK and KENT, the Prince of HESSE HOMBURG, the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the Bishop of LONDON, &c. &c. were also present. About 300 girls and 700 boys were paraded before the Company, and underwent some examination, after singing a hymn and repeating part of the Church Service. This being over, they sang another hymn, and said some prayers; they then sang "God save the King," with an additional verse about the QUEEN's letting her "gentle and serene brow grace the fair wreath."—The LORD MAYOR then addressed the little children, reminding them of the high honour which had been done them by her MAJESTY, and ordering them a small sum of money each (sixpence we believe) by order of the QUEEN.—The children conducted themselves with military precision.—The Royal Party, having first partaken of a choice collation, left the Mansion-house amidst the shouts of the populace. After this exhibition the Royal Dukes, the Bishops, the Lord Mayor, &c. went to dine at the City of London Tavern, upon "all the delicacies of the season." "Church and State" was drank by the Princes and Bishops in great style; and their happy union was commented upon with much gravity by the Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

The Duke of KENT visited his sister, the Queen Dowager of WURTEMBERG, before his last return to England: he had not seen her for 33 years. Her Majesty has much increased in size, and is grown very like her Royal father. She resides at Louisbourg, a few miles from Stuttgart, and seems to be very happy. It is not her present intention to return to this country, but she manifested a laudible anxiety to hear of its prosperity, and particularly of its moral and religious institutions.—Evening paper.

The PRINCE REGENT had a private view of the Royal Academy Exhibition on Friday. The Pictures of merit will be duly noticed in our future Papers.

The Princess of WALES has sold her estate on the Lake of Como, and now resides about seventy miles from Rome.

No. 321.

DRURY-LANE.

We resume our observations on the Jew of Malta. It's performance has been repeated several times to good houses, though, without denying the talent of the author, some think it cannot last as an attraction, some attribute it's continuance wholly to Mr. KEAN, and all scarcely know what to think of the principal character, who is generally pronounced as a being entirely out of the pale of human nature. The Jew is certainly a perplexing sort of person, and it requires all the force of his natural intellect to hinder the very greatness and multiplicity of his crimes from tumbling, by their own weight, into the fantastic attitudes of the burlesque. But it appears to us, that with due reference to the times in which the character was conceived, to the principles on which the author intended it to proceed, and to the Anti-Jewish persecution, which SHAKESPEARE afterwards made the ground of his nobler work, the perplexity is done away; and the wholesale criminal resumes his station in humanity, not indeed as a specimen of it's ordinary or even of it's extraordinary offenders, but as a barely possible result, in vehement times and in a warm climate; of the united mistakes of persecution from without, and selfish subtlety from within.

In the time of SHAKESPEARE, the people of Christendom had not left off regarding the Jews with an aversion of which we have no idea in these times. It was horror and loathing. The time was a noble one; but strong prejudices, at least among the middle and lower orders, (for the upper and literary classes were thought to be much infected with heresies,) had survived its kinder tastes, and it's imaginative character kept them alive. Through the medium of superstition, acted upon by romantic traditions, a Jew was regarded as a wilful and savage opposer of all the best things in the world,—a sort of human beast, always ready to plunder and bite,—a bearded demon,—an old living goblin, haunting the place in which its treasure was buried, or bending and muttering about with a watchful malevolence against every thing innocent, especially children. There was a notion, on which CHAUCER has founded his lovely story of the boy who went singing a hymn to the Virgin through Jewry, that they privately sacrificed a little child at Easter with many horrid rites. And not to mention the dress which they wore, and other customs of their own which tended to their exclusiveness from the rest of society, their odium was completed by their money-getting and usurious habits, which were held by our ancestors in particular contempt; though in fact, the very nature of the laws which had long prevailed against the Jews, and still do so in a degree, originally drove them to this only method of maintaining a consequence in society. They had long been objects of extortion all over the world;—a remarkable instance of which is to be found in the reign of King JOHN, who drew a tooth from a Jew's head every day if he gave him the sum required. Kings extorted, subjects borrowed; and all hated, so much the more, the men whom they compelled to have this odious advantage over them.

Now MARLOWE availed himself of all these civil and religious prejudices which helped to excite a bitter character in the Jew; he put him also into a hot and adust climate, upon the irritating chalk of Malta; gave him for countrymen and masters the most bigotted Christians, the Maltese and their Knights, who made a vow of warfare against Infidels, and who actually treat him ill; and to complete the subtle and fiery counteraction in the Jew, made him a disciple of MACHIAVEL, whose intentions have been such matter of doubt, but who was then regarded, at any rate, as the professor and teacher of all self-h and bloody cunning,—a remorseless subjector of means to ends,—an incarnation of demoniacal intellect, as void of all human bowels as a clock-case, and only ready, with horrid smile, to thrust his triumphant subtleties into the teeth of simple virtue.

With these lights held up to his shocking old face, MARLOWE'S Jew becomes a very different person from a mere gratuitous destitution of human qualities. He is only an excessive specimen how they may be devilled by the mistakes above-mentioned; and indeed, with all his enormities, he is scarcely worse than MACHIAVEL'S friend, the well-known CÆSAR BORGIA, at least as the latter is represented in history, and partly by the Florentine Secretary himself.

But up rose SHAKESPEARE in the complete wisdom of his humanity; and rescuing the Jew himself from enormities, which with all explanation are still beyond the mark, which were too much for their own subtlety, which overdid the hidden intention of his forerunner, and which our great poet knew to be rather the fancies of stimulated imaginations than possible even to a perverted human being, clothed his dry bones and his vizard face with flesh and blood, gave him passions good and bad in common with those on whom he revenged himself, and left only just as much excess in him as was a set-off to the pernicious mistakes of his persecutors.—Blessings on thy memory, thou divinest of human beings! who without either vehemence or want of enthusiasm, without either partiality or want of deep affection, without effort, without affectation, without resentment against the most provoking mistakes of what is still human, left us a body of beautiful wisdom, in the spirit of which every thing human is done justice to; in which vice is held up neither as inexcusable nor happy; in which the pretensions of happier virtue are made modest and attractive, equally removed from pride towards its fellow-creatures and dust-biting fear towards ill-praised heaven;—in which earth is not degraded, nor the justice of fatality committed;—in which artificial guilt and innocence are equally deprecated; in which reward is not made a desirable thing for one's mere personal sake, nor punishment threatened us for having been unhappy already;—in which no absurdity whatever is explained by another, nor in impatience of not being able to give one, is converted to threatening;—in which, in short, human beings are well-intentioned, mistaken, forgiveable, and improveable ones; and which affords genial knowledge enough, if it were attended to, to ripen the long-maturing fruit of human experience, and enable true innocence to realize its old fabled sunshine.

We have seen the new interlude of Amoroso and the new afterpiece of the Mountain Chief, and after having had our thoughts turned to SHAKESPEARE, we may be allowed to say nothing about them, except that one is like an extract from a previous burlesque, and that the other, notwithstanding the natural and various performance of Mrs. ALSEP, is a lamentable failure.

FINE ARTS.

SPRING GARDENS EXHIBITION.

Discovery of the concealed Letter of Charles I. by Oliver Cromwell and Gen. Ireton. J. CAWSE.—The power of colour and character in this picture shews that nature is now cordial with the Painter. In the firm countenance and position, Cromwell portrays a mind deeply scheming and determined. Ireton has a natural look of sarcastic joy at the discovery, though mixed with a raffian expression, which we do not recollect to be biographically just, for he was conscientiously opposed to the civil war-inducing despotism of Charles I.—A facile pencil, pleasing colour, and broad effect, belong to 156 and 203, Portraits, M. WENSTER.—Day-light is very agreeably imitated in 282, Distant View of Harlech Castle, 73, Macl Heboy, and many other able Views, by C. V. KILBING.—It is a pity that the sunny effects and otherwise well painted Cattle and Farm-yard subjects by Mr. HILLS should be injured by his strange attachment to a glaring yellow in his trees, which has no medium of connection with his greys. It is a harshness affecting our minds like the scraping of a saw to sharpen it.—In 51, A Scene near Chepstow, and 71, Chepstow Castle, Mr. GROVER exhibits our English green and grey landscape with beautiful sunshine, and a pleasing touchiness in the banks, but a bad one in his foliage. It is what the Artists call a niggling pencil. Nature is so inexhaustible in her works, that were an antediluvian life added to the evanescent life of these after ages, she would afford new beauties for the Artist's imitation, to enhance every new work he might produce in that prolonged time. Such an enhancement ought to be the aim of genius. It is evidently that of Mr. DEWINT, in 319, Greenwich, where the most energetically touched and naturally coloured greyish green trees have a sprightly effect given to them by the different coloured dresses of the ambulating company, and by the bright masses of light. The eye of taste brightens before the romantic effects painted by Messrs. STEPHANOFF and WILD, from the superb rooms in the residences of the Royal Family. They are so lucent that they look as if they were of inlaid jewels; where the parts that are in shade are duly neutralized and sobered, and the high lights shine like gold and diamonds seen in sunshine. We cannot too much praise Mr. J. STEPHANOFF's Evening, 318, it is so mellow and so affluent in colour, yet, like a warm, still, summer evening, so pensive in shade. It describes a genteel company seated and stepping into a barge from a strand of noble architecture. The elegant dresses, and more elegant air of the figures, equal the best of VOUVERMANS and WATTEAU, and a young man handing a young lady into the boat, has a grace which is the result of education heightened by gallantry. The timidity and modesty of the female are charming foils to the firmness and devotedness of her lover. Among other good portraiture of peasantry by Mr. CRISTALL is 317, A Gleamer, a modest and rustically graceful girl. His sailors too, are of the true nautical and English breed. We might make honourable mention of by far the greater part of his Pictures in this Exhibition. There is no little elevation of feeling in his land storms. In 324, Storm, Woods set on Fire by Lightning, fire, air, water, vegetation, and animals, are set in fearful and destructive motion. His Hampstead Heath is accurate. A more pleasing, because a less cold colour than usual, is seen in Mr. B. BARRON's Landscape, 108. It is a classical composition. We are surprized that an Artist so well acquainted with the principles, and so long habituated to the practice, of landscape-painting, should continue to give us such cold slaty colouring. There is a touch of wildness in Mr. HARLEY's landscape, Timon in Exile, 307. 13, Evening, and 43, by Mr. W. TURNER, are chaste pictures. There is much delicacy with force in Mr. UWIN's Portraits of M. Josephine Meyer, and of his Mother. Messrs. SCOTT, COX, and E. HAVELL, have various good pictures.—In the view of so much talent, produced at so great an expenditure of time, by so many Artists, how cheap is the purchase of several hours amusement, which this elegant Exhibition affords. It is no wonder that it is well attended.

SIR J. F. LEICESTER'S GALLERY.

54, Bacchante, B. WEST, P. R. A. This picture represents a Bacchante advancing to join a Sacrifice to Bacchus, which is seen in the middle distance. She already begins to honour the Deity of her adoration by striking the cymbals which are fastened on her hands. She does this with a gaiety of look and motion altogether appropriate to the joyousness of the occasion, and to the briskest flow of the animal spirits which can result from the mixed exhilarations of music, dancing, and wine. All her faculties of body and mind are extensively engaged. Her arms are uplifted, her head is raised and thrown back, her complexion glows, her eyes flash, her mouth is open in the act of singing, her tresses are floating, her movement is quick and gliding, she is in an extacy. But even in this almost effervescence of being, the Painter has preserved a qualifying decorum which refines the look, the air, and the form of the Bacchante, so as to prevent our admiration of a beautiful and lively young woman from being lessened by any thing indecorous or unfeminine. Her sensibility to gladsome impressions appears indeed of so irreprehensible a nature, and she looks of so intellectually superior a class of beings, that, together with the loveliness of her face, which is we think in the Painter's best mould, we almost begin to fancy that we feel something of the ancient Sculptor PYGMALION's attachment, when he becomes enamoured of his chiseled beauty, and to wish that she could be rendered vital. For to a nice proportion of feature, the Painter has added a bloom of skin, an elegance of action and shape, a flowing profusion of hair, and a sparkle of eye, which with the sensibility and mind-glowing countenance, constitute the main sources of the great and universal passion of love; for

"Nature's hand
To certain species of external things
Attunes the finer organs of the mind."

The accessories to this fascinating figure, invigorate to intenseness the intended impression of the picture, that of a Bacchanalian joyousness, and of youthful beauty; for the smiling boy who attends her with a basket of grapes, sets off her fair beauty by his sun-burnt complexion, while his eyes glisten with admiration and wine; and the active sylvan groups in the back-ground, in their dancing, with the thyrsus and musical instruments, and their dragging goats to the sacrifice, tell the subject with a power and with a truth of costume, that remind us of the classical exactness with which N. Poussin has described mythological and poetical subjects.

But in thus praising so highly the President for the pleasure he affords us by the beauty and the truth and power of this picture, we must not omit to state, that for the action and attitude of his Bacchante, he is much indebted to the inventive and enthusiastic genius of the Prince of Colourists, in his famous picture of Titan's Daughter. This, we understand, the President avows: but then he has so altered and applied it to his express subject, as to give that new feature of originality to it which genius alone could communicate. We are, however, surprised, that, with the President's high intelligence, he should have given us so gloomy a sky. It hangs with a threatening aspect over the figures, is altogether a contradiction to the subject, and inconsistent with the clear enlivening atmosphere of the grape season.

DRAWINGS BY N. POUSSIN.

Had we not been convinced by other works of N. Poussin, that his rank among the great Artists of the Continent is scarcely second only to RAFAELLE's, who stands as completely aloft and alone among Painters as our beloved SHAKESPEARE does among Poets, the sight of the small Water-colour Drawings of the Seven Sacraments by Poussin, now in New Bond-street, would at once result in that conviction. Though drawn with so evanescent a material, above 170 years since, that their freshness and force are impaired, time has sufficiently respected and spared them to address the eye and the heart with critical improvement and delight. A volume of principles in the beautiful and sublime might be deduced from them, and nothing but the variety of subject flowing in upon us from the native works now so numerous before the public, would prevent us having the pleasure of detailing their extraordinary merits,—merits which have called forth the admiration of the best judges of Art, and among whom is the President of the Royal Academy.

R. H.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

The Directors of the British Gallery deserve and will have the thanks of the country, when the Pictures are seen which they have again collected for the gratification of the people, and the study of all those Artists who have modesty enough to know they have yet something to learn. In addition to the most wonderful selection of Dutch Pictures certainly in Europe, they have obtained some of the finest specimens of the Italians, with two more Cartoons. This calm perseverance, without noticing or being influenced by any attacks or insinuations, gives one hopes, the delight of which it is quite impossible to express. The young men who drew from the Cartoons so ably last season, may now contemplate with security on the assistance of the first men in the country, if they go on with equal enthusiasm; for the first men in the country have shewn they are not to be deterred from their intentions by the ridicule and scurrility of those who dread their success.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Tuesday, April 28.

TEMPEST, v. ORD, &c.

At an early hour the Court was much crowded to hear the decision of the Lord Chancellor in this interesting case. His Lordship spoke to the following effect:—"This matter first came before me, by a Petition presented by Mrs. Taylor, which rendered it my duty to make an order to restrain Lord Stewart from contracting matrimony with Lady Frances Vane Tempest, or having any further communication with her until my further order. I had hardly disposed of that Petition, when another was presented by Lady Frances, which prayed an immediate reference to the Master, to receive proposals of a settlement upon a marriage, of which she approved. The first Petition having given me notice that one of the guardians approved of the marriage, and that the other totally disapproved of it, the order that I was to make upon the second was obviously for the attendance of all parties. Soon after this a third Petition was presented from Lord Stewart, praying that he might go before the Master to establish the fact that this would be a suitable marriage, and that proposals of settlement might be laid before him. It appears that the case before me is now reduced to two questions—1st, whether Lord Stewart should have what had been called the usual reference to the Master; and the term 'usual reference' to the Master had been adopted in the course of the argument, in consequence of a fact which proved nothing as to the principle upon which the Court is to act—that not within the memory of man had such a reference to the Master been refused; but I now state it as my opinion, that although that reference is made without almost a mention of it, yet there may be many cases in which such a reference would be injurious; but it would be difficult for the Court to refuse it: and the question is, whether this is a case forming an exception to the general rule. The second question is, whether that order which has been prayed for to restrain Lady Antrim from any communication with her daughter, excepting in the presence of Mrs. Kay, shall be granted." His Lordship then entered into a minute statement of the facts which occurred from the death of Sir Henry Vane Tempest to the present transaction. He referred to the Master's Report of 1814, made for the purpose of settling a plan for the education of this young lady; and the Master thought proper to find, that Lady Frances should not be allowed to live with either of her guardians, but was to be placed under the care of Mrs. Kay, a person of the highest respectability; and Lady Frances was restricted from making any visits, excepting such as were consistent with her plan of education; and visits were not to be made without the previous mutual consent of Lady Antrim and Mrs. Taylor, and without such previous mutual consent, no persons were to be allowed by Mrs. Kay to visit the infant at home. While at the sea-side, in 1816, it appeared by the affidavit of Mrs. Taylor that some proposals were made to the young lady of marriage. Although it had been represented at the bar, that no answer was necessary to be given to this assertion, yet that statement appeared to his Lordship to be one which had been most properly made, because Mrs. Taylor had referred to that fact as forming a main ground for her apprehension that a similar transaction had taken place in 1813. These were circumstances which might not only have been contradicted by Lady Antrim, but by other persons conversant with the affair. But these facts had met with no contradiction. Not long after this transaction an application was made to the Court, and indeed it was high time, to vary the plan of education; and it now appeared upon a report which the Master made, that, in his opinion, an alteration should be made. The Master, in his report, had declared that by agreement this young lady was to be introduced at Court by Lady Antrim, and to visit with Mrs. Taylor and Lady Antrim. His Lordship then proceeded:—"I thought it my duty to state these circumstances, for the purpose of intimating that it is the opinion of the Court, that a proper care of the interest of the ward has not been taken by Lady Antrim, and I feel it my duty to say this, it having been hinted to me that there was an idea that I should not do my duty. The world shall know this, that I will not go out of this world disgracing myself, by entertaining those principles, which have never affected my heart. There never existed a more timid Judge in one respect than myself, for I am always fearful lest I should do wrong. Let those who think proper to slander me with anonymous letters, know that I serve a master whom I would not serve, if it were possible to be conceived that I should not do my duty. (Here his Lordship seemed deeply affected.) Having said thus much upon this subject, I will now proceed with the question before me." His Lordship then adverted to the proposal of marriage which had been made by Lord Stewart, and accepted by Lady Frances. Mrs. Taylor stated the grounds upon which she opposed this union, "that recollecting the plan formerly entered into by the Countess to effect a marriage between her daughter and a nobleman, the deponent became apprehensive lest a similar project might again have been advised without the knowledge of the plaintiff." The affidavit then proceeded to enumerate the various personal objections to Lord Stewart, and first, "that he is 40 years of age, or thereabouts." His Lordship would be 39 years of age in May next; and again, "that he is a widower, with a son, not many years younger than the plaintiff." That, his Lordship observed, was a very material fact, and one which might illustrate the anxiety which existed out of doors with respect to this case. It was thought, he said, necessary, by somebody, to address an anonymous letter to him, to inform him of a fact which the writer supposed he could not have known before, that it was quite right he should recollect that this nobleman was a widower and had a son, which son would interrupt the descent of the title and of the property to the issue of this marriage, if it should take place. He had a very serious command last night to desire that he would not forget that fact. With regard to this anonymous letter, although instances did exist where these anonymous communications had a beneficial effect, yet, with regard to private families, they did infinite mischief; and by those who address such letters to Judges, it ought to be understood that they are criminal in the highest degree. What was the conduct of Lord Hardwicke, when he discovered certain persons publishing partial accounts of trial?—he sent them all to prison; and those who are guilty of writing anonymous letters to Judges are deserving of no less a punishment. The next statement was, that Lord Stewart "is the younger son of an Irish Peer, without any fortune or provision." The Court would judge what was the mischief of such representation; but the affidavit of Lord Stewart had most fully contradicted this allegation. In the same affidavit it was also alleged, that Lord Stewart was in embarrassed circumstances, that his habits were dissipated, and that there were other circumstances objectionable, which ought not to be mentioned in open court. With respect to the allegation that Lord Stewart was 40 years of age, the information was nearly correct. It was a fact deserving great consideration. That Lord Stewart was a widower, with a son not much younger than the plaintiff, were circumstances which also required consideration. With regard to the imputation that Lord Stewart had no fortune, and was in embarrassed circumstances, he conceived that the assertion was groundless. He had no less a sum than 26,000*l.* in personal property, and was free from debts. The next point in Mrs. Taylor's affidavit was, that Lord Stewart was dissipated. What the habits of Lord Stewart were he could not say; but he could with great truth affirm, that he knew nothing against the private, and every thing in favour of the public character, of his Lordship; and although some persons going to the fashionable parties at the west end of the town might catch hold of some idle report, he individually knew nothing against his Lordship. But what was the condition of a young man placed before the eyes of the world with such general allegations against his character? He could do nothing more than repel the calumny. A man might be the favourite of his Sovereign for his great military exploits and diplomatic services, and might, as had been observed, naturally attract the attention of a young girl; and all this might propose nothing to domestic felicity; but, good God, was it to be said that because it might be so, that it must be so? And because this affidavit contained these allegations, was it to be said that Lord Stewart must have been in dissipated and irregular habits? He did not mean to say that his Lordship decidedly was not so, excepting from his own allegations in his affidavit; but for any thing he knew to the contrary, Lord Stewart might be a man as of good a private life as any man in existence. Whether this was or was not the fact, it was the duty of the Master to decide. The question, he observed, was then reduced to this point—whether Lord Stewart's conduct in the negotiation for the marriage had been such, that for that reason the reference ought to be refused. He had no difficulty in saying, that if it was justly imputed in the affidavit that Lord Stewart had been guilty of that conduct which amounted to collusion and concert, in order to acquire possession of the young lady's fortune, he would not grant the reference; or even if that charge was apparently made out, he should hesitate a long time before he should give such a person the opportunity of making his way to the young lady's fortune. But had such a case been made out? When a man had conducted himself in life with so much propriety, as far as his honour and his character were concerned, a Lord Stewart, it was impossible to say that such a charge of direct misconduct had been made out. But, although he said this, nothing on earth should prevent him from declaring that there certainly had existed some indiscretion on the part of Lord Stewart as well as Lady Antrim. With respect to the Lady of high rank, about whom so much had been said, he should say, that there was no evidence to prove collusion on the part of Lord Stewart to get possession of the young lady's fortune. As a judge, the conversation which was said to have taken place between that lady and Mrs. Taylor would have no effect upon him. On the 9th April the offer was made and accepted; and he had no difficulty in saying, that Lady Antrim should have been a little more considerate, than to allow these parties to come to the point, without giving them the opportunity of further deliberation. He was also decidedly of opinion, that neither Lord Stewart nor Lady Antrim should have taken that hasty step without first consulting the wishes of the guardian, Mrs. Taylor. Under all the circumstances of the case, he could see no objection to the reference being made to the Master; nor did he see any cause for delay. If the Master should be of opinion that this is a proper marriage, it would be by no means a matter of course that this Court would confirm that report. With respect to the other motion, whether Lady Antrim should be continued under the restraint to which she had voluntarily submitted herself, he felt no difficulty in saying, that paying no regard to the high rank in life, looking at what had passed with regard to the transactions of the year 1846, and to the present affair, it did appear to him to be proper to order, that until the Master's opinion should be given, the restraint should be continued. If Lady Antrim felt uneasy at this restraint, she might have an opportunity of applying to the Court whenever she thought proper, and of giving any explanation she might think expedient; but there were circumstances in the history of this transaction which did not appear to him to be quite consistent with the duty of a guardian.

Sir S. ROMILLY.—Has your Lordship any objection to adding to the order, that the parties shall be examined on oath?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I recollect no instance of that ever having been granted.

Sir S. ROMILLY.—The novelty of the case I should think would afford a sufficient reason for its being ordered.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The safest way is to take the order in the usual manner; and if any thing arises, that it should be made the ground of an application to the Court.

Sir A. PIGGOTT.—With liberty to make a separate report as to the question of the marriage?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is in the nature of things, that if the Master reports that it is a proper marriage, that that report will embrace the proposals as to settlement, because he who tends himself must of necessity say something as to his fortune. But I have no objection to say, not only that the Master should be at liberty, but that he should make a separate report if the party desires it. A reference to the Master with regard to the marriage, I repeat, does not decide the question the least in the world. Of course, if the Master considers it to be an improper marriage, there will be an end to the inquiry.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Wednesday, April 29.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

Mr. BROUGHAM moved, that a mandamus be directed to the Governor and Company of the Bank, ordering them to proceed to divide all the profits accruing to that establishment previous to the 19th of March last, over and above the expenses incurred in the conduct of its affairs. His application was founded upon the affidavit of a proprietor of Bank stock, in which it was sworn, to the best of the deponent's belief, there was a considerable balance in the hands of the Company, on which they had made no dividend. The Learned Counsel observed, that the object of the motion was to compel a compliance with the provisions of the three Acts relating to the Bank of England, by which it was enacted that there should be no accumulation of capital.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, after some questions, said, I think you may take a rule to shew cause.

[On Friday an application was made on the part of the Bank, when it was ordered that the rule should be enlarged till the 25th inst.]

THE KING v. WILLIAM AND CHARLES DAVIES.

The defendants were placed upon the floor to receive judgment, having been found guilty of an indictment charging them with endeavouring to provoke Captain Percival to fight a duel.

After hearing Counsel, and after a long consultation between their Lordships, Mr. Justice BAYLEY passed sentence, severely reprobating the conduct of the defendants when they met Capt. Percival at Hammersmith, and they used such opprobrious epithets. At the same time it must be allowed, that the defendant Charles Davies had been greatly exasperated by what he thought tyranny and cruelty. It was the duty of the Court, however, to prevent individuals from becoming their own avengers, by taking the law into their own hands; and it accordingly sentenced William Davies to be confined for four months, and Charles Davies for two months, in the King's Bench, their recognizances to keep the peace being continued for five years.

In re MARIA DOBBIN.

This lady in the last term was brought up, having disobeyed a writ of Habeas Corpus, obtained to compel her to give up her daughter, a child six years of age, to the custody of its father, Mr. Dobbin. She was directed, to answer interrogatories, and was this day placed upon the floor to receive the further directions of the Court. She was neatly and simply dressed, and was accompanied by a female something beyond the middle age.

Mr. DENMAN appeared on behalf of Mrs. Dobbin. It was not his client's wish that these unfortunate domestic circumstances should be further exposed, and it was most desirable that some individual should be found, who should arbitrate between them, and determine in what manner the mother should be allowed to see her child.

Mr. SCARLETT observed, that the object of the father was to place the child at some respectable school distant from London, for to be near her mother might be most prejudicial to her. Mr. Dobbin had reason to believe that the child was his, but the mother was at this moment living in London under circumstances.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH interrupted Mr. Scarlett, by stating that a letter was lying before him of such a nature as to show that at least the father ought not to be intrusted in this case.

The letter referred to was handed to Mr. Scarlett, who, after reading it, consulted Mr. Dobbin. The Learned Counsel then said, that he could not, nor did his client wish to justify it: their Lordships, however, could not judge of the dreadful provocation the injured husband had received.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH then proposed a further reference to the Master, who might name a third person to decide regarding the custody of the child, and the intercourse of the parents with it: probably it would be found that neither father nor mother ought to have the custody of the child.

Mr. DENMAN said, that it at present was not under the control of the mother.

Mr. SCARLETT.—The father cannot submit that his child should be under the care of a woman who is now under the protection of another man, who has sent him a challenge, and who is now in Court.

Mrs. DOBBIN (with emphasis).—My Lords, it is false: it is not in human nature to endure what I have suffered patiently: I must revolt at the idea of being separated from my child. If a challenge has been sent, it was occasioned by this man's vile conduct to me, but he is too cowardly to accept it.

Nothing further was said; but a reference to the Master was agreed to on the terms suggested by Lord Ellenborough.

On the motion of Mr. Gaselee, the Court granted a rule for a criminal information against Thomas Graham, Esq., a Magistrate of the Borough of Fowey, on affidavits, from which it appeared that Mr. Graham, from corrupt motives, and to favour the political interest of a Mr. Lucy, had passed, irregularly, the accounts of the overseers of the poor without due examination.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

On Friday, a gentleman's servant, out of place, was charged by the Marquis of HEARFORTH with a breach of the peace, for having entered his house and demanded the payment of money. The defendant walked to the Office with the Marquis without reluctance, saying he had done no wrong. The Marquis was asked, whether he was put in bodily fear, when he answered in the affirmative.—The Servant positively denied that he had used any sort of violence; all he had said was, that he should ask the Marquis for his money meet him where he would.—The Magistrate held him to bail.—It appears that the Marquis, about nine years ago, borrowed 600*l.* of this person, who subsequently took a debenture, but has not since been able to get either interest or principal. The people in the Office said it was a very hard case.

BOW-STREET.

Yesterday a gentleman calling himself Major Ramsey, of the South American Army, was brought up on the following extraordinary charge:—

Mr. J. Lamb, a gentleman residing in St. James's-square, stated, that on Friday night, as he was escorting a lady from her box at Covent Garden Theatre, the prisoner came before them and behaved impudently to the lady, and refused to let them pass. Witness offered him his card, in order to give him any satisfaction; which seemed to pacify him; but when they had got to the bottom of the lobby stairs, the prisoner suddenly knocked him down with a blow from a heavy stick, by which several of his teeth were loosened. The prisoner then pulled out a pair of pistols and presented one at him, but as he was about to draw the trigger, witness dashed the weapon aside, and ran into the saloon much frightened. Churchill, the box-keeper, and Donaldson, the officer, then rushed upon the prisoner, whom they disarmed, and lodged in the watchhouse.

The pistols were produced, they were loaded with powder and ball. The prisoner said he pulled them out, and handed one to Mr. Lamb, for the purpose of settling the matter on the spot.—The prisoner was committed. He was dressed in every respect ala-militaire, and wore mustachios.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

The congregation in Hampstead Church were thrown into the greatest consternation and alarm, at the time of Divine Service on Sunday last, from the most piercing cries of Murder, Murder, issuing from one of the pews. The service was immediately at a stand, and every eye was turned to the spot whence the cries issued; when it was discovered that they proceeded from a respectable-looking woman, in a state of mental derangement. The beadies, with the assistance of some gentlemen, succeeded in taking her away, whilst she kept crying out that she was got into a slaughter-house.

Saturday week, a fine youth, about 11 years of age, the son of Mr. Kindlay, late of Bath, playing with a Newfoundland dog, the animal suddenly seizing him by the mouth and throat; and, before it could be disengaged, it lacerated his face in the most shocking manner, so as to endanger the life of the child. Surgical aid was soon obtained, and there is great hope that the boy may be restored.

About half-past eight on Wednesday evening a fire broke out at the house of a plumber and glazier, Charlotte-terrace, opposite the Cobourg Theatre, and raged with the greatest fury until the house was consumed. The people adjoining got most part of their property out into the street, and were robbed of many articles. There was a great difficulty in finding water, the engines being full three quarters of an hour before they could be supplied, though the firemen used every exertion.

No. 526.

OLD MAY-DAY,—(NEXT WEDNESDAY.)

AGREEABLY to the promise which we made at Christmas, and which we are glad to find our readers have not forgotten, we proceed to remind our busy and beloved countrymen of another season enjoyed by their happier ancestors. It was left for the delicious statesmen of modern times to find out that politics, and indeed the whole business of life, consisted in the pursuit of wars and money,—in crowding cities and forsaking the fields,—in manufactures and disease,—in wants, toils, stocks, consols, jobs, policies, contracts, lotteries, shops, offices, gobbings, gormandizings, insolvent horrors, unwarrantable property, shocking poverty,—and all such follies and miseries, the very terms of which follow each other like the goggling chatter of a poor madman. We shall not repeat our remarks however on this part of the subject. We have said a good deal upon it to the only persons who are likely to benefit by our endeavours, the rising generation; and what we have left unsaid, their predecessors are anxious enough to supply by overworking them, and disgusting them; and shewing how foolish, tyrannical, and discontented they are themselves. The glimpse of a piece of sky or field from the window of a manufactory, the sight of the money-getter's bloated or care-worn countenance, the sneaking or bullying look of an unhappy parliamentary corruptionist,—all these are so many volumes of eloquence against the system; and the last argument for altering it is fast approaching, in the awful necessity for so doing. Good God! That any set of men should want such an argument for reminding them of the beautiful world they live in! That they should have so glorious a garden to expatiate in, and yet with an infatuation which children may despise them for, abandon it, to crowd, as it were, into brick-kilns and slaughter-houses!

But to return to the pleasanter and more persuasive side of the question,—the enjoyment itself. We have chosen to write on Old May-Day instead of New, for several reasons; the principal of which are these,—that it is the day associated in one's mind with the cheerful wisdom of old times;—that inasmuch as it is later in the season, it stands a chance of being a finer day;—and that New May-Day can still be kept, and the old one, in the liberal spirit of our ancestors, be made an additional holiday; for "a morn of May" was often observed by them as well as the first of the month.

The custom of welcoming the leafy and flowery season of the year has been derived from a variety of nations; and each derivation appears so well established, that by a natural paradox it amounts to nothing. The fact is, that the cause is in the season itself, and not in the nation. All countries are naturally glad of the return of an agreeable time; and according to their respective superstitions or imaginations, they have shewn their enjoyment. The ancient Eastern nations celebrated the return of the Sun; the Greeks and Romans kept the holidays of the rural gods and goddesses,—Pan, Ceres, and Flora; and among other customs retained by Christendom from the Pagans, and added to their own manifestations of joy, was that of hanging a pole with flowers in May, and dancing about it in delight. Our festive enjoyment of the Spring was no doubt made up of the respective customs of our Saxon ancestors and our Roman invaders; and while the hunting and fishing occupations of the former gave way to more civilized habits, the honours of May partook still more of the Roman character, till at last its celebration put on almost entirely a classic appearance. We allude to the May-pole just mentioned, to the songs and dances, and to the choice of a Lady of the May, the representative of the ancient Flora. CHAUCER, who flourished in the time of EDWARD the 3d. and his successor, and who, although he was a politician and a reformer, zealous enough even in his old age to get imprisoned for the space of four years, took a special delight in rural pleasures, makes repeated mention of the enjoyments of May, representing his heroines as watchful observers of the season, and describing the whole court going out from high to low

To fetch the floures fresh, and branch, and blome;—
And namely, hawthorn brought both page and grone,
And then rejoyssen in their grete delite;
Eke ech at othre throw the floures bright,
The primrose, the violete, and the gold,
With freshe garlants party blew and white.

This custom continued in full force till the time of the Puritans, who first complimented heaven with attributing to it a dislike of seeing the world happy. In the days of SHAKESPEARE, which are those to which we chiefly refer on these subjects, and in which the manly and intellectual as well as rural character of the nation was at it's height, the return of May was welcomed with one universal bustle of delight from the throne to the cottage. SPENSER painted his lovely Raphaelian picture of the month from what he had seen:—

Then came faire May, the fayrest mayd on ground,
Deckt all with dainties of her season's pryde,
And throwing floures out of her lap around:
Upon two brethren's shoulders she did ride,
The Twinnes of Leda; which on eyther side
Supported her like to their sovraine queene.
Lord! how all creatures laught when her they spide,
And leapt and daunct as they had ravisht beene!
And Cupid selfe about her flattered all in greene.

The general custom among the youth was to rise before the dawn, and go to meet it, as it were, with songs and music in the fields and woods. There they plucked flowers and branches, and returning triumphantly with them at sunrise, decorated the doors and windows, till the whole place in which they dwelt looked as rural with greenwood-boughs as it did with evergreens at Christmas. The peasants at the same time, taking forth a number of oxen, tied garlands about their horns, and then yoking them together to carry it, brought home a new May-pole, or a trunk of an elm-tree, to fix it on. It was covered with flowers and other productions of the field, and sometimes painted with various colours: Round this the happy villagers or townspeople danced (for the town in those days had not become overgrown and mercenary enough to feel such a separation from country as now:)—the gentry presided over manly sports; the ladies distributed the prizes; the court entertained itself with masks and revels; the SYDNEYS, RALEIGHS, and SHAKESPEARES, wrote songs, which were set to music, and which almost every body could sing from the music-book; and the Great Spirit was most gloriously honoured in one universal enjoyment of his beautiful creation.

In the month of May, says good old Stow, "namely, on May-day in the morning, every man, except impediment, would walk into the sweete meddows and green woods, there to rejoice their spirits with the beauty and savour of sweete flowers, and with the harmony of birds praising God in their kind."* But the opinion of good old Stow was not that of a godly but less renowned person yeleft STUBBES, who in his puritanical work the Anatomie of Abuses, rages, as if he would pull down the poor happy May-pole with his own proper claws. "Thus equipped," saith he, with his eyes staring for indignation, "it is reared with handkerchiefs and flagges streaming on the top; they strawe the ground round about it; they bind green boughs about it; they set up summer halles, bowers, and arbours, hard by it; and then fall they to banquetting and feasting, to leaping and dancing about it, as the heathen people did at the dedication of their idolls." It was enough for Master STUBBES, that the heathens did it; and of course it became an abomination. Its own merits were another matter, except indeed that it was a "pleasant pastime," which of course was an abomination also. He might have exclaimed, as a lover in a modern play does, when remonstrating against the vivacity of his mistress, "The life of the company! Have I been the life of the company? Have I made you all ready to die with laughter?"—But addeth the pious but chuckling STUBBES, "I have heard it credibly reported, by men of great gravity, credite, and reputation, that of fourtie, three-score, or an hundred maides going to the wood, there have scarcely the third part of them returned home againe as they went." Ay, Master PHILIP? And how came these men of great gravity and reputation to be so accurately informed? They had been the most selfish, we suppose, of the whole set of love-makers in their youth, and so taken to grim intolerance and to a bad opinion of all their kindlier fellow-creatures in their old age. That the impulses ran a little riot on these occasions, can easily be imagined; but that they ended in a kindlier manner, and were at any rate of a better nature than those of intolerance, and solitary gain, and mere profligacy, will be as easily conceived, by comparing the general character of ELIZABETH'S age with the sullen one of the Puritans and the heartless sensuality which was the consequence of it in the reign of CHARLES the Second. Before MILTON suffered his imagination to be degraded into fellowship with these vulgar mistakers, (whom by the way he soon despised, and there is reason to believe ultimately differed entirely with) he, a happy and innocent youth, did not scruple to thank the month of May, in that graceful little Ode of his, for its amorous inspiration. We will quote the whole piece, as it is short, and altogether to our purpose. He calls it a SONG ON MAY MORNING.

Now the bright Morning-star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.
Hail, bounteous May! who dost inspire
Mirth, and youth, and warm desire;
Woods and groves are of thy dressing;
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing!
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee, and wish thee long.

And BEN JONSON, who while he bitterly satirized vice, carried his admiration of real virtue to a sort of human piety, has a passage in his Sad Shepherd respecting the growing puritanism of JAMES the First's age, in which he vindicates the kindliness of these pastimes with his usual contempt of sophistications, though his disdain is made gentle by his subject. He puts it with great propriety into the mouths of ROBIN HOOD and his companions, who in the sixteenth century had become chief characters in the celebration of May-games. This passage also, though much longer than MILTON'S Ode; we shall extract for the particular nature of its allusions, some of which are singularly applicable to the present times:

Robin. Welcome, bright Clarion, and sweet Melliflour,
The courteous Lionel, and fair Amie, all
My friends and neighbours to the jolly bower
Of Robin Hood and to the greenwood walks.
Now that the shearing of your sheep is done,
And the washed flocks are lighted of their wool,
Why should you or you or we so much forget
The season in ourselves as not to make Use of our youth and spirits to awake
The nimble hornpipe and the timburrine,
And mix our songs and dances in the wood,
And each of us cut down a triumph bough?
Such were the rites the youthful June allow.

Clarion. They were, gay Robin; but the sorer sort
Of shepherds now disclaim in all such sport,
And say our flock the while are poorly led.

Tuck. Would they, wise Clarion, were not hurried more
With covetise and rage, when to their store
They add the poor man's canting and dare sell
Both fleece and carcase, not giving him the fell;
Or dig deep pits their neighbours' neat to vex,
To drown the calves and crack the heifer's necks;
Or with pretence of chasing thence the brock,
Send in a cur to worry the whole flock.

Lionel. O friar, those are faults that are not seen;
Our's open, and of worst example been.
They call ours pagan pastimes, that infect
Our blood with ease, our youth with all neglect,
Our tongues with wantonness, our thoughts with lust;
And what they censure ill, all others must.

Robin. I do not know what their sharp sight may see
Of late; but I should think it still might be,
As 'twas, a happy age, when on the plains
The woodman met the damsels and the swains,
The neat herds, ploughmen, and the pipers loud;
And each did dance; some to the kit or crowd;
Some to the bag-pipe, some the tab'ret mov'd;
And all did either love, or were beloved.

Lionel. The dextrous shepherd then would try his sling,
Then dart his hook at daisies, then would sing;
Sometimes would wrestle.

Clarion. Ay, and with a lass,
And give her a new garment on the grass,
After a course at barley-break or base.

Lionel. And all these things were seen without offence,
Or the least hazard of their innocence.

Robin. Those charitable times had no mistrust;
Shepherds knew how to love, and not to lust.

Here is the whole history of the loss of our rural pleasures. First came religious bigotry with its cant against vanity,—which would talk the colour out of the flowers and the rainbow down from the sky:—then came covetousness, which made enjoyment consist in scraping every thing towards itself;—and as both these vices destroy all real sympathy, the animal passion, of which they could not have got rid if they would, and which had been before exalted into taste and mutual kindness, became degraded into mere lust,—a word almost abhorrent to write.

We need not follow the declension of these pleasures through all its gradations. They never well recovered the dreary follies of the Puritans. At the Revolution they were almost confined to the lower orders, and very faintly shewed itself among them. The May-pole which Pope speaks of as existing in the Strand, was only a curiosity, and was taken down in his time to form a support for a large telescope in Wanstead Park,—a very allegorical incident. We think we remember something about milkmaids and their garlands in our boyish days; but even this lingering piece of professional rejoicing is gone; and instead of intellectual pleasures at courts, manly games among the gentry, the vernal appearance every where of boughs and flowers, and the harmonious accompaniment of ladies' looks, all the idea that a Londoner now has of May-day, is the dreary gambols and tinsel-fluttering squalidness of the poor chimney-sweepers! What a personification of the times;—paper-gilded dirt, slavery, and melancholy, bustling for another penny!

Something like celebrations of May-day still loiter in more remote parts of the country, such as Cornwall, Devonshire, and Westmoreland; and it is observable, that most of the cleverest men of the time come from such quarters, or have otherwise chanced upon some kind of insulation from its more sophisticated common-places. Should the subject come before the consideration of any persons in those quarters, who have not had occasion to look at it with reference to the general character of the age, they will do a great good, and perhaps help eventually to alter it, by fanning the little sparks that are left them of a brighter period. With regard to such of us as have a more difficult task elsewhere, we need not disturb ourselves with supposing we make little immediate impression, or even attempt to make any at all upon the elder part of the sophisticated. Our business is to do what we can, to remind the others of what they may do, to pay honours to the season ourselves, and to wait for that alteration in the times, which the necessity of things must produce, and which we must endeavour to influence as genially as possible in its approach.

We have the great pleasure of knowing that not a few of our readers were glad to be reminded of the Christmas enjoyments of their ancestors, and that many a room echoed in consequence with laughter over the Wassel-Bowl. This alone is a great good. We have a right also to suppose, that what we know was but a part of the old English festivity that we helped to increase. We now therefore call again upon these admirers of the good and beautiful to help us in "rescuing nature from obloquy." All you that are lovers of nature in books,—lovers of music, painting, and poetry,—lovers of sweet sounds, and odours, and colours, and all the eloquent and happy face of the rural world with its eyes of sunshine,—you, that are lovers of your species, of youth, and health, and old age, of manly strength in the manly, of nymph-like grace in the female,—of air, of exercise, of happy currents in your veins,—of the light in great Nature's picture,—of all the gentle spiriting, the loveliness, the luxury, that now stands under the smile of Heaven, silent and solitary as your fellow-creatures have left it,—of the whole world of fields, trees, and brooks, and birds, as if our Paradise was close to us and none would enter it,—go forth on May-day, or on the earliest fine May-morning if that be not fine, and pluck your flowers and your green-boughs to adorn your rooms with, and to shew that you do not live in vain. These April rains (for May has not yet come, according to the Old Style, which is the proper one of our climate) these April rains are fetching forth the full luxury of the trees and hedges:—by the next sunshine, all "the green weather," as a little gladsome child called it, will have come again; the hedges will be so many thick verdant walls, the fields mossy carpets, the trees clothed to their finger-tips with foliage, the birds saturating the woods with song. Come forth, come forth; and if you should meet a money-getter or a bigot by the way, who calls upon you to turn, refer the one to the "time for all things," and "the lilies of the valley," and the other to the song of the lover, the king, and the wise man, whose glory these lilies surpassed:—

Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away.
For lo! the winter is past; the rain is over and gone;
The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come; and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land;
The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—At the conclusion of your delightful papers at Christmas, on the revival of old English hospitality, you promised that at the return of May-day you would notice the manner in which our ancestors were wont to hail the opening of summer. I trust you have not forgotten the obligation you have laid yourself under to gratify many of your readers, who still preserve a lively taste for those genuine delights the God of Nature and of Harmony has so bountifully lavished upon us at this verdant season, but which none more truly appreciates than your former Correspondent. An attempt to re-kindle the expiring embers of ancient conviviality at the former season was a desirable task; but in this heartless and money-getting age, amid a race of smoke-loving and city-loving beings, it seems yet more desirable to revive a taste for the pure and unsophisticated pleasures with which the country, and the country only, abounds:—

"Where Flora laughs at every vain regret,
"And sweetly whispers to our ear—forget."

So vitiated is the taste of this degenerate age, so absorbed are the finer feelings of the soul in the all-consuming passion of over-weening wealth, that pleasures connected with rural life appear to live only in the poet's fabled song, or with Arcadian ages. Yet a reference to the pages of our too-much neglected bards will prove, that our ancestors met not "the Mother of Flowers" with the ungrateful indifference of modern times. Beaumont and Fletcher speak of Morris-dancers and May-games, of Masques and Revelries held, not in crowded drawing-rooms indeed, but "under the greenwood tree," beneath the azure vault of heaven. Then the landowner did no disdain to mingle with the tiller of the soil; but as he pledged him the "Wassail-bowl" at Christmas tide, so at the return of May he loved to greet the holiday merriment of his hardy peasantry with cordial sympathy. The best characters in the village were annually selected as the King and Queen of the May; and this simple but judicious distinction tended in no small degree to improve the morals and excite a laudable spirit of emulation among the lower classes. Madame de GENLIS' comedy of La Rosière de Silenoy has ever struck me as one of the most affecting pictures of moral beauty, and as worthy of imitation throughout the country. In some parts of our island May-day is still kept with rustic cheerfulness: the many-coloured garland is carried about in triumph. In parts of Ireland, the peasantry assemble, dressed in their best apparel, and carry in procession huge pyramids of flowers, singing an air of very ancient origin, which has been carefully preserved from father to son:—

"Tu an Shamradh teacht."

"We bring summer with us."

and thus welcome in the "coming year." Would to God that the votaries of the Hazard Table and the Slaves of the Loom could once more, with minds attuned to such peaceful delights, return to our deserted groves and fields! We might then hope to see cheerful industry take place of squalid want, and the ruddy hue of health visit the cheek, where now disease has fixed its pallid ensign.

Condemned by hopeless sickness myself never more to walk abroad and view the face of Nature, it seems incomprehensible that those who are blessed with a happier fate can renounce such sources of happiness, and barter health and liberty for sordid gold!—But as every day's experience proves to us that the simple pleasures of pastoral life are no longer appreciated, and that avarice is the ruling vice of the age, it behoves every true lover of his country to stem the baneful torrent of luxury by every means in his power; and a pen as eloquent as yours can ably serve her best interests, in placing the false glare of the present system of things in their true light.—I am, Sir, with cordial esteem, your constant reader,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN AND A LOVER OF NATURE.

South Lambeth, April 27, 1818.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, APRIL 30.—The Chamber of Peers was occupied, in the sitting of the 25th, with the consideration of a report delivered by the Vicomte de Montmorency, touching a petition from Lord Kinnaird, who appealed against the conduct of the King's Government, in arresting one Martinet, to whom Lord Kinnaird asserted that a promise of safe conduct to and from Paris had been held out, if he should make certain discoveries respecting the Duke of Wellington's proposed assassination. It seems pretty clearly stated, that no promise whatever was held out to Martinet, either by the Duke of Wellington, or by the French Ministers; that Martinet made no disclosures of any consequence, but was arrested on a strong suspicion of being himself implicated in the crime which he professed to denounce. The petition of the Noble Lord was, on these grounds, referred to the President of the Council of Ministers.

MAY 2.—On the 1st inst. the Chamber of Deputies adopted the project of the law creating 16,040,000 francs rentes, for the purpose of liquidating the foreign claims against France, and opening an eventual credit of 24,000,000 of francs to complete the payment of the sums due to the Allied Powers, conformably to the Treaty of the 20th of Nov. 1815. No Member expressed a desire to speak on the proposition, but the Chamber divided, when there appeared for the law 162, against it 17. The profoundest silence, says the Moniteur, reigned throughout the Chamber.

GERMANY.

FRANKFORT, APRIL 22.—The following letters have been published, which throw some light on the negotiations that have been long pending between the Courts of Munich and Baden:—

LETTER FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND DUKE OF BADEN TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF BAVARIA.

"SIRE,—It is with great reluctance that I prevail on myself to address your Majesty upon a subject which must be as disagreeable to your personal feelings as it is to mine; but the urgency of the case renders it necessary at length to break a silence which, from motives of delicacy, I have perhaps observed too long. For these three years past I have been threatened with having a part of my dominions torn from me; and while my country made the greatest exertions to enable me to maintain, in an effectual and honourable manner, the last struggle for the independence of Germany, my allies are endeavouring to tear from me my finest provinces, and are disposing, during my life, of my succession. In the various negotiations that have taken place, I think I have proved to the whole world the insufficiency of the reason alleged to excuse this violation of my most sacred rights, and public opinion has already decided in my favour, even before the full extent of the injustice was known of which it is intended to make me a victim. If it is mortifying to my heart to see how many persons, who have declared in the face of the whole world, that they took arms wholly to destroy the dominion of arbitrary power, to introduce into Europe a political system founded on the basis of morality, suffer themselves to be influenced by false representations that are made to them, that their debts are to be paid with provinces that belong to me, and the preservation of which has been purchased with the blood of my subjects, what a painful feeling must it excite in me, when I see my nearest relations at the head of those who seek to oppress me, and who, not contented with accepting that of which I am to be robbed, urge the execution of measures to which they ought never to have given their consent!—I am embarrassed in my mind when I endeavour to reconcile the continually renewed offensive steps of your Majesty's Cabinet with the expressions of attachment which you continue to bestow on me. In so serious an affair, I find it impossible to separate the Government from its head, so as to find in the latter my relation and friend, while the former shows itself my bitter enemy. I at length owe you my confession of faith. It is time that the affair should be decided one way or another, or I must declare to your Majesty, that as I believe myself to have more than fulfilled my engagements, as well by the exertions which my country has made for the common cause, as by the last conciliatory proposal which my Ambassador delivered at Frankfort, I am now irrevocably resolved not to consent to any thing further. I am not blind to the situation in which I am. Nothing surprises me; I am prepared for every thing; but I declare to you, Sire, that if there should be an intention of tearing from me, by force, what never will be obtained voluntarily, I appeal, for my support, to public opinion, and your Majesty will hardly find a more powerful ally. To the King I have now said enough. The feelings of my heart call on me to add a word to my brother-in-law and friend. I therefore conjure you, Sir, by the ties of blood which unite us, to put an end to a negotiation which has too long attracted the anxious eyes of Europe; and which, by the establishment of the principle on which it is founded, may have as dangerous consequences for your Majesty as for me.—I am, &c.

Carlsruhe, March 18, 1818.

"CHARLES."

ANSWER OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF BAVARIA.

"MY DEAR BROTHER AND BROTHER-IN-LAW,—I have read, with equal astonishment and regret, the letter of your Royal Highness; and I cannot sufficiently express to you what a painful impression it has made on me. You know, the public and private negotiations, which have taken place since 1815. Your Minister for Foreign Affairs was witness to the conventions concluded at Paris between the four powers who signed the treaty of 1815: he knows that I had no share in them. The memorial which my Minister delivered on this occasion is inscribed among the public acts. We have all fought in the bravest manner, the German troops emulated each other in their exertions. The general interest has nevertheless demanded sacrifices; I have made such, as well as the greatest members of the confederation

If the Ambassadors of your Royal Highness are well informed, they will have informed you that the course which I have followed for these two years has been wholly conformable to the sentiments that unite us; and that, far from inducing measures against you, I have made it a rule to wait in silence the regulation of the interests on which depend the conclusion of the Acts which will fix the fate of Europe. I do not allow myself to make to your Royal Highness any remark on the resolution you take. It is for you, in your wisdom, to decide on what the well understood interests of your house and your people require. But whatever events may ensue, they will never have any influence on the personal feelings which bind me to a relation who will be ever dear to be, and will never lessen the friendship and tender attachment which I cherish for your Royal Highness, and with which I am, &c.

"MAX. JOSEPH."

EAST INDIES.

A Bombay Gazette and letters to the 7th of last January, bring intelligence of an important nature from the seat of war in India. It appears that instead of the Pindarrees being the only foe with whom Lord Hastings has to contend, they seem to be almost the only one with whom, as yet, he has had no actual conflict. All the Mahrattas have broken their engagements. Two victories are stated to have been the result of two battles. The first of these actions, in point of time, took place between the division of the British army under the command of General Doveton, and the troops of the Rajah of Berar; which Chieftain was raised to the sovereignty by British interference, and to the exclusion of a candidate protected by Scindiah. In consequence of some hostile dispositions in that state, General Doveton moved upon Nagpoor, and reached it on the 12th December. The Resident then announced to the Rajah the conditions on which the Company would grant him peace. On the 16th, information was received that the Rajah had complied with our demands, and might be looked for immediately in the British camp. He came accordingly, surrendering his person and his guns, and sending an agent to his own officers to enforce his orders. But on the advance of the British army to have them carried into execution, the Mahrattas fired on our columns and attacked us with a formidable body of troops. Our infantry moved forward, charged the batteries with the bayonet, and instantly carried them. Their cavalry was attacked and completely routed. We got possession of the whole of their guns; 75 in number, with the loss of but 130 of our men. The second action was fought with the troops of Holkar, by the Madras army under Sir Thomas Hislop, and Sir John Malcolm. The last accounts left these Officers on the banks of the Nerbudda, on crossing which stream they found themselves in close contact with the dominions of Holkar, Scindiah, and the Pindarrees. Here, on the left bank of the Sapoora river, the Mahrattas opened a tremendous fire, silencing seven out of fourteen of the English field-pieces; but a battery of 40 pieces of cannon which covered his right wing, was stormed and carried, the enemy's gunners dying bravely at their posts. Our troops then moved to the enemy's left, where his batteries were stormed with the same gallantry and success. The Mahratta army then dispersed, and we encamped in their position. The loss sustained by Holkar in this engagement was calculated at 2,000 men, besides the whole of his artillery, consisting of 65 pieces of cannon. But the spirit and obstinacy with which the Mahrattas fought, were evinced by the number of killed and wounded on our side, which amounted to no less than 81 Officers, together with 700 rank and file. No farther particulars have yet been communicated, nor have we any ground for conjecturing how the above successes of our arms may influence the ulterior operations of the war. Scindiah was suspected of shuffling, in the teeth of his recent treaty, as he had not furnished the stipulated body of 5,000 horse; nor had his Killedar surrendered the cautionary fortress of Asseerghur, when summoned by the orders of Lord Hastings. In the neighbourhood of Poonah the campaign seems to languish, General Smith having effected nothing beyond his first march in pursuit of the Peishwa, and the troops of the latter being dispirited by their encounter with Colonel Burr. Thus the war is alive throughout the centre of India.

A Supplement to the Gazette of Tuesday was published on Wednesday, containing Dispatches received at the India-house, addressed to the Secret Committee by the Governor in Council of Bombay. They consist chiefly of Letters from General Hislop, Doveton, and Smith, and Colonel Scott; but, on the whole, so far as these dispatches are published, they add nothing whatever to the sum of the above intelligence, and present the details of it with scarcely any variation. The account of the victory gained over Holkar is contained in a short and hurried letter, written by Sir Thomas Hislop, from the field of battle, on the 21st December. The action was fought on the bank of the Sapoora, opposite Maheidpoor, considerably to the North of Indoor and Ougein, which capitals of the two leaders, Holkar and Scindiah, the Madras army must have passed in its march towards the enemy. The result of the action is in a subsequent dispatch described, as before, to have been the capture of Holkar's camp, with the greater portion of his artillery, and the loss on his part of about 2,000 men. The British loss was not exaggerated, when it was stated at upwards of 80 officers and 700 men killed or wounded. The engagement between Colonel Scott and the troops of Berar was long, obstinate, and bloody. It lasted from the evening of the 26th of November to 12 o'clock on the following day; and although the enemy was repulsed, and six of his guns captured, it was not until of Colonel Scott's small force, 14 officers and 349 non-commissioned and privates, were left among the killed and wounded. We are not enabled, by any passage of the Gazette, to explain distinctly the causes of hostility between Sir T. Hislop and Holkar, or between Col. Scott and the troops of the Rajah of Berar. Sir Thomas merely says, that his battle arose from failure of the negotiations with the Government of Holkar, and "from the repeated acts of aggression and insult which we had experienced since our advance from Ougein on the 14th inst." It is not specified or even hinted at what were those insults and aggressions. Again, we are told, that on the 25th of November Colonel Scott took a position which commanded Nagpoor, at the requisition of Mr. Jenkins, the Resident; but he does not inform us what were the provocations to this march. It is plain, however, that the Berar troops were neither beaten nor dispirited in the action with that officer, since, on the 14th December following, they encountered the army commanded by General Doveton, in a battle of much greater importance. The issue of this new contest was the complete defeat of the Rajah of Berar's numerous array, who, it would appear, opposed the British in defiance of the orders of their chief. The camp-equipment of the Mahrattas fell on this occasion into our hands, with 40 elephants, and 75 pieces of cannon. These actions complete the military history, to the extent to which it has been thought right to publish it, of our affairs in the centre of India.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 7.

ROYAL GRANTS.

On the 81 reading of the Duke of Cambridge's Annuity Bill, a conversation arose, in which Lord LAUDERDALE noticed the proceedings respecting the Duke of Cumberland, which he thought altogether unfair and improper. He said, that if provision was to be granted on the event of a Royal Marriage, it should not be given from partiality and personal considerations, but upon public grounds. He did not understand why a stigma was to be cast on the Royal Duke; and as for his Royal Consort, she had submitted to the will of her husband, and there was now nothing to injure her feelings, except the observations which had appeared in the public papers, and these he could not help believing to be misrepresentations of what had passed in another place (the House of Commons). He did not suppose it possible that there could be any person so base as to malign an illustrious stranger in the way the representations to which he had alluded indicated. If there were any man possessing such a mind, he might perhaps have the satisfaction of knowing that he had given pain; but he would also see an example of the exercise of the most virtuous feelings in the quarter where he had thrown his unjust reflections.

Lord HOLLAND observed, that Ministers, though they had thought it right to recommend very large sums to members of the Royal Family, could endure the rejection of their proposition with the greatest tranquillity. They had pocketed the affront, and kept their places. At the same time, he agreed with his Noble Friend that it was quite improper to canvass the characters of those for whom such grants were proposed; but then his objection went to the whole of the system acted upon. He could not admit that Parliament were bound to grant a provision on the marriage of a member of the Royal Family, as a matter of course; for though the Royal Marriage Act placed in the Crown the sole right of consent, it must be recollected that the Constitution had placed in the House of Commons the sole right of granting money. He had risen, however, not to oppose the sum proposed, but the imposing of any additional burden on the public. If their Lordships considered what had already been granted to the Crown, they would find that it enjoyed at least double what, at the commencement of this reign, it had a right to expect. He had come down unprepared with calculations, but he would prove what he then asserted, whenever the Noble Earl might please to enter at large into the question.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL did not mean to say that the House of Commons had not the right of acting as they had done; but, at the same time, he perfectly concurred with the Noble Earl in the general principles he laid down. Such distinctions made by Parliament must lead to decisions more or less capricious, and consequently unjust. He was ready to enter into a detailed view of the subject, whenever the Noble Baron might think proper to bring it forward; and he was convinced that, on a fair investigation, it would be found that the arrangement made at the commencement of the present reign had placed his Majesty in a less favourable situation with respect to revenue than any sovereign since the Revolution.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed, as was the Duchess of Cumberland's Annuity Bill, and the Loan Bill.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 8.

The Royal Assent was given by commission to the Duke of Cambridge's Annuity Bill, the Duchess of Cumberland's Annuity Bill, the Innkeepers' Rates Bill, the Loan Bill, the Cork Duties Bill, the Exeter, Bath, and Nottingham Gas-lights Bills, Lee's Divorce Bill, and a number of other private Bills, in all 81.

LORD ARDRECH presented a Petition from certain inhabitants of Leeds in favour of the Chimney-sweepers' Regulation Bill. His Lordship stated, that the Petitioners had formed themselves into a society for promoting the use of machinery in sweeping chimnies, and had found its application to that purpose perfectly efficient.

COTTON MANUFACTORIES.

The Earl of LAUBERMOSE presented a Petition from certain spinners in Manchester, and other towns in Lancashire, praying to be heard by Counsel, and to adduce evidence against the Cotton Manufacturers' Regulation Bill. The Noble Earl observed, that the Petitioners not only opposed the Bill generally, but in particular objected to limiting the hours of labour. He was not prepared to state what would be the particulars of the evidence, but this much he understood, that medical men of great reputation would prove that the children in the cotton-manufactories were as healthy as children generally are. The only rational course of proceeding was, to leave labour free, and then the time of labour would be properly regulated between the employers and the employed.

A conversation arose, in which Lord LIVERPOOL asked, was it possible to say that children compelled to labour more than 15 hours a day were not overworked? What evidence could negative that proposition? If all the medical staff of Manchester were brought to the Bar to prove it, he would not believe the evidence.

Here the conversation ended, with an understanding that counsel and evidence should be heard against the Bill before a Committee of the whole House.—Adjourned to Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 4.

OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Captain WALDEGRAVE presented a Petition from Lieutenant Fredrick Bedford, of the Royal Navy, stating his services and the wounds he had received when a Midshipman, and praying for compensation, as his pension was inadequate to his support.

Mr. BENNET wished to know why the Noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty denied his high presence to the Officers of the Navy, while the Illustrious Personage at the head of the Army could be waited upon by the humblest Ensign in the service?

Mr. CROKER was not quite able to give a very distinct answer to the question; but he would observe that the First Lord of the Admiralty was a responsible Minister of the Crown, whereas the Commander-in-Chief held a substantive office. He was not aware that the regulations and rules had been altered. As to Bedford, the reason why he did not receive a pension after promotion was, that his case occurred before the regulations which had been made some years ago.—The Petition was ordered to be printed.

Some conversation took place on the Land Tax Assessment Bill, the committal of which was opposed by Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Lord LOWTHER, and Lord CASTLEREAGH. The House divided, and there was a majority of 36 for the committal.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.—DR. BURNEY'S LIBRARY, &c.

Mr. BANKES moved that 13,500*l.* should be granted to his Majesty for the purchase of Dr. Burney's Library. He said, it was needless for him to enlarge on the policy of not permitting a collection to be dissipated which might require many centuries to accumulate.

Mr. COWPER opposed the motion, as he could not consent to vote a single shilling for any purpose but one of absolute necessity.

Mr. LOCKHART doubted whether a case was made out for the interference of the State. If any thing was to be found in this collection not elsewhere to be obtained, he should be willing to pay money for its preservation; but as for the varieties of verbal criticism, it might well be left to the enthusiasm of virtuosos, while the interference of the State was confined to that which was really useful to mankind.

Sir J. MACKINTOSH protested against the sentiments of the Hon. Member. In that classical education, to which so many superficial objections might be made, was comprised a course of indirect, but not less forcible moral and political instruction, which had the greatest effect in the formation of the character and the mind.—(Hear hear!)—The vote was agreed to without a division.

1,350,000*l.* was voted for Army Extraordinaries of Great Britain, and 60,000*l.* for ditto in Ireland.

Several other sums were voted, among which were—28,000*l.* for the African Ports—394,700*l.* for the Commissariat—99,000*l.* for the Barrack Department—75,000*l.* for the Gold Coinage in 1818—54,327*l.* for the Silver Coinage in 1810—and 60,000*l.* for printing Votes, Papers, Journals, &c. for the House of Commons.

On the vote of the above sum for the Gold Coinage being proposed,

Mr. J. P. GRANT observed, that it was surprising to hear a proposition of this kind at a time when the gold coin could not be kept in the country.

Mr. W. POLE stated, that the law of the land was, that the bullion brought to the Mint should be coined without charge to the owners. Bullion had been, within the last few months, sent in such quantities, that the amount in the year would probably be eight millions. It was therefore necessary to provide for its coinage. Though only two millions of sovereigns had been issued by the Bank, seven millions had been coined, the remainder of which he supposed were in their coffers.

Mr. FINLAY said, if there was no law against the exportation of coin, it would be sent abroad and brought back in that state, and the expence would be spared.

The House then resumed.

POLICE REWARDS.

Mr. BENNET moved the recommittal of the Offenders Reward on Conviction Bill.

Sir C. BURRELL spoke against this Bill, conceiving the grant of rewards necessary to the detection of crimes and the apprehension of criminals.

Mr. BENNET observed, that this Bill provided that persons engaged in apprehending and bringing felons to justice should be duly rewarded; and, therefore, there was no ground for the objection of the Hon. Baronet.

The House having resolved itself into the Committee,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed as an amendment, that rewards should not be abolished altogether, as this Bill proposed, but that it should be left to the discretion of the Judges, to award the whole or any part thereof to the persons apprehending felons, to the witnesses against them, or to those concerned in their prosecution.

Sir S. ROWLEY deprecated the amendment, from a persuasion that its enactment would serve to continue the evil of which every one was heard to complain. That evil was, indeed, of an enormous magnitude. The system of rewards was indeed so operative in producing an eagerness for conviction, that he had himself known a case in which a father sought the conviction of his son, in order to obtain the reward. The eagerness which was now evinced to get the verdict of a Jury, would, after the adoption of this amendment, be employed to obtain the recommendation of a Judge, and it was idle to suppose that the evil dence which contrived to impose upon the former, would have no effect upon the latter.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL contended that the clause proposed would answer the purpose of preventing such conspiracy in future, by investing the Judges with the discretionary power of granting or refusing rewards.

After some farther observations, the amendment was agreed to.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, May 5.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT presented 53 Petitions from Leeds, (signed, as we understood, by 20 each,) praying the early attention of the House to the subject of Parliamentary Reform, stating the evils of an oligarchy, and that Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage were the only means of restoring the Constitution.—The Petitions were received. The first of them was read, and ordered to be printed.—Sir F. Burdett then presented 42 similar Petitions from Halifax.—Ordered to lie on the table.

PURIFY OF PARLIAMENT!—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

SIR F. BURDETT addressed the House on the case of Thomas Ferguson, who had been committed to Newgate for a breach of privilege, he having written a letter to Mr. Dykes, offering him a bribe for his vote. Sir Francis said, that in committing Ferguson to prison it was impossible not to see that the grossest injustice had been done him, when they called to mind, that a Noble Lord opposite (Castlereagh) had been found guilty of much greater corruption, which the House had suffered to pass unpunished. It was the duty of the House to dispense equal justice to the poor and the rich. No doubt Ferguson had committed a heinous offence,—he had attempted to influence a vote; but the Noble Lord, when President of the Board of Control, had been concerned in an offence of the most aggravated nature, with which this of Ferguson could not at all compare; yet the House, on that occasion, declared, that as it was a matter proceeding and not completed, though they ought to be very jealous of the freedom of election, they did not think it necessary to direct any measures to be adopted against the Noble Lord! The Noble Lord was a wholesale dealer in this species of traffic; he was for buying a seat; but Ferguson had only attempted to influence a vote. In his case, there was no scandalous abuse of patronage, which was not intrusted to men in office to be converted to any such purposes. The attempt of Ferguson was so inferior, that he should be glad to know, in the name of justice and common sense, why the House had thought proper to send this man to gaol, while the Noble Lord was sitting there without having received any censure whatever? The House would remember, that during the administration of Mr. Perceval and the Noble Lord, a gentleman was introduced into that House under the most corrupt and aggravated circumstances. Mr. Henry Vilesley was the agent who received the money for the seat. Now, so far as any infamy attached to parliamentary corruption, a more corrupt case could not be imagined. When the gentleman (Mr. Dick) entered the House, he was disposed to exercise the dictates of his own conscience, and he preferred giving up his seat to voting contrary to his conscience. To interfere with the right of voting would have been deemed a heinous offence in any individual; but it was ten thousand times worse in a Minister of the Crown. But how did the House act on that occasion? The corruption was justified as being a practice “as notorious as the sun at noon-day;” it was said to be “as common as the streets of the metropolis;” and, therefore, there was no particular reason for condemning the Noble Lord. Now, when it was perfectly well known, that in this way that House was constituted; when it had been shown, in the excellent Petition drawn up by the Friends of the People, and presented in 1793, that Members were returned contrary to law, and to every principle of honesty and justice; when it had been offered to be proved at their Bar, that so many Peers nominated so many Members: it was unjust to imprison a person like Ferguson, under the pretence of preserving their mock purity and independence, while others had thrown over them the broad shield of impunity. When this bright robe of purity was taken off, there was nothing but “dowls, filthy dowls” beneath.—(A laugh.)—Could men look at transactions of this nature, without feeling indignation? He remembered one of Æsop’s fables, in which the beasts of the forest are represented as being visited by a plague. A council is summoned to ascertain the cause of this visitation. The lion acknowledges that he has committed some acts of oppression, but that, all this being very consonant to his royal nature, he could not have produced this dreadful calamity. Several others deliver their sentiments, each in his turn acquitting himself. At last the ass enters on his defence. He states that his life had been one more of suffering than of oppression, but that one day, impelled by hunger, he had stolen a cabbage. Upon this all the beasts set up a shout, and declared, that undoubtedly this conduct of the ass had brought down the vengeance of the gods.—(Loud laughter.)—For his part, he could not understand how Ferguson, who had followed the example of the Noble Lord, but followed him “haud passibus æquis,” should be punished, while the Noble Lord himself had been so fully protected. He should not then detain the House any longer, and therefore he should conclude by moving, “That Thomas Ferguson be discharged forthwith.”

LORD CASTLEREAGH was surprised that the Hon. Baronet had addressed so much of his speech to him. He knew nothing of the case of Ferguson; but it was impossible not to know the object with which the Hon. Baronet had brought forward his motion. It was not out of feeling to Ferguson, but in support of that common cause towards which he had directed all his efforts. Whenever any meeting took place in the metropolis, at which the Hon. Baronet thought that he had lost some part of his popularity, he immediately came down to the House, and started some question in the hope that he should regain it: (Hear, hear!) This was the only object of the present motion; and having stated this, he must leave the discussion of Ferguson’s case to those Members of the House who were better acquainted with it.

MR. C. WYNN did not understand how any one could argue that, because the House of Commons omitted to do its duty nine years ago, it was not to discharge it now. To agree with the Hon. Baronet, would be equivalent to a declaration that bribery against the privileges of Parliament had no punishment. It would go to render nugatory every thing that had been done by our ancestors on the subject, down to the time alluded to.

COLONEL WOOD made some remarks respecting the Middlesex elections in which the Hon. Baronet had been concerned, where persons had voted for him who had no votes, and perjuries had been committed.

MR. BRAND, though he agreed with the Hon. Baronet in many of his arguments, found it impossible to vote with him on his present motion. If the motion should be agreed to, all distinctions on matters like that of Ferguson were at an end; and they would be bound to pass over all infringement of privilege for the time to come. How those who had voted on the former motion could vote in an opposite manner in that case, he could not conjecture. It was for them to determine.

SIR F. BURDETT, in reply, noticed Col. Wood’s observations respecting the Middlesex election, which he had ample reason, he said, to remember. He admired the consistency of the Noble Lord and his colleague in punishing the present case. It would be futile to suffer his motion to go to a division; for one set of men would have to vote against him from consistency; and the other, in despite of the inconsistency, would vote against him; so that, between consistency and inconsistency, he should not press the motion to the vote.—The motion was then negatived without a division.

ALIEN BILL.

LORD CASTLEREAGH observed, that he should never forego, as a principle, that the governing power should have the means of taking suspicious foreigners, and he could never think that hospitality was to be carried so far that danger might result from it, nor could he consider that, when in the country, foreigners ought to be amenable only to its ordinary laws. He could give the House information upon that subject that would show them the importance of the Alien Act. When a number of ill-designing persons had found that they could not in France bring their projects to issue, they had gone to the Netherlands, where making the press their vehicle, they gained such influence, and were so confident, that they were so bold as to open to a great power a proposition to the effect that they might have the protection of that state to their conspiracy, which was for the purpose of overturning the existing Government, and renewing the Government that the country had possessed. The House, he was sure, would feel under all considerations the necessity of the measure. It was known that the conspiracy against the life of an illustrious personage (the Duke of Wellington) was carried on by persons in France and in the Netherlands, in connexion. It was a conspiracy, without doubt, directed against his life, he being the man whose life was most valuable, with a view to the conservation of the order that had been established. He thought it was a duty to arm the executive government with power to redress and break up such combinations. These were the grounds on which he thought it necessary to propose to the House the continuance of the Act, and he trusted such a case would be found to be made out, that the House would not object to it.

Lord ALTHORP and Mr. LAMBTON protested against the principle of this bill.

Sir S. ROMILLY contended that such a Bill was contrary to the principles of the English Constitution, to the policy of our ancestors, and to the feelings of the people. The Bill had been a part of the Continental System, and this country had become ministerial to the despots of Europe.—(Hear, hear!)—England had always been the sanctuary of liberty;—for the outraged victims of foreign oppression, her hallowed soil, once touched by the persecuted refugees, was absolute safety from further persecution. He should be unworthy of the protection he and his ancestors had received against persecutions, such as were at the present moment suffered in Spain, if he did not struggle to extend the same benefits to others.—The former Alien Bills, he said, had, till 1816, been brought into the House by the Secretary for the Home Department, the official guardian of internal tranquillity, not by the Representative of the Despots of Europe. (Hear!) It had been, then, for the first time, introduced by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and for the preservation of peace in other countries. The Noble Lord had talked of it as a mitigated measure. In what respect was it mitigated? It was not limited to those who had not come into the country previously to the passing of the Bill; not to those who lately came in, but it extended to those who were long established here; and by the returns before the House there appeared to be not less than 20,000 persons who had fixed upon this country as their choice: and those persons were now to be banished from the country at any moment when the Minister chose; nay, what was infinitely worse, when any individual, from private motives, chose to complain of them. The Bill was utterly unnecessary, was derogatory to the character of the nation, as subservient to the evil designs of other countries, and he could not suffer it to pass through this first stage without resisting it as much as was in his power.

The House then divided upon the question, that leave be given to bring in the Bill.—Ayes, 55—Noes, 18—Majority in favour of the Bill, 37.—The Bill was read a first time.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.

Mr. TIERNEY inquired if the preamble was altered?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied, that it was, and had it to the effect, "that notwithstanding the perfect preparation of the Bank to resume cash-payments, unforeseen circumstances had made it necessary to continue the restrictions."

Mr. TIERNEY hoped the Bill, with its new preamble, would be printed and circulated as widely as possible, and therefore he should say no more of it now.

The Bill was ordered to be printed.

SCOTCH BURGHS.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY said, he held a Petition in his hand respecting the state of the Scotch Burghs, signed by 120 persons, some of whom represented corporate bodies in Hamilton, Peebles, Cupar, and other Burghs. The Petition set forth the great grievance arising from the complete thralldom of most Burghs to some neighbouring Nobleman, and from the power of Councils to contract debts, for which the individual Burghers were answerable. The Petition therefore prayed, that Parliament would restore to them their ancient right of electing their own Magistrates. The Learned Member observed, that this had recently been done with the happiest success in the Borough of Montrose.—The Petition was read. It complained that for the last 50 years the whole influence of the Corporation had been in the family of the Earl of Eglington.—It was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FINLAY said, the system which it described prevailed, though not to the same extent, in most of the Scotch Burghs. It must undoubtedly be considered a great hardship, that the Petitioners should not have the election of Magistrates for whose measures they were answerable.

Sir S. ROMILLY then presented two other Petitions from the Corporation of Bonnet-makers and Dyers, and from that of Wrights and Masons, in Edinburgh, alleging similar abuses, and praying that the present Bill may not pass into a law, being calculated to increase the evil.—These were likewise ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—Adj.

Wednesday, May 6.

NEW CHURCHES.

The New Churches Bill was recommitted, and several verbal amendments introduced.

Dr. PHILLIMORE proposed a clause for the prevention of the opening any grave, cemetery, or church-yard for the interment of dead bodies, within twenty-feet of the site of every new church respectively, unless such grave, &c. be enclosed by an arched stone or brick vault, under the penalty of 50*l*.—Adopted.

GAME PURCHASE BILL.

Mr. BANKES moved the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. CURWEN opposed this measure, because it was not only severe, but would be nugatory. It would impose hardships on others, but would not reach the persons whom it was intended to affect. Game ought to belong to the occupier of land, and a protection of it purchased by the landlord from the tenant if he wished to preserve it. The Bill would have a tendency to make servants spies on their masters, by giving them inducements to inform against them, in the case of purchasing game.

Mr. BRAND said the Game Laws were opposed to nature, justice, morality, and social intercourse. Their severity ought to be diminished instead of being increased. The system demoralized the lower orders; for persons who were rich would buy game at any events. It was also objectionable on the principle of universal justice; it was but fair that he who maintained the game should have the enjoyment of it, and the occupier maintained the game as much as his own stock. The oppressive severity with which the present laws were enforced, was attested by the fact of 1,200 persons having been imprisoned for offences relating to the game last year.—(Hear, hear.)—and their resistance had caused the death of many others. Besides all this, the poacher's habits led to other vices, and the laws that attempted to repress them were in every respect promotive of the evil.

Mr. LOCKHART, though he despaired of seeing any radical change in the Game Laws, thought the present Bill unnecessary.

Sir C. BURRELL defended the Bill. The Game Laws occasioned no injustice where the landlord retained in his lease the right of sporting. He thought the Bill would not have the effect of shifting the punishment from persons the most guilty. As to the 1,200 persons committed, there had been an increase of crimes in every way; and this was but a small proportion of the whole.

The Bill was ordered to be read a 2d time on Monday se'nnight.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 7.

FORGED BANK-NOTES.

Mr. CANNING presented a Petition from Liverpool, complaining of the grievances occasioned by the number of forged Bank of England notes, and praying for consideration of the subject.

Gen. GASCOYNE remarked, that the Bank ought to make some exertions to prevent forgeries.

Mr. MANNING said, that if any important suggestion could be given, it would be met with an anxious desire on the part of the Bank to remedy any evils.

Mr. CANNING said, he meant to impute no blame to the Bank: but the evil must be admitted to be great in a large town like Liverpool.—The Petition was received, and ordered to be printed.

DOCTRINES OF THE ROMISH CHURCH.

General THORNTON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal parts of Acts of the 25th and 30th of Charles II., requiring the declarations denying transubstantiation, and stating the worship of the church of Rome to be idolatrous. Now that the established religion was quite secure, this declaration was no longer wanted.

Mr. W. SMITH seconded the motion.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said he had no doubts of the good intentions of the gallant General; but the motion only tended to bring on an embarrassing question, without the probability of effecting any practical good whatever.—He should therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was carried.

CROWN LANDS.

Mr. HUSKISSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the improvement of parts of Hainault Forest, in Essex, with a view to encourage the growth of naval timber.

Mr. BROGHAM observed, that when he looked into the reports of the Commissioners, he perceived a great diversity in the terms imposed on different purchasers. Some persons had paid 25 or 30 years' purchase; but others had paid only at 10 years' purchase. In the latter way, a Cabinet Minister had got lands for 9000*l*. odd, which were shown in another part of the reports to be estimated at 500*l*. a-year value. The best way for the public interests would be to offer open bidding by auction. Lord Lonsdale had obtained three-fourths of the lordship and barony of Kendal in Westmorland for 14,000*l*., being 30 years' purchase; but he had paid nothing for honours, forestal rights, &c. In that instance, too, there was no sale by open competition.

Mr. HUSKISSON observed, that he was favourable to the mode of public auction generally, where it was convenient. But with regard to the particular transactions to which he had referred, if the Hon. Gentleman, instead of throwing out loose allegations, would bring forward particular statements, there would appear very satisfactory reasons for the course which the Treasury had adopted.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM informed the House, that Lord Lonsdale himself had not set on foot the contract for the purchase; it was proposed to him by the Crown. The Commissioners, so far from showing any favour to him, had valued the property at a sum which no other man would have given. Lord Lonsdale had given one-third more than the value of the estate.

Leave was then given to bring in the Bill.

ALIENS.

Mr. LAMBTON understood that the Noble Lord had stated the necessity of co-operating with foreign Governments, for the purpose of protecting the State against the conspiracies of individuals. Such a declaration could not fail to astonish him, when he recollected that the Alien Bill was not introduced with a view to Foreign Powers, but for the protection of British interests. He wished, however, to have more information before the Bill was again discussed; and, therefore, he thought it his duty to move, first, for copies or extracts of all correspondence which had taken place since Nov. 1815, between Ministers and Foreign Governments, relating to aliens; secondly, for copies or extracts of all correspondence relating to passports granted or refused to persons going to or returning from the Netherlands, not being British subjects.

Lord CASTLEREAGH objected to the information called for. This Government had never used the powers of the Bill for any other than British interests; and he would now repeat, that it would not be wise to allow persons to come here and abuse our hospitality, by disturbing the general peace.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT observed, that it was impossible not to see on what slight grounds the powers given to Government by this Bill might be exercised. In his opinion, it was a measure most disgraceful to those who had proposed it; it was most unconstitutional; it was hostile to the spirit of liberty, and contrary to the policy of all former times.

Mr. ABERCROMBY did not think that the Noble Lord had shown sufficient grounds for refusing the motion, and therefore he should give it his support.

Mr. BENNET thought it a very bad symptom, that when a charge was made in that House, Gentlemen refused Papers that would exculpate them if it were unfounded.

Mr. LAMBTON wished to ask the Noble Lord whether he had not joined the rest of the Allied Powers in demanding certain Frenchmen who had taken refuge in Switzerland, the Netherlands, or on the banks of the Rhine? It was impossible for him not to require information which could alone show the real extent of such interference. (No answer).

The House then divided, when there were,—For the Motion, 30—Against it, 68—Majority, 38.

FRAUDS RELATIVE TO CLOCKS AND WATCHES.

Mr. P. MOORE moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the more effectual prevention of frauds in the manufacture, importation, and exportation of sundry wares, and for the relief of distressed persons employed in the manufacture of clocks and watches.—The motion was agreed to.

PARISH VESTRIES' BILL.

Mr. S. BOURNE moved that this Bill be read a third time.

Mr. CALCRAFT protested against the curtailment of the rights of what were called the lower orders, which this Bill proposed to effect. On the same principle on which parish vestries, as now constituted, were objected to, objections might be made against all poor assemblies whatsoever.

Mr. SHAW LEEVE had also great doubts as to the propriety of the measure, and should be very glad to hear any grounds pointed out for this innovation.

Mr. S. BOURNE said, that the object in view was to follow the analogy of kirk-sessions in Scotland, so far as the very different system of poor-laws in England would admit. In Scotland, the wealthier classes had the greater influence in managing the provision for the poor. By this Bill it was proposed to bring back the wealthier classes to attend parish vestries. Their absence was occasioned by the numbers and the clamour of others who attended, of whom some were connected with paupers, and some were employed in trades which made it their interest to be liberal to certain paupers. In 1807, Mr. Whitbread had introduced a measure, the same in principle, and similar in its modifications to the present. The same principle which was proposed in this Bill had been adopted in other assemblies. It was so with the proprietors of East India Stocks. But he now thought it better, that the right of all who pay rates to vote should be retained; but those who paid a certain proportion should have a greater number of votes.

Mr. CURWEN was against the Bill: it would create a prejudice against vestries. He had never known one instance where the higher classes were present, and were not able to exercise great influence to keep order.

Mr. F. DOUGLAS professed himself friendly to the Bill, because it was calculated to encourage the attendance of persons of character at vestries. The Bill proposed that every one who paid 50*l.* should have two votes; 75*l.* three votes; 100*l.* four votes; 125*l.* five votes; and 150*l.* six votes, which was the utmost number allowed. Now he had to object to this arrangement, that, according to it, parishes might be divided into separate classes, and 7 or 8 persons, who represented neither the population nor the property of the parish, might have the whole control. (Hear, hear!)—He should therefore prefer, that every one who paid to the amount of 25*l.* should get an additional vote; 60*l.* a third vote; 100*l.* a fourth vote; and so on.

The Bill was then read a third time.

Mr. S. BOURNE moved a clause to exempt the City of London from the operation of the Bill, and Mr. BARCLAY moved a similar clause for Southwark; which were both adopted.

The Bill was then passed.

POOR LAWS' AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill was read a third time.

Mr. F. DOUGLAS made a variety of objections to the clause for enabling the parish to place the children of paupers in a house of industry. He considered the separation of parent and child as a greater evil than any which it was intended to remedy.

Mr. STURGES BOURNE made a few observations in defence of the clause. In the present state of the poor, he could not imagine any thing more humane than the regulation provided by it.

Mr. CURWEN must object to every regulation which did not go to the principle of making the labourer's wages equal to his maintenance. Every measure that stopped short of that object would only serve to confirm the existing evils.

Mr. CALCRAFT thought the Bill might be generally beneficial, but the clause in question highly mischievous.

Mr. W. SMITH supported the clause: it had only the common failing of all human institutions—a balance of good and evil: he thought the good prevailed. We could not recede from the system of poor laws all at once; all that we could do, was to mitigate their ill effects.

The House then divided on the clause, when the numbers were—For the clause, 46—Against it, 14—Majority, 32.

The Bill was then passed, and ordered to the Lords.

NEW CHURCHES.

The new Churches Bill was read a third time, and, after the insertion of a variety of verbal amendments, it was passed.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 8.

BANKRUPT LAWS.

Mr. J. SMITH brought up the Report of the Committee on the Bankrupt Laws. Various difficulties had appeared as the inquiry proceeded—difficulties which, he was sorry to say, some Gentlemen of the Committee thought irremovable. He wished to bring in a Bill on the subject, but he did not state any particular day. The Committee had had before them the evidence of Commissioners of Bankrupts who had had the experience of 20 years, and who knew the existing abuses which were so frequently complained of. The question was felt to be of considerable importance in the commercial world.—The Report was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BROUGHTON rose to move the Order of the Day on the motion respecting Thomas Ferguson, for a breach of the privileges of the House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that he believed many Members had not yet had time to read over the evidence carefully; and that the question concerned the personal liberty of an individual.

Lord ARCHIBALD HAMILTON said he had a Petition which, if the motion of the Hon. Member were carried that night, he should present for the release of Mr. Ferguson.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that the situation and prospect in life of the individual must be taken into consideration, though at the same time the House must consult its own independence and dignity!

No motion was made.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BROUGHAM called for the attention of the House, in conformity with the wishes of the Committee on charitable institutions for education. The result of evidence and enquiry was, that there were much greater means provided for the education of the lower classes, by the various modes of charity, than had been generally believed. Yet, under all the circumstances, they were at present quite inadequate to the desired objects.—Mr. B. then gave a variety of highly interesting statements on this important subject, which our limits will not allow us to detail—(they may be seen, however, in the Morning Chronicle),—and concluded a very able speech by moving that the House should go into a Committee on the Bill for the Education of the Poor.

A conversation arose, after which the House went into the Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON proposed an amendment to the clause, excepting from the operation of the Bill, the schools of Eton, Westminster, Winchester, and the Charter-house, for the purpose of adding that of Harrow.

The Committee then divided.—For the amendment, 30—Against it, 53—Majority, 23.—Harrow school will therefore remain open to the investigation of the Commissioners.

The report of the Bill was then brought up, ordered to be printed, and to be taken into further consideration on Friday.

The other orders of the day were then entered upon, after which the House adjourned till Wednesday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MAY 10.

The Liquidation Project for paying the foreign armies to walk off has passed the two French Chambers in total silence. A very small minority of black balls thrown into the urn in opposition have been supposed by a correspondent of the Courier to shew the exact amount of the number of Jacobins, who wish to throw their country into anarchy again. It is certainly difficult to say what measures are most likely to make the Bourbons vacate a second time:—if the armies continue, the Courier's correspondent seems to think, that that would do it; and it is our firm opinion, that if the armies do not continue, that will do it. If by Jacobins therefore he means enemies to foreign dictation and the Bourbon "legitimacy," we are afraid the old "Jacobins," that is to say, the Ministers, who are old Bonapartists, are still the Jacobins on this occasion, as well as the Independents; and that the black-balls are the bigotted Ultras, who, as they well may, think the continuance of the foreign armies the better chance for royalty of the two.

The following curious paragraph upon the long demanded and long delayed representative systems which were promised to the Prussian and other German states, is taken from the same paper:—"The King of Prussia has returned an angry answer to the town of Coblenz, and the communes belonging to that district, which had petitioned his MAJESTY, for the immediate organization of a representative system. The KING reminds them, that the promise he made was voluntary, and that the mode and time of its performance, should be equally so. By urgently soliciting its fulfilment, he considers they have cast an imputation upon his sincerity; and he unequivocally expresses his great displeasure at the proceeding. There is, doubtless, no danger more imminent, or which ought to be more firmly resisted, than that which attends the zeal of innovation. When important changes are to be effected in the public administration of a kingdom, the more slowly and cautiously they are produced, the more permanent and beneficial they are likely to prove."

The "more slowly!" Ay, till Doomsday, no doubt.—Now we have to observe in reply to this barefaced yet conscious piece of business, that the promise made by the King of Prussia was not voluntary. He made it, as the other allies made their promises, first in an hour of danger, when they would have been all upturned from their thrones, like so many vegetables, if the people had not come forward in their behalf; and second, in an imaginary moment of gratitude, when they had just got out of the danger, and talked of good things for their deliverers out of pure babbling joy. The memory of those who are denied their rights, is not so at the mercy of a prince's frown, especially of one who could whine and whimper as much about his personal wrongs, as he now pretends to look grand in answer to the claims of others. "By urgently soliciting its fulfilment, he considers they they have cast an imputation on his sincerity!" And what then? Have no persons in the world any wish for their rights, or a right to ask for them, but a King? And is a King the only person whose sincerity is not to be doubted, if he delays year after year his own promises? If the people tell him at last that they doubt his sincerity, it is only what he might have learnt from the journals, and probably did learn, months and months ago; and it is mere burlesque now, whatever it might have been formerly, in a King, under all these circumstances, to pretend to look lofty and indignant. He must keep his promises, or run the risk of another revolution of things, which will certainly not put faith in him again; and his anger in the mean time at being reminded of them, is only an additional lesson to those whom he has the honour of ruling over, to watch how he conducts himself. If he behaves with proper deference to the demands and intellect of the time, he is a king indeed, and worthy of remaining among the heads of it; if not, the head on his walking stick might as well give itself airs.

The news from India continues to be of the same curious and suspicious description,—victories on our own part, and yet unusual sufferings, chiefs taking every opportunity to make themselves amends for their partial defeats, the fate of detachments unknown, the natives harassing us without coming to blows as the Spaniards did the French, and finally, pestilence breaking out in our camps. These are lamentable victorious accounts to reckon upon in a burning territory, where we are hated still worse than the chiefs themselves, and under a leader, who whatever may be his qualities in some respects, seems to go to war more in the spirit of a theatrical soldier than a real one.

Mr. BROUGHAM, with the true spirit becoming a legislator and a man, has called the attention of the House, or we should rather say of the public, to the state of public instruction. We regret that the necessary limits of a weekly paper prevent our doing justice to his speech; but we shall make it the subject of our first article next week.

American Papers arrived yesterday. It appears from them that the dispute between the United States and Spain is not at all likely to be amicably arranged. A war, there is little doubt, will soon break out, and then, woe to the Dons!

It is stated in a Charleston Journal, that Lord COCHRANE has been appointed by the Independent States of South America, Commander of their squadron in the Pacific Ocean; that he has written letters accepting the appointment, and is expected shortly to assume the command.

When the last ships left St. Helena, BONAPARTE took no exercise, and refused to see any visitors. In consequence of a misunderstanding between Count MONTHOLON and General GOURGAUD, at St. Helena, the latter has returned to Europe. He came passenger in the Camden East Indiaman. It is stated that BONAPARTE peremptorily forbade the decision of the quarrel by duel. Mr. BALCOLM, at whose house BONAPARTE resided when he first landed, has also returned to England with his family. Reports were on Wednesday circulated that a secret correspondence had been detected at St. Helena. The rumours are without the slightest foundation.—Courier.

There are various reports in circulation respecting a fracas at St. Helena. Mr. BALCOLM and his family, with whom BONAPARTE was so intimate on his first landing, is certainly arrived in England; and it is generally rumoured that he was not allowed to spend much time in packing up. It is also asserted that a duel was actually fought between Generals MONTHOLON and GOURGAUD.—Times.

NATIONAL DEBT.—From the year 1786, when the Sinking Fund was put in operation, the sum-total of the debt, in spite of that system of liquidation, has increased above threefold, being somewhat more than 238,000,000*l.* at the first epoch, and upwards of 748,000,000*l.* at present.

The use of fetters on prisoners, before trial, exists no longer in the City Prisons. This change first took place in Clerkenwell New Prison, where Mr. BEEBY is Governor; and it was instantly followed by Mr. BROWN, Keeper of Newgate.

THE LAWYERS.—A Correspondent writes, "Adverting to your well-timed quotation from Mr. BENTHAM, respecting the swarms of lawyers, I cannot refrain from inviting your attention to the following important question; most especially as a meeting was called some time back by Mr. ACNESON the Solicitor, to prevent improper persons from acting as Conveyancers.—The question is simply this:—Should an Attorney be permitted to act as a Trustee or Executor? It is well known, that an Attorney, who possesses these powers, can get the funds into his hands, and then create innumerable obstacles to prevent their honest appropriation; taking especial care to pay himself first. It is his interest to excite litigation; and this fact alone ought to call upon Parliament to prevent an Attorney or Money Scrivener from being a Trustee or Executor."

At the last examination which took place at Madras, of the Candidates for the Prizes given for attaining the Oriental Languages, the two rewards, amounting to one thousand pagodas, were adjudged to Lieut. HENRY WM. HODGES, of the 2d battalion of the 17th regiment of Native Infantry, on the Madras Establishment, son of the late WILLIAM HODGES, Esq. R. A., for his attainment of the Hindostany and Persian Languages, accompanied by very flattering expressions of approbation of his proficiency. These Prizes are now abolished by the Court of Directors, notwithstanding the repeated assurances of the Government of their obvious utility to our Eastern interests. The period fixed for their abolition was the 1st June, 1817, but was extended in favour of the above officer and others, who on account of their civil and military engagements could not reach the Presidency before that time.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

We can now state from authentic information, that the marriage of the Duke of CLARENCE with the Princess Royal of MEININGEN is finally arranged. The consent of his Royal Highness in Council, and of her Serene Highness, has undergone no change by the proceeding in the House of Commons. The Princess is to have the ceremony of a marriage by proxy before she embarks for England. The British Minister at Stuttgard is to be his Royal Highness's proxy.—Chronicle.

Extract of a letter from Berlin, dated April 25:—"The wedding of the Princess FREDERICKE, daughter of her Royal Highness the Duchess of CUMBERLAND, took place on the 17th instant, and was celebrated with great splendour. The bridegroom, the reigning Duke of Anhalt Dessau, is a young man of great promise, aged 24."

It is probable that an amusing scene will take place at the REGENT's next Levée, Dr. WATSON having ordered a Court dress, for the purpose of presenting the Spa-fields' Petition, according to the instructions given to him at the late meeting.

LADY F. V. TEMPEST.

MR. EXAMINER.—How exactly does the situation of poor Lady FRANCES VANE TEMPEST agree with the description given of an Heiress by the Widow in Hudibras:

"For what did ever Heiress yet,
By being born to Lordships, get?
When the more Lady she's of Manors,
She's but exposed to more Trepanners;
And does but tempt them with her riches
To use her as the devil does witches;
Who takes it for a special grace
To be their culy for a space,
That when the time's expired, the drazels
For ever may become his vassals;
So she, bewitch'd by rooks and spirits,
Betrays herself and all she inherits;
Is bought and sold, like stolen goods,
By Pimps and Matchmakers and Bawds."

Part 3—Canto I.

So also my Lady ANTRIM and Mr. MACDONNELL:—

"Lord, what an amorous thing is want!
How debts and mortgages enchant!
What graces must that Lady have
Who can from Execution save!
A man will damn himself and swear
He loves an old rich Dowager,
Grown fat and puffy, by retail
Of pots of beer and bottled ale,
And find her fitter for his turn,
For fat is wondrous apt to burn;
She at his flames will soon take fire,
Relent and melt to his desire;
And, like a candle in the socket,
Dissolve her graces int' his pocket."

PROFOUND SECRETS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR.—I have marvelled much of late to observe how insufferably dull the Newspapers have been (the present company always excepted, as the old saying has it),—still, I think, between you and I, something of a livelier nature might be produced.

You must know, then, that I have an excellent ear; not for music; no; but to pick up little pieces of intelligence, that are profound secrets to all the world beside, by applying the aforesaid ear to key-holes, &c. I send you two or three trifles I have picked up in this way lately, and am, Sir, yours, &c.

AURICULAR.

I heard Lord Castlereagh whisper a certain Borough-monger—between you and I—there is a number of men in the House of Commons who have no business there.

I heard Lord Sidmouth whisper Sir N. Conant—between you and I—there have been a number of innocent men imprisoned under the late suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

I heard Mr. —, the Magistrate at Bow-street, whisper an agent of the Bank—between you and I—a great many men, and women too, have been executed for forgery.

I heard Mr. Canning whisper an underling of the Ministers—between you and I—there is but little common sense, and scarcely any wit, but what is brutal, in the senate.

I heard Mr. T. Dibdin whisper Mr. Dimond—between you and I—there has been a great quantity of vile stuff brought on the stage of late years.

I heard Sir S. Romilly whisper the Attorney-General—between you and I—there is a wide difference.

I heard Sir Wm. Curtis whisper Mr. Dixon—between you and I—the City have spent many large sums upon leasts.

I heard Mr. Claremont, of Covent Garden Theatre, whisper Mr. Holland of Drury-lane—between you and I—there is much miserable acting in the present day.

I heard Lord Liverpool whisper another great man in the Ministry—between you and I—Reform is as great a farce as the last new Comedy.

I heard a Wesleyan Preacher whisper a holder forth at the New Jerusalem Chapel—between you and I—hypocrisy has increased prodigiously of late.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 322.

DRURY-LANE.

OUR old favourite ELLISTON made his re-appearance at this theatre on Tuesday after a long absence, and was received with an applause natural both to his merits and to the long dearth of genteel comic acting which the town has experienced. Since the loss of that delightful fluttering spirit, LEWIS, he has been without a competitor; and never, in our remembrance, was equalled in parts of dry humour and a kind of eager and affectionate gallantry. We shall go to see him again, and again, with the double delight arising from old habit. His performance on Tuesday, which we did not see then, but which we have seen a hundred times and got by heart, was Rover in Wild Oats,—a play of genuine comedy in its broader shape, and full of the very best spirit of humanity,—frank, sympathetic, and happy-making. Can any of our readers inform us of the present fortunes of its venerable author Mr. O'KEEFE, who, we believe, is still living? He has long been known to be blind; and had he no additional claim to our sympathy on that score, gratitude for the genial pleasure his works afford us ought to induce us to find him out, if it is only to tell him how we still enjoy them.

Mr. KEAN surprised and delighted the public with a new character on Wednesday night,—that of Young Norval in Douglas. We need not make any criticism on this well-known play, which, in spite of its mediocrity, keeps possession of the stage by its being founded on maternal affection. The most curious things concerning it are, its being shorter than other tragedies ("exceeding brief and tedious"), and its having lost the author his situation as Minister of a Presbyterian Kirk, for which, we believe, compensation was made him by a pension. To write an amiable play was the next damnable thing to encouraging rural enjoyment; and for a Minister to do this, was even worse than attempting to inveigle his audience into the toleration of a "great whistle,"—which was the denomination given on such an occasion to a church-organ. When persons of these opinions produced children more intelligent than themselves, the natural consequence of such extravagances, after a time, was to produce a re-action; the natural quietness of the Scotch character hindered it from going to another sort of excess; and Nature had her revenge in the liberality of Scotland's modern philosophers and the pastoral tendencies of its poets.

Mr. KEAN's performance of Norval is thought by most to be an entire contrast to his more vehement and gloomy characters, while a few others can hardly think he does any thing naturally out of the pale of fierceness and revenge. It appeared to us certainly, that there was too much of the latter in the passages where he is roused by Glenalvon; nor can we help thinking,—whatever may be the cause of it,—whether early theatrical habit, or some greater facility he finds in himself,—that parts of a more contemptuous and wilful kind are those in which he is destined to excel. His voice and his appearance at any rate are both more adapted to them. Our opinion may be disproved, and we are heartily willing for our theatrical enjoyment that it should. We do not of course mean to insinuate any thing against Mr. KEAN's own natural temper or disposition, of which we know nothing whatever except from some anecdotes which have appeared in the newspapers, and which imply very generous and amiable feelings. But an actor is an anomaly not yet explained. There is no judging of him as of a poet, painter, or musician, by his performances, as the public have formerly had occasion to know in some extraordinary contradictions on that score, some of the best natured men having excelled in representing the worst, and vice versa. We believe that HAVARD was an instance; and we think we have heard as much of a rising actor at Covent Garden. Perhaps the reason is, that such persons, with a natural tendency to feel the kindest, have had their theoretical notions of humanity somehow embittered. But at all events, when great performers of this kind get upon passages of a genial nature, their intellect alone will enable them to give them a finer and truer effect than any moderate representor of what is amiable; and this, we take it, is the secret of the great and very just impression made by Mr. KEAN in the tender passages of his new character, especially the scene where his mother makes herself known to him. Nothing could be truer to the life than the half-hesitating, subdued agitation, in which, with a quiet familiarity, he made his enquiries after his father; or than the little affectionate and triumphant minglings of something approaching to laughter, with which his voice and feelings were tenderly borne away in the second line of that passage, where he asks whether he excelled the rest of his sex as much as his mother does the rest of hers. "Beautiful! beautiful!" said the ladies in the boxes; and we are happy to repeat a criticism, so honourable to the performer and themselves.

A new actress, Miss MACAULEY, made her first appearance on the London boards in the character of Lady Randolph. She does not appear to be young, nor new to the stage. Her face, if not otherwise remarkable, seemed intelligent, and her voice is exceedingly well-toned and sweet, like Mrs. LISTON's made more graceful and tender. The part of Lady Randolph is perhaps a very good test of an actress of this description; and if we may judge from a first night's performance, Miss MACAULEY may become a very respectable and useful though not great addition to this theatre, where regular tragic actresses are as much wanted, as comic ones at the other house. Her greatest fault is a want of knowing where to pitch her emphasis to advantage; and her pronunciation exhibited at times an unlucky piece of applicability to her part, being too decidedly Scotch. But she is sometimes striking in striking passages, though chiefly perhaps where her predecessors have marked them out. Her best one of all was the increasing breathlessness with which she witnessed the last moments of her son.

The performance, with an awkward exclusiveness of compliment to Mr. KEAN, was improperly cut off at this scene, leaving the spectators in doubt what was to become of the Lady and other persons concerned. But it gave them such delight altogether, that they loudly called for its representation the next night, in preference to the play announced.

COVENT-GARDEN.

The theatres are unfortunate just now with their new after-pieces. Drury-lane has produced several to little or no purpose, and we understand that the Sleeping Drought is getting out of favour, probably from HARLEY's overdoing the sufferings of the drinker, which we saw on one occasion he had a tendency to do. Covent-garden has succeeded as little in some late productions, and though the new burlesque afterpiece on the Sorrows of Werter was given out for repetition in the play-bills, we find from the report of those who thought it worth while to stop and see it out, that it met with considerable disapprobation at the close. We hardly expected this disapprobation,—LISTON, who performed Werter, is generally so irresistible on these occasions, and any extravagancies on the side of sentiment have so little quarter from a nation of our habits; but we think it is quite right. We do not like to differ with a contemporary critic whom we have in our eye; but the evils which individual sensibility might fancy were to be apprehended from a story like Werter, are so far, we think, from being to be dreaded by the mass of a community like ours, that we conceive it calculated to do them a great deal of good, and to shew them that there are other things in the world to think of besides themselves and their gain. Nor is it any objection on such occasions that a story is carried to an excess. The blow must be loud in order that the noisy world may hear it.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

WHATEVER difference of opinion may exist with regard to the Exhibition at Somerset-House, impartiality must allow that it is an Exhibition honourable to the talents and industry of a great portion of the flower of the nation. It must indeed be expected to be so, when it is considered that the majority of the numerous and best Artists of a country, which has been exceeded by none in modern times, nor perhaps in ancient, for force and delicacy of genius,—we do not exactly mean in the imitative Arts,—here unite the yearly result of their professional labours, amounting in general to more than a thousand performances in every department of Painting, proceeding from the pencils of above five hundred Artists. It must almost as a consequence be so, when it is considered that the existence of such a number of professors has in itself an internal evidence of a considerable love for and encouragement of the Fine Arts in this great country, which naturally operate as a continual spur to a body of estimable individuals, forming part of an emulous, intellectual, and active nation. Next then to the unequalled enjoyments which Nature herself invites us to on the return of May, when she enlivens every thing with a new spirit of youth, and we seem to begin our existence afresh, at least feel that we continue it with a renewed consciousness, the pleasure which Art confers upon us is one of the best, and those enjoy it most who most delight in Nature. Like Nature, the Genius of Art appears before us in this Exhibition in a new dress and in new scenes, and smilingly invites us to come among them. We have accepted the invitation, and shall communicate our impressions on this and future visits. This Exhibition is better than many past ones; for if many or even the majority of the Artists do not advance, some have advanced greatly. Their thinking and executive powers have been well nurtured by evident pains-taking and emulation. As proofs of this we refer to the greater part at least of the following works: To CALCOTT, in 95, The Mouth of the Tyne; COLLINS, 84, Departure of the Diligence from Rouen, &c.; HOWARD, 15, Fairies; Sir T. LAWRENCE, 165, Duke of Wellington; CONSTABLE, 11, Landscape, &c.; NASMYTH, 22, View near Inverary; COOPER, 52, Alderney Bull and Cows, &c.; STOTHARD, 71, Fête Champêtre; FUSELI, 16, Dante in Hell; PHILLIPS, 72, Mrs. W.

Russell, &c.; OWEN, 147, Mr. and Mrs. C. Scott; TURNER, for grand effects, 116, Dort, and 263, Field of Waterloo; HOFFLAND, 182, Gooderich Castle, &c.; RAE-BURN, Admiral Sir D. Milne, &c.; JACKSON, 20, Earl Grosvenor, &c.; DEVIS, 277, Sir T. Heard, and 378, Prince Blucher; BEECHY, 62, Duchess of Gloucester; Mrs. Coult, &c.; WILKIE, 110, The Errand Boy, &c.; R. T. BONE, 215, Venus, Cupid, and the Graces; STEPHANOFF, 274, Trial of Algernon Sydney; ALLAN, 285, A Press-gang; SHEE, 10, Mr. Sharpe, &c.; WITHERINGTON, 303, The Fifth of November; WESTALL, 54, &c., and HILTON, 291, Una with Satyrs, which fairly surprises us in the immensely increased powers of its painter.

These works, in conjunction with the President's masterly East India subject, and other paintings, the performances of CHANTREY, whom we consider as the first modern Sculptor in Europe, of WESTMACOTT, GARRARD, FLAXMAN, BAILY, &c., and the many capital and very improved performances in the minor classes of Art, the Miniatures, Still-life, &c., will certainly justify our opinion of the present Exhibition, as one considerably improved and beautiful.

SPA-FIELDS MEETING.

On Monday, in consequence of placards intimating that a Meeting would be held in Spa-fields, a number of persons assembled in front of the Merlin's Cave, from which, however, they soon departed, on seeing the intimation by Mr. Wilson, proprietor of the ground, that every person trespassing should be prosecuted. The Landlord of the Union public-house, (formerly the Bull in the Pound), near Bagnigge Wells, was applied to, and consented to give the use of his house, after which a large placard was fixed up with the words, "Peace and good will to all men." A number soon collected in front of the house, and the elder Watson, Messrs. Preston, Dugdale, (a young Quaker), Whatman, and others, entered it. Some delay took place in consequence of Mr. Henry Hunt being expected. Meantime every precaution had been taken by the Magistrates, and a large body of Police Officers were stationed in the neighbourhood.

At one o'clock the crowd became very impatient, and at last Messrs. Watson and Preston, attended by four or five others, appeared in front of the house, on the roof of the bar. Mr. Watson having taken the Chair, which he assured the Meeting he had done solely on account of the absence of Mr. Hunt, began by lamenting that the Meeting were deprived of the valuable services of that most eminent patriot and disinterested citizen of the world, but stated, that he would endeavour as far as he could to do his duty. They knew the object for which they were convened, and he trusted they would discuss it with coolness, firmness, and temperance. The cause was common to all, every Englishman felt an interest in it, and he had no doubt that the proceedings of that auspicious day would have a mighty influence on the English nation. After some allusions to the former meetings, Mr. Watson proceeded to attack Lord Erskine, Earl Grey, Sir James Mackintosh, and Sir F. Burdett. He then panegyrized Messrs. Cobbett, Cartwright, Bentham, Wooler, and Sherwin, whom he characterised as the sole friends of the public. After animadverting on some of the public Journals, he quoted several extracts from Mr. Cobbett, and entered into a long detail of public grievances and of his own sufferings while a state prisoner.

The Resolutions were then read by Mr. Whatman, and carried.—A Petition was submitted to the Meeting and a read to; and it was ordered to be presented to the Prince Regent in person, by Messrs. Hunt, Cartwright, and Watson.

Mr. PRESTON then addressed the Meeting. He alluded in very strong terms to the conduct of the Spenceans, and declared that he was no scholar, but yet he knew what was right. He, at great length, endeavoured to shew the bad effects of the flogging of property both in Greece and Rome, and also of what had resulted from the oligarchies in Rome and Carthage. He professed himself a friend of the people, by whom, he hoped, he should for ever abide; and he then warmly condemned what he called the Westminster Junto, for not giving some relief to the widows and families of Brandreth, Turner, and Ludlam. After a dissertation on the beneficial influence of taxation, he concluded by asserting that justice was his motto, and love was what he felt to the human race.

The Meeting were afterwards addressed by Messrs. Dugdale, Baxter, and Watson. At five o'clock, the business of the day being over, the Meeting adjourned.—There were present about 2000 persons. The crowd dispersed very quietly. A considerable number of military were stationed in the neighbourhood.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturdays, May 2.

ABJURATION OATH.

While a young gentleman, whose articles of clerkship had expired, was taking the usual oath of abjuration, denying "that damnable doctrine and position, that Princes, excommunicated by the Pope, may be deposed or murdered," a smile passed over his countenance.

Mr. Justice BAILEY, perceiving it, immediately ordered that he should be rejected for the present, and not be allowed to take the oaths necessary for his admission until he produced an affidavit to his moral and religious character!

THE KING v. THE REV. MR. EASTON AND EIGHT OTHERS.

This was an indictment against the defendants for disturbing a congregation of Protestant Dissenters, assembled for religious worship at a house duly licensed. At the trial, at the assizes for Wiltshire, the defendants were severally acquitted upon the count for conspiracy, but were found guilty of the riot.

The Court taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and particularly that the prosecutors had removed the indictment into this Court, when it might have been tried at the Sessions, or preferred originally at the assizes, adjudged that Mr. Easton should pay a fine of 5*l.* to the King, that James Garratt should pay a fine of 10*l.*, that the other defendants should be fined 1*s.* each, and that they should all enter into recognizances to be of good behaviour for three years, the two former defendants in 100*l.* each, and the rest in the sum of 40*l.* each. The Court at the same time stated, that it was a part of its duty to protect the Protestant Dissenters in general, in the exercise of their religious worship.

Monday, May 4.

HAMILTON v. THE PRINTERS OF SEVERAL NEWSPAPERS.

On a former day Mr. GURNEY, on behalf of the defendants, obtained a rule, calling upon the plaintiff to give security for costs in certain actions brought by her as a married woman without the knowledge of her husband, now living, against the printers of certain newspapers, for publishing a statement that she had been convicted of child-stealing at the Old Bailey. Mr. SCARLETT now shewed cause, and stated that the plaintiff was the wife of a Mr. Hamilton, who had some years since carried on, to considerable extent, the business of a printer, in Fleet-street, and about 18 years ago had abandoned his wife, who then went to reside in France with her daughter, and came to England to vindicate her character from the foul imputation cast upon her by the defendants. Since her husband left her she had never seen him, and she did not know where he was now to be found.

On the other hand it was sworn that Mr. Hamilton was now alive, and had recently been seen in London.—The Court thought the application properly made, and ordered the plaintiff to give security for the costs from this day forth.

Thursday, May 7.

LIBEL.—HAMILTON v. BELL AND HARMER.

This was an action brought against the Proprietors of Bell's Weekly Dispatch, for publishing a Libel in that Paper, concerning the plaintiff, imputing to her the offence of child stealing.

The circumstances of the case were these:—At the Old Bailey, in 1816, a woman, named Hamilton was convicted of stealing a child. The conviction took place on the 2d of July, and on the 20th of that month a paragraph appeared in the defendants' paper, headed "Child Stealing," purporting to be a biographical sketch of the offender. It commenced by stating, "that the female convicted at the late Old Bailey Sessions of the crime of child stealing, was formerly the wife of an eminent Printer, in Falcon-court, that she had performed for a short time at the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, and then went to France, and formed a connexion with a foreigner, and after remaining there a short time, came to England for the purpose of her accouchement—that her child having died, she received a large sum of money from the above mentioned foreigner, as an inducement to steal the child in question, and return with it to France for the purpose of imposing upon the father as her own child, &c." At the time this publication appeared, the plaintiff, who had been the wife of an eminent Printer, in Falcon-court, and had been a short time on the boards of the Little Theatre, was residing in France, and could not possibly have been the Mrs. Hamilton convicted at the Old Bailey.

The formal parts of the case were proved in the usual way.

Mr. Williams, the plaintiff's attorney, proved, that after the libel had appeared, and before any legal proceedings were had, he wrote to Mr. Harmer, one of the defendants, and desired, on Mrs. Hamilton's behalf, that he would give up the name of the author, promising, if this was done, that no legal steps should be taken. No answer was sent to this application; it was repeated, but still no answer was given. The action was then commenced, and when the cause was put down for trial, witness wrote again to Mr. Harmer, offering to forego the action if the name of the author was given up. This application was also unattended to.

Mr. GURNEY said, that although Mr. Harmer was strictly speaking liable for the consequences of the libel published in the paper, of which he was a proprietor, yet he had no more to do with the management thereof than any Gentleman on the Jury. It had been urged, that the defendants had not given up the author, but the fact was, that they were unable so to do; and the supposed neglect in answering the plaintiff's applications might perhaps be justly attributed to some shyness of the correspondent who had demanded the name of the author. Undoubtedly the defendants had acted under a mistake in the publication of the paragraph, and the Jury, in considering their verdict, would be guided solely by the evidence, and not by the highly coloured statement of Counsel.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT charged the Jury, that the disclaimer of any knowledge of the author of the libel on the part of the defendants was rather an aggravation than otherwise of the case, but he cautioned them against giving vindictive damages.

The Jury found for the plaintiff—damages 200*l*.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday the following prisoners were arraigned, and pleaded guilty to having forged notes in their possession, being the minor offence, and for which the punishment is fourteen years' transportation:—Thomas Davies, Thomas Ward, Thomas Smith, Patrick Lane, Clarissa Ward Downes, Robert Purnell, and William Brown.

Mr. REYNOLDS, as Counsel on the part of the Bank, stated, that the lenient disposition of the Bank had been peculiarly shewn in not producing evidence against any of the seven prisoners at the bar.

Mathias Maher was then brought to the bar, apparently in a state of furious derangement, for the purpose of being arraigned on a charge of forging a power of attorney, with intent to defraud Thomas Moore, under the prosecution of the Board of Admiralty. The prisoner was conducted to the bar by three men, one at each arm, and one behind having a fast hold of him. He was secured by a strait waistcoat and by weighty chains. He looked at the spectators with a hideous grin, and his eyes appeared as if they were starting out of their sockets. His beard appeared not to have been shorn for several weeks, and his countenance was pallid and emaciated.

The Clerk of the Arraigns put the usual question to him, "Are you guilty or not guilty?" But the only reply the maniac made was, "Do you want to murder me? I have been starved here for upwards of a month, without eating or drinking."

Mr. Justice BAYLEY repeated the question, and the prisoner still continued to rave and complain of being starved. He endeavoured to stoop down and eat the herbs placed on the board before the dock, but was prevented by the keepers.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—If you do not plead either guilty or not guilty, I must direct the Jury to enquire whether you stand mute by the visitation of God, or whether you do it wilfully?

Prisoner.—Are you going to give me any tobacco?

Mr. Justice BAYLEY repeated the observation.

Prisoner.—I get up with swords and pistols upon me. You want me to eat nothing but poison.

The Jury was then sworn, and directed to judge whether the prisoner was or was not insane, and evidence was called to prove his insanity.

W. Brown, keeper of Newgate, had no doubt of the fact, from his conduct and appearance. He had attempted to stab a man, and to hang himself.

Mr. Bayle, surgeon of Whitecross-street prison, proved that the prisoner was there for debt. There was an incoherency in his manner, but he had lucid intervals. The first act of insanity he evinced was that of eating an ounce and a half of ointment which he should have used.

Mr. Box, surgeon, had attended the prisoner since 28th January, and gave his decided opinion that the prisoner was not insane, and that it was nothing but pretence.

Mr. Watts, an attendant at Whitecross-street prison, proved the derangement of the prisoner while he was there.

Dr. Weir, superintendent of the sick of the Victualling Board, found evident marks of derangement in the prisoner. He had visited him three times, and upon conversing with him he was extremely incoherent. An artful man, he was convinced, might pretend insanity, so as to baffle all the enquiries of the most skillful surgeons.

Dr. Baird, Inspector of the Naval Hospitals, attended the prisoner in Newgate. The prisoner was furious in the day-time, and quiet in the night. This was a circumstance which induced him to think that he was otherwise than insane.

John Fisher, a turnkey, said, when the prisoner first entered the gaol, his nights were sleepless.

Dr. Hatch, Medical Superintendent to the Lunatic Naval Asylum, could not speak with certainty, but he was inclined to think that he might possibly be insane.

Mr. ALLEY was about to reply, but was prevented by the Jury stating that they had made up their minds upon the question.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY was glad to hear the opinion of the Jury. He had, himself, long ago made up his mind upon the case. If the Jury thought that the prisoner was insane, and therefore was mute by the visitation of God, he would be kept in confinement until the pleasure of his Majesty was known upon this case.

The Jury found a verdict—Insanity. The prisoner was immediately taken from the bar back to his cell.

A young Frenchman, of respectable appearance, was placed at the bar, charged with having wilfully stabbed Gilbert Mathias, with intent to murder him. The prisoner was a member of a rich family at Nantes, and had been sent to England to receive a commercial education.

Gilbert Mathias, a Catholic Priest, officiated at the Spanish chapel. On Sunday, March 1, the prisoner came to the altar, and offered to take the sacrament. This witness refused, conceiving that he was in a state of mental derangement. After mass, the prisoner asked witness why he did not give him the sacrament? and witness replied that he could not do it, as he was under a mental derangement. The prisoner went out quietly. He did not see him again until Sunday the 15th of March. After the patenoster, he heard a little noise in the crowd, and upon turning his head, he observed the prisoner coming over the rail with his hat on, and a long naked sword in his hand. Witness immediately ran towards the vestry, and was followed by the prisoner, who made several thrusts at him, which cut his vestments. In the endeavour to wrest the sword out of his hand, witness received a cut in his arm and on the fingers.

The Prisoner was here called upon for his defence, and he declared,—“My defence is this: The priest refused to administer the sacrament to me; and I think any priest who does this acts with a malicious motive. There being no law in this country to punish him, I took the law into my own hands.”

M. Le Clerq proved the mental derangement of the prisoner. The prisoner had for some time previous to the present transaction lived upon nothing but bread and water.

Sarah Benschaw lived with Mrs. Menistrier, Cumberland-place, City-road, and the prisoner lodged in the same house. The prisoner first lived upon bread and water; afterwards he ate fowls, and generally devoured 21 fowls in a week. Oranges he afterwards lived upon for some time; and for three weeks ate nothing but oil-cake. On several occasions, he brought home grass and roses, and pounded them, and drank the juice. The prisoner afterwards ate nothing but peas for a long time, and sometimes ate four pecks a day, three pecks of shelled, and one of unshelled peas. She had no doubt but that the prisoner was deranged. For the last three months the prisoner devoured six pounds of mutton a-day.

Samuel Davies, one of the turnkeys of Newgate, proved that the prisoner scarcely ever slept while he had been in prison, and ate a leg of mutton every day.

The Jury found a verdict—Not Guilty, upon the ground of insanity.

Lieutenant David Davis was brought to the bar, and it was not without considerable difficulty that he complied in pleading “Not Guilty.” He said that his sufferings were so great, that they must be known before he was put upon his trial. He had been turned from his regiment like a madman, and all the world knew it. He added, "If I am acquitted of this charge, I must put an end to my existence."

The prisoner was then put upon his trial, charged with having wilfully shot at Henry John Temple Lord Viscount Palmerston, with a pistol, with intent to murder him.

Lord Palmerston and others proved the case, which is already well known.

The Prisoner was called upon for his defence. He observed that he had been dismissed from his regiment, being unfit for any thing, and witnesses would be produced who would tell the Court his sufferings, and prove his insanity. With respect to the present transaction, he had been refused a personal communication with his Lordship, and had written many letters to Lord Palmerston to which he had received no answer. He was an innocent man, and did not deserve this treatment. He should have wished the circumstances to have been inquired into in a private manner.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY.—Have you any thing more to say?

The Prisoner.—Why should I be crucified in this manner, when the business might be settled at once? I knew I should not kill his Lordship by firing at him.

The witnesses on the part of the prisoner were then called, and the ladies were requested to go out of Court.

Francis Rogers Pasloe was a surgeon, and knew the prisoner when he lived at Piccadilly in 1816, and was called up to visit him. Witness proceeded to examine him, and found that he had committed a dreadful mutilation with a razor. He was then decidedly insane.

Mr. Box, the surgeon, considered the prisoner particularly insane on the point of his regiment. On the point of religion he was also deranged.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY summed up the evidence at considerable length.

The Jury having retired for about a quarter of an hour, returned a verdict of—Not Guilty, on the ground of insanity.

The prisoner, during the whole of the trial, which occupied nearly six hours, conducted himself with great propriety and calmness.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Saturday week, the proprietor of the Old Swan Tavern, Fish-street-hill, preferred a charge of felony against two eminent surgeons, of the following nature:—The wife of the prosecutor had, it appeared, upon retiring to rest, sprained or broken her leg. Her husband rose and obtained medical assistance. Two gentlemen were called in, and one of them had occasion to retire, to procure the necessary materials for dressing the fracture. During his absence, a pocket-book, containing 119*l.* in notes, it was said, was missed. This fact was alleged by the prosecutor; but the Lord Mayor, thinking his evidence insufficient, sent one of the Marshals (Mr. Wontner) to the Tavern, where the prosecutrix declared, that she had placed the pocket-book, containing the money, as before stated, upon a chair close to her bedside, and that no other persons but the surgeons had been in the room. After an investigation of more than two hours, the defendants were ordered to appear on a future day; but, at a late hour on Saturday night, the money was found under the patient's bed.

UNION-HALL.

Isaac Tapper, preacher at the Paragon Chapel, Lock's-fields, Southwark, on Tuesday appeared before the Magistrate to answer the charge preferred against him by Collingbourn and another officer, for unlawfully having in his possession various articles of lead, pewter, copper, &c. and also a number of birch-brooms, the latter stolen from Mr. Stiles, dealer, of the Kent-road.—The defendant accounted in a satisfactory manner for several of the articles which had been seized on his premises: but the pewter pots, lead, and iron, were condemned, and he was fined 40*s.* under the lead and iron act. Mr. Stiles positively swore that the brooms were part of 6 bundles which were stolen from his premises, and upon this charge Mr. Tapper was held to bail for his personal appearance at the Quarter-Sessions. His friends immediately entered into the necessary recognizances, and paid the penalty. On leaving the Court, the defendant declared that the whole business was a conspiracy, and that he would instantly institute proceedings against the officers, and never relax in his exertions until he procured their suspension or dismissal from their situations.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Tuesday afternoon, as one of the Hammersmith stages was proceeding along Piccadilly, loaded inside and out, one of the wheels came off, and the coach was overturned. Two or three children, with their parents, were on the outside, and the former falling under the wheels, were dreadfully cut and bruised. Nearly every passenger was hurt.

Tuesday night, as Mr. Waller, of Westminster, was proceeding along the New Cut, near the Cobourg Theatre, he was stopped by three stout fellows, who after severely beating him, robbed him of 5*l.* in Bank of England notes, and his watch.

Wednesday night, a Mr. Forty, of Whitechapel, with a relation and a friend, was returning home from Edmonton, where they had been spending the day, were attacked by a party of men armed with bludgeons, who severely beat and robbed them of all their money and watches.

A Bankrupt of the name of Cowen, who fled from his commission some time ago to Rotterdam, was apprehended there by a Police Officer from London a few days ago; in consequence of which he hung himself in prison the second day of his confinement.

The celebrated chieftain, Sir Gregor Macgregor, whose exploits in South America have been the theme of so much conversation, had a narrow escape a few days ago from an "unlambelld death," by the accidental overturning, near Wooler, of a stage-coach, in which he was a passenger from Newcastle to Edinburgh. A young lady in the coach had her collar-bone broken, and was so much bruised that she was obliged to be left at Wooler.—Edinburgh paper.

DISCIPLINE OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

By one of those particular pieces of carefulness, which defeat themselves, we have laid the number of the Chronicle containing the debate on this subject in some place or other so very safe, that we cannot find it;—like some over-anxious persons,—our friends the money-getters for instance,—who take such extreme care of their happiness, that they never light upon it.

We are unable therefore, unfortunately, to gratify our readers with some extracts we had intended to make from Mr. BROUGHAM's speech;—but we well remember that it was in every respect worthy of him,—well-worded and well-minded,—industrious, enlarged, minutely inspecting yet largely viewing,—acute yet broad as a wedge. It was an excellent specimen of that rare union of detail and generalization which we have more than once noticed in this statesman.

The passages however to which we allude are not necessary to our present article on the subject, though it would have been desirable to have them introduce it. What we chiefly intended to write about was a distinguishing character in the discipline of our chief public schools; which though notorious enough, is not likely to be noticed in the speeches of public men, but which in our opinion has done quite enough public as well as private mischief to render delicacy towards it misplaced.

We hope then that when those enquiries, which Mr. BROUGHAM has so honourably set on foot, come to be made into the state of our public schools, their funds, modes of instruction, &c., a special and steady eye will be directed to that kind of discipline which prevails among the boys themselves, and is more than winked at by the masters;—we mean the system known by the name of fagging.

To fag, in a neuter sense, is a phrase luckily unknown out of the pale of the schools in question; but the uninitiated may have some faint idea of it by other uses of the word, most probably borrowed from it,—as, I shall fag myself if I submit to such a task,—or I shall be completely fagged;—meaning completely tired, or knocked up. But this includes nothing of the involuntary and slavish barbarism of the real, aboriginal fagging. To fag, as a school-boy, means to be the abject slave and tool of an older boy, who has himself been a slave and tool to another, and who in nineteen cases out of twenty shews the effect it has had upon him by being as despotic and barbarous in turn, as he was despotically and barbarously treated. Our readers would scarcely credit the stories, which any boy so brought up could tell him on this subject. Even in less presuming institutions, and where the masters discountenance such a system, the occasional tendencies to it are bad enough, as the writer of this article knows by experience. He was educated in the Grammar-School of Christ's Hospital, the general character of which for a solid grounding in letters, for an equal distance from impudence and servility of manners, and for a certain abstraction from the world in the very heart of the city, tending to simplicity and the growth of individual enthusiasm, seems almost to have been caught in some degree from that of its young founder EDWARD the Sixth; but more of this in our next. Yet even in this genuine old English institution, where boys from all ranks of decayed gentry and tradesmen were admitted, more individual tyranny would sometimes be exercised, merely from want of enquiry into the matter, than the sufferers chose to complain of; and the present writer, who though retiring to a degree of timidity in other respects, had a good deal of passive courage, and was taught early to speculate in humanity, well remembers a young would-be despot who used to beat him regularly every night for two or three weeks with a handkerchief tied into knots, for refusing to be his servant;—and he beat him in vain. He also recollects another, who indulged himself in a true old Roman-Emperor trick of pelting a hard ball with all his might close at the back of a boy's head, and they ingeniously making the hittee bring the ball himself, and go away again, so that his pericranium was always ready for having the operation repeated. He ventured to remonstrate with this youth,—which was thought very romanic and gratuitous; but the consequence was the cessation of this legitimate sport; and thus it is that institutions of so sound a nature are in such respects able to reform themselves, for two reasons,—first, because the lesser boys are not in the habit of being slaves to the others,—and second, because it is understood that the masters would discountenance such practices if they knew them. But what is likely to be the case, when slavery and tyranny are made into a regular system, and the master is known to countenance them? All power has a tendency to encroachment, especially in the hands of those who are unable to appreciate any thing but power; and the consequence of this system at most of the public schools is, that the great boys get an absolute relish for tormenting the little ones, especially if the latter flinch or grow refractory. The sending them to warm their beds in cold weather by lying in them first, is the most bearable of their freaks. If you have an aspiring genius for your master, he thinks it is but a right of his sovereign ambition whenever he pleases (which is of course very often) to make you carry him till you drop, with the stimulus perhaps of a great pin for a spur. If he undertakes only to be manly (for this is the usual vain pretence and sophisticating nonsense) you must make a point of not objecting, in proportion as he inflicts reasons for the reverse; or you are to be thought ill of by all the petty tyrants assembled, especially those who roared in their apprenticeship. If the young Domitian is delicate, the least thing you can do is to stand before him at a roasting fire for a screen. If he is hardy, and you only are delicate, you must join in his winter sports with chilblains on your hands and feet. If he is loathsome in his ideas, (which is very apt to be a part of the "manliness"), you must undergo the most disgusting humiliation, and swallow compounds that would sicken a ditch-reptile. And lastly, if you shew a little real manliness, and offend your master or masters, or take the part of one whom they are tormenting, they will persecute you with all the malignity of young demons:—you shall not sleep quietly in your bed at night, nor move without a snare by day:—you shall be dragged suddenly out of your dreams by the hair of your head:—you shall be trampled and spit upon;—you shall be stripped naked, and made alternately to blush and turn pale with shame and terror;—you shall be tied down on a table, and have some tender part of your body, the shin-bones for instance, scourged into blood with nettles. Some of our readers may think this an exaggeration; but it is true to the letter; and we have only given a few specimens of the enormities that are practised. A particular and excellent friend of ours underwent the last punishment, because he had the courage to set his face against them;—he complained to the masters, and they would not listen to him;—he at last, with the ambition of a proper genius, succeeded for the first time perhaps since the foundation of the school in organizing a whole party against the system; and he was expelled.

Now the great argument for this system, when the question is discussed, is, that it is bringing people up properly to encounter the struggles and adversities of the world; and the great arguers for it, we will venture to say, are composed of two descriptions of persons,—first, a few men who are thrown into a peculiarly rough mode of life, such as naval officers, and not the wisest of these (for it has been a characteristic mark of the very greatest men in the service to be particularly tender and encouraging to youth:); and second, a vast number of petty government tyrants, clerks in office, humble expectants, toad-eaters, cock-fighters, people who wish to be well in with power, men too dull to do without the grossest excitement to their imaginations, pretenders to manliness from a consciousness of the reverse, grim lookers, well-dressed bullies of all sorts, supercilious aristocrats, &c. &c.; in short, all those who cannot afford to think they ever did wrong, or who have never recovered their first slavery, or who find mean submission a profitable thing, and whatever tyranny they can exercise, another stimulating re-payment. We say nothing of a more honest individual here and there, who is weak enough to think himself strong, in advocating what he takes for "strong measures:"—and the lads themselves are of course out of the question.

These people talk of the "manliness" of the system; but some of them will privately confess, though still advocate the real nature of it; and those who will not, sufficiently let out the secret by means of their own natures. The whole truth is, it is nothing but a system of alternate slavery and tyranny, fitted to make alternate slaves and tyrants in the political world; and the sordid encroachments upon the Constitution for the last hundred years never had a better friend from their cradle.

We will explain this at large in our next,—not because we think the explanation necessary to good understandings, but because it is right, on many other accounts, to lay open the whole subject, especially at an opportunity like the present. Among other illustrative passages, we shall give the portrait of a full-grown pupil of this "discipline of humanity,"—such as Mr. CANNING, for instance.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

GERMANY.

MANHEIM, MAY 4.—The Baron d'Amstetten, Russian Minister to the Germanic Diet, has received very important dispatches from Warsaw: he immediately sent off an agent to Aix-la-Chapelle, to select and prepare an hotel for the Emperor Alexander. It appears certain also, that most of the Sovereigns of Germany will proceed to Aix-la-Chapelle; they will not only be engaged with the evacuation of the French territory, but likewise with the interests of Europe in general, and those of Germany in particular. It is moreover asserted, in a positive manner, that the Duke de Richelieu and Lord Castlereagh will be at Aix-la-Chapelle during the stay of the three Allied Sovereigns.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, May 13.

Several Bills were forwarded in their various stages.

ROYAL MARRIAGE.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL brought down a Message from the Prince Regent. (For which see the Commons.)—Ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 14.

CHIMNEY-SWEEPERS' BILL.

On the motion of Lord AUCKLAND, the 3d reading of this Bill was postponed till this day six months.—He said, that the investigation of the subject in the Committee had proved the necessity of delay. Though there had been much contradictory evidence, yet the preponderance was greatly in favour of the abolition of the practice of employing children. In the mean time an address had been voted, for the purpose of causing an experiment as to the practicability of using machinery. That experiment had commenced on a very extensive scale, and 60 of the most difficult chimneys had been swept without any failure. The result of the experiment will afterwards be considered by a Board composed of Bricklayers and Masons. The Bill would be introduced early in the next session, with a full confidence of success in the accomplishment of a measure, which would prove not only beneficial to the individuals who were the objects of it, but to the whole community.

ROYAL MARRIAGE.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL moved the consideration of the Prince Regent's message on the subject of the marriage of the Duke of Kent. On the message being read, the Noble Earl observed, that after what had already passed on the subject of making provision for the members of the Royal Family who might contract marriages with the consent of the Crown, it would not be necessary for him to detain their Lordships with any detailed observation. He should merely state, that it was the intention of his Majesty's Ministers to propose to Parliament the same arrangement as had already been sanctioned by their Lordships in the case of the Duke of Cambridge.—He then moved an Address of Thanks to the Prince Regent for the communication, expressing their Lordships' satisfaction at the intended union, and their readiness to concur in the measures necessary for making a suitable provision for the Royal Duke.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN made a few observations, and the Address was agreed to.

ALIENS.

Lord HOLLAND, after some observations on the general effects of Alien Bills, moved for certain papers on the subject, partly for the purpose, he said, of bringing under the consideration of Parliament the conduct of Government in respect to the unfortunate and persecuted persons now exiled from France.

Lord LIVERPOOL opposed the motion, and it was negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 15.

NEW CHURCHES BILL.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL moved the 2d reading of this Bill, and after some observations on the importance and necessity of the measure, stated, that by the present Bill five new Churches would be erected in Mary-bone, five in Pancras, four in St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, four in Bloomsbury, three in Lambeth; and in the country, seven in Manchester, four in Sheffield, three in Stockport, four in Birmingham, and two in Newcastle.—It was proposed to build a hundred altogether, which, at 10,000*l.* each, would cost one million of money.

Lord HOLLAND said, that he was friendly to the Bill, with certain modifications; but he thought the revenues of the Church itself should supply a portion of the million, so that all should not be taken out of the people's pockets at such a crisis as this.

After a short conversation, the Bill was read a 2d time.—Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 13.

Alderman WOOD presented 18 Petitions from places in Lancashire, complaining of taxes, and praying for Parliamentary Reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

MARRIAGE ACT.

Dr. PHILLIMORE moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend certain provisions in the Act of the 26th of Geo. II. commonly called the Marriage Act, as to licenses and bans. As the case now stood, all marriages solemnized under license by parties under age, without consent of parents or guardians, were void. The wording of the Act was so unqualified, that the matrimonial courts felt it an imperative duty upon them to pronounce such marriages contracted by parties under age void, although the man had lived years with his wife, and had children. To get rid of his wife he might aver his own injury; a scandal of this sort ought to be remedied. The remedy he wished to propose was this—that if no proceedings were instituted to invalidate the marriage during the minority, nor within one year after the attainment of majority, the marriage should be held good. He also intended to submit a farther measure, to remove some inconveniences respecting marriage by bans, which are given out in the church of the parish to which the party belongs. After publication by bans, it was not necessary to give proofs of residence in the parish. But such was the operation of the Act, that marriages were contracted daily without the required residence. He wished the matrimonial courts to be made competent to inquire properly into the fact of a minor's residence at the period of marriage, with the view also, in the case of cohabitation for a year after coming of age, that the marriage should stand good.

Leave was given, and a Committee named to prepare the Bill.

WELCH COURTS.

Mr. JONES made various observations on circumstances peculiar to the practice of the Courts of Law in Wales, with respect to petty juries, fines, certiorari's, &c. It was desirable to assimilate them as much as possible with the practice in England. He moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts on this subject, and to alter and regulate the practice of Courts of Great Session in Wales, and the laws relating to the same, &c.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill, and a Committee was appointed to prepare it.

PURITY OF PARLIAMENT!—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. C. WYNN moved an address to the Prince Regent for the removal of Thomas Ferguson from the situation he held as a surveyor of taxes in the county of Lanark, he having been guilty of a corrupt attempt against the freedom and independence of Parliament, and of a high breach of privilege. It appeared that this person was a collector of the revenue, and, therefore, he apprehended that the House could not avoid taking proper steps for his removal from his office. He was aware that it was a painful task to propose the infliction of additional punishments on an individual (Hear); yet he was fortified by precedents, and a sense of duty. A case had been alluded to, (that of Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Perceval) which did not apply in the present instance, as in that case no decision was come to. But here the offence was on record.

Sir F. BURDETT moved, that a Petition for Parliamentary Reform, presented in 1793, be read. (This was the celebrated Petition of the Friends of the People, drawn up by Mr. Tierney.)

The Clerk then read the Petition of 1793 throughout. It states the character of the Constitution, as composed of King, Lords, and Commons, and showed that the House of Commons does not fairly represent the people. The Petitioners said, they only stated facts as to the state of the representation, which they were prepared to prove. They noticed the partial rights of counties in returning members to Parliament, instanced the disparity between Cornwall and Yorkshire, and the whole of Scotland, and observed that 15,000 votes returned a majority of members. They observed, farther, that there was no national general principle on which votes were held; and that, by the septennial act, Parliaments might be chosen only once in seven years, &c.

Sir F. BURDETT then moved for the reading of a resolution of a Committee on the case of an election return for Great Grimsby.

The clerk read the resolution, which stated Mr. W. W. Pöle, by his agent, (and others), had been guilty of bribery at the election for Great Grimsby, at the general election preceding.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT observed briefly, that as, in the case just noticed, no steps had been taken against those accused, he must protest against the inconsistency and injustice of proceeding in the way proposed against Thomas Ferguson.—(Hear.)

Mr. STURGES BOURNE had no desire to excuse Ferguson's offences; yet, if information of circumstances of a criminal nature were obtained from an individual by interrogatories, while he was not cautioned against the consequences, he thought the House ought to act with moderation, let the crime be what it might.

Mr. BRAGGE BATHURST observed that Parliament had recognized the offence to be a very heinous one, and it was, in fact, one of considerable guilt. Ferguson had other sources of emolument than that arising from the office of tax-surveyor.

Mr. DENIS BROWN observed, that Peers never had meddled in elections in any way, and never did so.—(A laugh.)

Mr. JONES opposed the motion as too severe.

Mr. METTUEEN did not think the House did themselves any credit by visiting such offences with very great severity, at the same time that a Noble Lord had committed the same offence, or nearly so, with impunity.

Mr. LYTTELTON would ask, whether the punishment proposed would have the least tendency to prevent similar offences? (Hear, hear! from Mr. Wynn.) The Hon. Gentleman, by his cheers, seemed to imply that, in his opinion, it would. It was a mere matter of opinion, however; and his was, that unless there was a more equal punishment, the use of great severity, in occasional instances, would have no other effect than that of turning the attention of the people to the more vulnerable parts of the constitution of that House, rather than to prevent the character of the House from being liable to suspicion.

Lord FOLKESTONE remarked, that it was urged it would be very hard to punish Ferguson, because other greater delinquents had gone unpunished. But when he thought that the greater delinquents ought to be punished, he thought the same also of the smaller. The question now was, whether Ferguson should be discharged from his situation of tax-gatherer, which he had made use of in order to procure votes for the election of a Member to Parliament. By negativing the address, the House would affirm the proposition, that all persons connected with the revenue might use the influence their connexion gave them to procure votes for the service of the crown.

Lord BIXING said, there was but one case in which a man had been both sent to Newgate and deprived of his office. The Bishop of Worcester, who was Lord Almoner to the Crown, and who, as a Peer of the realm, had interfered in an election, was deprived of the office of almoner with a salary of 100*l.* per annum. It was only necessary to state the fact, to show the difference between the direct interference of a peer and the present case of a poor man, who was merely led away by his own corrupt zeal to serve his friend. Martin, the Mayor of Winchester, the returning officer of a borough, had been guilty of threats and other improper conduct in an election; he had not been sent to Newgate. The Receiver-General of Stafford, Mr. Gurslam, had been guilty of money-bribery at an election, and two Members were elected chiefly in consequence of his proceedings. It had been advised to remove him from his office and he had been removed, but he had not been imprisoned. An Inspector of the Customs between Berwick-upon-Tweed and Hull, had engaged to pay annually a part of his salary to a voter, for his vote, for the borough of Heydon. He had not been taken into custody at all; but the Crown had removed him from his office. Mr. Middleton, high-sheriff for Denbigh, for having returned Sir John Middleton, contrary to a majority of votes, had lost the situation of receiver, and had been sent to Newgate. It was their duty to meet every violation of the law in such cases with proper severity; but he submitted whether imprisonment in Newgate was not sufficient, if not to prevent such offences, at least to inform that man and all others that they could not play tricks of that kind with impunity?

Mr. CANNING thought that the measure of punishment had been sufficient. The Bishop of Worcester had been removed from his situation as a general punishment, as the only mark of displeasure which the House could inflict on him: and they had given a substantial mark of their displeasure by sending Ferguson to prison. Upon full consideration, after a fair and complete examination, the House had made its option; and therefore, not as it would be a mark of its displeasure, but as it would be the utter ruin of its object, he could not consent to the motion.

Mr. W. WYNN, in reply, observed, that when cases came before them, the House ought to deal with them as the laws and constitution required. There were instances in which he thought the House had been remiss. The Noble Lord had moved the previous question, he recollected; upon a former case—on the case of Lord Castlereagh; and had argued that they should pass it by as a case unworthy of consideration. Though the House had a strong wish to favour the Noble Lord (Castlereagh), they could not make up their minds to the proceeding proposed by the Noble Lord, and the previous question had been negatived almost unanimously. Whatever was the mode of election, whether the Parliament was to be annual, or for whatever other period, it was still necessary that they should punish those who sold votes, or procured them by corruption. On the subject of Reform he might say, they should begin to reform from the moment in which they were speaking. That very measure was one of reform. It was the glory of the Constitution that the House had the power of reforming itself.

The House then divided, when there were—For the motion, 57—Against the motion, and for the previous question, 106—Majority against the motion, 49.

ROYAL MESSAGE.

Lord CASTLEREAGH brought up a Message from the Prince Regent. It required the House that his Royal Highness had given his assent to a treaty of marriage between the Duke of Kent and her Serene Highness Maria Louisa Victoria, widow of the Prince of Linangen, and sister of the reigning Prince of Saxe-Coburg, and of his Royal Highness Prince Leopold. It then stated, that his Royal Highness had no doubt that this communication would be acceptable to the House; and it concluded with a hope, that the House would enable his Royal Highness to make a suitable provision for the intended marriage.

Upon the motion of Lord CASTLEREAGH, the House agreed to present an Address to the Prince Regent, thanking him for his gracious Message, and assuring him that they would take it into immediate consideration.

LAW OF SETTLEMENT.

Mr. HEATHCOTE presented a Petition against the Bill for regulating the settlement of the poor, which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. S. BODANE said, that whether or not he should press the subject this session, depended on the sentiments that might be expressed from the several parts of the House.

Lord FOLKESTONE wished to know if any Member was anxious that it should be pressed this session?

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that if it should stand over, it should be after the fullest consideration of the various parts of the measure; he therefore hoped that, at least, the report should be taken into further consideration this session.

Mr. S. BODANE postponed the further consideration of the report to Monday.

IRISH ASSESSED TAXES.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in a Committee upon the Bill on this subject, stated his views and intentions. The interest of the Consolidated Fund of Ireland was 6,500,000*l.* Irish; the Revenue last year did not exceed 5,000,000*l.*; there was thus a deficiency of 1,000,000*l.* He felt, however, that it was the wish of Parliament to extend some relief to Ireland; and from the experience of the last three years, as well as from the particular distress occasioned by the window-tax, he was anxious to give relief, so far as was consistent with the benefit of the whole empire. Assessed Taxes he should advert to with the greatest caution, and he should not make any reduction. The tax on carriages had excited public attention, and he had been, during the last years, a considerable diminution in the receipts in Ireland, but this had arisen not from the operation of the taxes, but from other circumstances in the internal state of Ireland. There was in that country a greater want of employment, as a larger proportion of the consumption of Ireland had depended on the war: but he thought it right, notwithstanding, to reduce the Window-tax 25 per cent.—There was, besides, another class of taxes to which relief was to be extended. The Assessed Taxes might be divided into two classes: the direct taxes, which were imposed solely for revenue, such as the Hearth and Window-tax in Ireland, and the House and Window-tax in England; and the taxes which were partly of the nature of sumptuary laws, such as the taxes on servants, horses, and carriages used by the higher classes. These taxes advanced in an increased ratio. Upon this latter class a considerable relief was to be given. The first effect expected from this relief was the removal of the complaint of want of employment. When gentlemen could employ additional servants, horses, or carriages, without additional expense, it might be expected that more employment would be found for men. A second advantage was the inducement which this reduction would afford for Gentlemen to reside in their own country. If individuals could be thus induced to return to their own country, and to spend their incomes among their tenants and dependants, he was sure that Ireland would be greatly benefited, and that the House would not hesitate to remove the tax in question. But there was one class of carriages, in particular, which would be relieved, the jaunting car, which was the national carriage of Ireland. The tax on this vehicle was to be reduced from 6*l.* 10*s.* to two guineas. This reduction would add considerably to the comforts of the people of Ireland.

A conversation ensued; and on the clause respecting the Window-tax, Sir F. BURETT observed, that there was little cause for jealousy on the ground of taxation, since England, Ireland, and Scotland were all equally burdened to the utmost they could sustain. Those who had been in Ireland must know that the universal opinion there was, that this impost upon windows was adopted only as a war-tax, and if the Irish had not shown that "ignorant impatience of taxation" which it had been said the people of England had evinced, it was no reason, now they had remonstrated, why they should not be relieved. The strong part of the other case was the grievous oppressiveness of the tax; it was a tax upon life, the most odious of all taxes, for, on the most authentic evidence, it appeared that disease and death were promoted by it. When Ireland was violently compelled to agree in the Union, she had little or no debt; it had nearly all been incurred since that calamitous event; yet the pretence of taking off this burden upon England had been made a matter of boast on the other side, and it was urged that on this account Ireland ought to sustain additional deprivations. Admitting, for a moment only, that she ought, the thing was impossible; Ireland could bear no more, and it would have been impracticable to collect more there than in this country at the time the Income Tax was repealed. Each was equally overlaid; and before this tax were continued to the destruction of the population, Ireland had a right to call upon Ministers to make all possible retrenchments, by the abolition of sinecures, and the reduction of the needless emoluments of office. The repeal of the tax would be most importantly beneficial in all views—it would augment the population, render the natives contented and happy, and diminish the necessity for so large a standing army.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said that nothing could be more gratifying to him than to adopt any measure conciliatory towards Ireland, after the many sufferings she had recently endured in a manner that well merited the gratitude of the rest of the empire. It was easy, however, to rail, as the Hon. Baronet had done, against sinecures and a standing army; but each of those questions had already been decided by the House, and such topics were not likely to soothe feelings already too much irritated. The point urged by the Hon. Baronet respecting the great expenses of the late war was surely too long a chapter to be now opened; and the assertion that the fever was to be attributed to the Window-tax was only one of those pictures which the Hon. Baronet was rather fond of painting to the House, in which a visitation of Providence was charged as the consequence of the misconduct of Ministers. The fever only broke out last year, though the tax had long existed; and it even pressed upon Scotland more severely than upon Ireland, for no house of less than seven windows was subject to it: so that to state that disease and death were promoted by it among the poor was both a perversion of reason and of fact. It was impossible, however, to exempt Ireland without burdening other parts of the empire; for the Hon. Baronet would find few to argue with him in the opinion, that the exigency of public affairs did not require the collection of the present amount of revenue. His Lordship insisted that, had the Union not taken place, the debt of Ireland would have been far beyond its present amount, 1,500,000*l*. He was quite ready to sustain his share of the unpopularity that would attend voting against this unjust and unnecessary relaxation.

The House then divided, when the numbers were—For the motion, 80—Against it, and for the amendment, 55—Majority, 25.

When we were re-admitted into the gallery, we found Sir J. NEWPORT objecting to the scale of the proposed reduction of the Assessed Taxes.

A long conversation ensued, when the resolutions allowing reductions in the Assessed Taxes on servants, horses, and carriages, were agreed to.

Sir J. NEWPORT moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent the extension of typhus fever in Ireland, and to make further provision in hospitals for the cure of the disease.—Leave granted.

EDUCATION.

On the motion of Mr. BROUGHAM, the House resolved itself into a Committee on the Education of the Poor, when 4,000*l*. was agreed on as a sum for defraying the expenses of the Commissioners for investigating the abuses in the appropriation of charitable funds for the purposes of education.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 14.

PETITION FROM MR. COBBETT.

Lord COCHRANE said he had a Petition to present from a great political writer, accompanied by documents from two other persons (W. Kendal and W. Stevens), who had become exiles in consequence of the practices of spies and informers in this country.

The Petition was brought up and read by the clerk. It was of very considerable length, purporting to come from William Cobbett, of Botley, now of New York, North America, and dated March 7, 1818. He stated his feelings of veneration for the numerous acts of justice and liberality performed by the Honourable House, and prayed with all humility to approach the sanctuary of the laws. He prayed for their consideration of the effects resulting from the artifices of spies, informers, and designing men, and prostituted lawyers; and lamented the consequence of the House deferring their conscientious consideration of the important matters about which the documents would give some communication. He had met two of his countrymen in Philadelphia, who had related much of the practices of Oliver, the spy. They drew up their statements voluntarily, and authenticated them upon their oaths before the Mayor of Philadelphia. These statements they delivered to the Petitioner, who now presumed to submit them to the House, and to place them in their undefiled hands for proper examination. The Petition made some strong remarks on the conduct and language of Mr. Cross, on the Derby trials, and on Col. Fletcher, who attended a meeting at Manchester. After the execution of Brandreth, he observed that it was stated in two ministerial prints, that there was an intention on the part of Government to check or stop the publication and circulation of a certain description of writings. He had thought it his duty to the House and the country to submit this Petition, with the documents added to it, especially as the latter were drawn up voluntarily. The Petitioner concluded by praying that the House would order an investigation into the real nature of those transactions which led to the death of Brandreth and others.

Lord COCHRANE moved that the Petition be ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. B. BATHURST objected to the reception of the Petition, which he said, contained libellous attacks upon Colonel Fletcher and Mr. Cross, without any particular prayer relative to the Petitioner himself; and the annexed documents (as the Speaker had stated) could not be received by the House, though without them the object of the Petitioner could not be made out.

Lord COCHRANE consented to withdraw the Petition, as the mode was irregular; but he thought that Government, for its own character, should enter on an investigation of the events alluded to in the Petition.

FORGED BANK NOTES.

Sir J. MACINTOSH called the attention of the House to this important subject. He contended that the evil had now reached such a formidable height, that inquiry was indispensable. In the minds of the public at large—in the minds of the more respectable part of the community—in the minds of those least interested in questions of politics—in the minds of all classes, there prevailed a horror at the bloodshed which had followed the stoppage of cash-payments—(Hear, hear!)—for twelve years before the stoppage of cash-payments, there had been only one capital execution for forgery of Bank-notes. It was the rarest of all criminal cases. In the last seven years not less than 101 persons had suffered death for a crime for which only one had suffered in 12 years. The crime which had been so rare and unfrequent became the most frequent and the most fatal—(Hear, hear!)—There was another point of view in which this evil appeared still more striking and horrible—not less than 44 persons were capitally executed in London and Middlesex for this crime in the last seven years—(Hear, hear!)—In the account of those crimes which terminated in capital punishment, forgery was at the head of the list—before murder, and still more, before the next crime which was visited with death—burglary. For forgery almost double the number executed for burglary had been capitally punished, and far more than for all other offences whatever. If this evil could not be remedied, which he feared it could not but by the resumption of cash payments, yet it could surely be mitigated. He implored of the House to consider how they could answer to their consciences and to their constituents, if they neglected to do what they owed to the country and to themselves—(Hear, hear!)—If all the executions, tremendous as they were, had diminished the crime, some plea might be urged for persisting in the same course; but all the tremendous shedding of blood for this crime was not enough. By the returns on the table of the prosecutions for 1816, 1817, and three months of 1818, the number of prosecutions were constantly increasing. During the three months of this year, the prosecutions had increased to so dreadful an extent, that if the number for the rest of the year should be in proportion, the number for the whole of this year would be three times greater than the number of last year, and that number had been greater than in any other year. The return of the expenses of those prosecutions had been made. The expenses of prosecutions for forgery on the part of the Bank last year were 30,000*l*.; in the present year, in which prosecutions had made such gigantic strides, in the three months of which returns had been made, the expense was within a few hundreds of 20,000*l*. The general average struck him as extremely alarming. It was 26*l*. for each individual prosecuted since 1797. This was not only monstrous in itself, but very alarming in its tendency. In the same manner it appeared from the last returns, that in the course of the last three years, forgery, which had formerly affected only small notes, had inclined to the larger ones. The severity of punishment had no sensible effect. A Learned Judge, who in passing sentence of death upon several persons for forgery, in Lancaster, lamented that the frequent capital punishments had not diminished the crime. On this occasion the Chief Baron said, that unless some other means were devised, it would be necessary to make examples still more horrible and striking. He must apologize for occupying the time of the House, but he felt it due to the House, to the Bank, and to the public, to state explicitly his view of the subject—(Hear!)—The summary of the home office, of the state of crimes, none could read without alarm. It appeared that from 1805 to 1811, the number of capital punishments was 200. From 1811 to 1818, it was 580, which was 1-8th more than in the former period. Increase of crime could not be denied to indicate a change in the general state of morals. If he were to assign a cause for this change, he should not name any ordinary or political cause, but what the Right Hon. Gentleman had very happily called economical causes. It proceeded from the prodigious ebbs and flows in the means of subsistence, from the various wages of labour, and from the perpetual changes in the currency of the country. Men felt as if they were the sport of some malignant demon; and finding themselves thus the sport of fortune, they put on a desperate and gambling character. He would say nothing of the losses arising from the present system, although they were very great. An Hon. Baronet had stated, that one half of the Bank-notes circulated in the northern counties were forged. He might here suggest to the consideration of the House, that the principal sufferers in point of pecuniary loss were to be found in the class of small tradesmen, a description of persons eminently entitled to the protection of the laws. A case recently came to his knowledge of a tradesman in Marybone, who, in endeavouring to defend himself against the payment of a forged 5*l*. note, lost not merely the 5*l*. but 25*l*. more in expenses. The statement of this single fact was sufficient to prove the existence of hundreds of a similar nature. Instances of the destruction of forged notes must be numerous; because, to many, the positive loss would appear a much smaller evil than the imputation to which they might be subjected by retaining them in their possession. And here he must express his hope that the understanding of the House would not again be insulted by the assertion, that the affairs of the Bank of England being those of a private company, were beyond the authority of Parliament. No private company, whose proceedings were so deeply implicated with the interests of public justice, could maintain such a principle; but in the relation which the Bank of England bore to the Government of the country, it was as ridiculous as if the same doctrine should be set up by the Officers of the Mint. (Hear, hear!) Now what was the case, in a few words, upon which his motion would be founded? For a period of 21 years, the evil of which he complained had been increasing, and during that period the Bank had taken no one step for the purpose of preventing or counteracting this increase. He did not mean to say, that they had not adopted abundant precautions for their own security, but they had entirely overlooked that of the unfortunate people of England; in consequence of which oversight, the liability of the public to be plundered and harassed remained the same as in the year 1797. Had not the public then a right to call upon that House to inquire in its own capacity, whether the continuance of this evil might have been prevented, or was owing to an inevitable necessity? Above all, inquiry was essential to the acquittal of the Bank Directors, and for the purpose of removing jealousy and suspicion from the public mind. These ends could not be accomplished without an effectual and rigorous investigation by the authority of that House. In addition, it might be well worthy their attention to consider whether some mode of punishment might not be devised, that should be more sparing of blood, and prevent the repetition of those scenes which shocked and afflicted every mind. He hoped it was not to impute improper conduct to the Bank Directors so say, that they were not exceptions to the general character of human nature; that like other corporate bodies, they adhered firmly to an established routine of forms, and felt a great reluctance to enter on the consideration of new projects. But new projects, in the present case, did not go to put to hazard a certain good, but aimed exclusively at the suppression of a monstrous evil. (Hear, hear!)—Since the last discussion of this subject he had seen many ingenious artists and scientific persons, and was induced, from their representations, to believe, that although the evil could not be suppressed whilst the circulation of small notes continued, it might be considerably mitigated. In the United States of America, already an example of national happiness, and likely soon to become one of wise legislation, also, he had been informed that a paper currency existed to the amount of 20,000,000*l.* Her paper currency was, however, convertible into money, forgery was not a capital offence, and the crime was of rare occurrence. The circumstances of America might be unfavourable to the commission of the offence; but it was nevertheless remarkable, that the banks in that country, not having the assistance of the gibbet to depend on, had employed the utmost ingenuity in the fabrication of their notes. He was informed on the other hand, by a very ingenious artist, that any boy who had been six months with an engraver, might imitate, so well as to make the difference imperceptible, the notes of the bank of England. Undoubtedly it would be found impossible so to manufacture a note as to set at defiance all the efforts of a skilful imitator; but the smallest abatement of that guilt and bloodshed which at present constituted so alarming an evil in society, appeared to him in the highest degree worthy attention. He concluded by moving, that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the means of more effectually preventing the forgery of notes of the Bank of England, and to report their opinions thereon.—(Hear, hear!)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER perfectly concurred with the Learned Gentleman's opinion, as to the necessity of some inquiry. He did not think, however, that the proposed mode was likely to afford a very satisfactory result, the investigation involving a great deal of scientific research, and demanding assiduous attention. It appeared to him, therefore, that it would be more expedient, with a view to the discovery of an adequate remedy, to address the Crown for the appointment of a Commission which should be charged with this inquiry. The duration of this Commission would be limited only by the extent of their labours, whilst that of a Committee must be regulated by the sitting of the House. The Hon. and Learned Gentleman had stated, that he had had several new methods of fabricating notes submitted to his inspection, and that he thought well of some of them. For his own part he had examined a great number, and although many were extremely plausible, some radical defect was discoverable in them all. Still he did not despair that a considerable improvement might be effected, although he felt it right to caution the House against entertaining very sanguine expectations with respect to an effectual remedy. The offence of coining counterfeit money had increased in a much greater proportion than the forgery of Bank-notes, the number of convictions for the three last years ending 1813 being 392, and for the last three years 624. The fact was, that it kept pace with the increase of other crimes, and could not be prevented by a reduction of our paper currency. The evil, though of great magnitude, could not fairly be imputed to the extent of our paper-currency, or any want of care on the part of the Bank Directors. Forgery was a crime which he feared had always existed in a commercial and enlightened country, where education was generally diffused, and the means of committing the offence were always at hand. He should move, that after the word "That," be inserted, "an humble Address to the Prince Regent, that he would be graciously pleased to issue a Commission, under the Great Seal, for an inquiry into the most effectual means of preventing the forgery of the promissory notes of the Bank of England, and of other banks; as likewise, the forgery of other negotiable securities."

Sir C. MORGAN declared his preference of the mode of inquiry proposed by the Learned Gentleman.

Mr. BENNET commented with much severity on the conduct of the Bank in the cases of several individuals convicted of, or under prosecution for, this offence. He felt it his duty to concur in the motion of his Hon. and Learned Friend, and he trusted that it would receive the support of every Member in the House.

Mr. SAMUEL THORNTON said, the Bank had uniformly endeavoured to exercise the utmost disposition to leniency. And with regard to the prosecution of particular cases, the solicitor of the Bank was not allowed to exercise his own discretion, but always acted under the directions and on the responsibility of his employers.

Mr. HUSKISSON thought it necessary that some measure should be immediately adopted; for although the Bank could ascertain whether the notes were good or not, it was not in the power of the holder to say whether it was genuine, nor could he compel another to receive it in payment, if he conceived it not to be genuine. This was not the case with the coin of the realm.—(Hear, hear!)

Sir SAMUEL ROBERTS thought that the system now acted upon led to all those mischievous consequences which his Hon. Friend had pointed out. In every case of selection, the people criticised the distinction, and thought that great injustice had been committed. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. MANNING said, the Directors judged of every case with the utmost solicitude. They were governed in their proceedings, not by a regard for their own interest, but for the protection of the public: the expenses were paid out of the funds of the Corporation, and for the express purpose of saving harmless those who had been imposed upon by forged notes, and who were unable to bear the expenses. It was not the practice of the Bank to interfere after judgment.—In the course of the last few years, this crime had increased to a most alarming degree. The several offenders in England, in 1811, amounted to 5,373: in 1817, they had increased to 13,933. He could assure the House, that the Bank would be happy to concur in such measures as might be deemed most practicable for preventing forgery; but it would be perfectly idle to adopt any project that might be submitted to them from day to day, and which might be copied by their engraver in three or four days. He had witnessed their patient attention to the subject, and he would add, that they would spare no expense whatever to adopt such a plan as might be found most effectual for checking the evil. The reason why they detained the notes, after the word "forged" had been stamped upon them, was, that in cases in which they had gone out again, that word had been erased by a chymical process.

Sir A. PIGOTT replied to the charges brought against the Bank. Many projects had been already examined, and others would be attended to; but when it was considered that many experiments had ended in failure, he thought it was not asking too much from the opponents of the Bank to allow two things—first, that the Directors had not been idle or negligent; and, secondly, that a remedy was not so easy a thing as some people seemed to think.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the Bank appeared to him to have acted wrong, in withholding from the public that criterion by which they themselves were enabled to determine a forgery. For the last 20 years no new attempt had been made to prevent forgery. The Bank had not done all that it could to remedy the evil complained of, and the public was joined by the House in thinking so. He was of opinion that a Committee could best sift the subject.

Mr. CANNING preferred the proposed Commission, because he thought it would be most effectual. He was persuaded that a remedy to a certain extent might be found, but it would consist in the skill with which the plate was formed, and the greater difficulty of its imitation, from the delicacy of its execution.

Sir J. MACINTOSH replied:—If a Royal Commission were appointed, no report could be made before January or February, and in the mean time the whole evil was continued. He could not agree that men of science would be the best judges upon a question of this kind. They might be the best witnesses, but it was for men of sense and education to decide, uninfluenced by the power of the Crown, and fearless of displeasing Ministers.—He contended that a Commission would not in any respect remove the distrust existing in the public mind; on the contrary, it would be immediately concluded that there was a collusion between the Directors and Ministers, and that the mere tools of the latter had been appointed for the purpose of gratifying the former. It was the duty of the House to be firm upon this subject, to oppose itself as a proud barrier for the defence of the people against the Directors of the Bank and Ministers, unless it wished to confirm the ill opinion entertained of it by many out of doors.

The House then divided.—For the Amendment, 106.—For the Motion, 62.—Majority, 44.

After some conversation a new Address was proposed, the object of which was the same as the former, except that it did not extend to the country-banks, but was limited to the Bank of England alone.—Agreed to.

TREATMENT OF COUNT LAS CASES.

Mr. J. P. GRANT brought forward his motion on the treatment of Count Las Cases. That person had been taken from St. Helena under the authority conferred on the Governor, and transmitted thence to the Cape of Good Hope. He had been thence sent up the country by the authority of the Governor, and detained for many months against his inclination. When he arrived in the Thames, that very night a despatch was sent from the Alien-office, an officer was sent on board to him, and his papers were taken from him, by what authority he knew not. He was then sent to Ostend, where he was treated as a prisoner. He was next delivered to the Prussians, and by them treated as a prisoner, and conveyed to Frankfort, where he believed he was still detained under the surveillance of the police. The Learned Gentleman concluded, by moving an Address to the Prince Regent, praying that he would be pleased to give directions that there should be laid before the House copies of all Correspondence relative to the transportation of Count Las Cases to Europe, &c.

Lord CASTLEREAGH considered the motion as calculated to throw great odium on Government, which they did not deserve. Count Las Cases had been detected in endeavouring to establish a correspondence between the prisoner in St. Helena and certain persons in Europe. He had not been delivered at all to the government at Ostend. He was conveyed in the common packet-boat there, and there was no communication in order that he might be detained when he was there landed. With regard to his papers, his own seal had been put upon them, and they had been sent after him: he had received them just as they were when he had put his seal on them. The Noble Lord concluded with expressing a hope, that under such circumstances they would not concur with the motion.

After some further conversation, the motion was negatived.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 15.

On the motion of Mr. HOWORTH, various Papers were ordered respecting the war now raging in India.

ROYAL MARRIAGE.

Lord CASTLEREAGH alluded to the late grant of 6000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Cambridge, and now proposed that a similar one should be made to the Duke of Kent, on his marriage with the Princess of Linen. His Lordship spoke of the advantage of an alliance with this family, the connection not being a new one. The Princess, he said, had stipulated for the guardianship of her children by a former marriage; but as she relinquished 4 or 5000*l.* a-year by this new connection, by granting her a dower of 6000*l.* the House would only replace what she had surrendered. His Lordship spoke of debts of the Duke of Kent, which had arisen from his not having any Parliamentary allowance till the age of 32, and he had met them in the manliest way, by giving up a large portion of his income. He concluded by moving, that 6000*l.* per annum be granted to the Duke of Kent, out of the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. CURWEN disapproved altogether of the grant. The Duke had sufficient: he had 25,000*l.* a-year, and if he were embarrassed, had not his Royal Mother the means of aiding him, out of her 50,000*l.* a-year privy purse money? He entertained, in common with others, a high opinion of the character of the Royal Duke; but we ought not to lay the debts of the Princes on the shoulders of the people.—(Hear, hear!)

Sir R. HERON had no objection to the dower to the Princess, but did not approve the grant to the Duke.

Mr. BROTHAM spoke of the public virtues and benevolence of the Duke of Kent, though he left those things out of consideration in giving his vote for the grant, which he did on public grounds, as the alliance was desirable, and pecuniary assistance was necessary. His Royal Highness had appropriated 17,000*l.* a-year out of his 25,000*l.* to liquidate his debts, and this deduction would continue some years.

Mr. METHUEN opposed the grant, and so did Lord ALTHORPE and Mr. PROTHEROE.

Mr. J. SMITH spoke in favour of it.

On a division, there were for the grant, 205.—Against it, 52.—Majority, 153.—The dower to the Princess was then voted.

ALIEN BILL.

On the second reading of this Bill, Mr. LAMBERT made some very powerful objections to it, in an energetic and manly speech. He characterised the measure as one in direct hostility to the principles of the British Constitution, and which tended to assimilate it with the despotic continental Governments. Formerly the Bill had been supported as a war measure; but now we were at peace with all the world; all revolutionary principles had been in a manner abandoned, and all Europe had subsided into tranquillity. The Noble Lord had allowed that—he himself had stated it. Social order had been established. In furtherance of that, the Noble Lord had assisted to plan and execute the partition of Poland; he had handed over States to other Governments, whose rule had always been the object of their detestation; and in his operations, he had even divided the objects of his exertions into souls and half souls. Nothing had been left undone; every act of spoliation had been carried into effect. By the Noble Lord's own showing, therefore, it would be found that every possibility of danger from foreign machination and interference was at an end. But he still persisted in this measure, by which it was manifest that the Bill could not be for the protection of the country, but for the assimilation to tyranny and continental despotism. If it was for such a purpose that the Bill was intended, then, indeed, it might be said that we had a Constitution for show, and not for use, which might well serve for a spectacle to admire, effectual, more energetic, and more decisive way to the more despotism. How could it be imagined that the ter of military this country could be overturned by the machinations of men? For the purpose of guarding against such enemies, were we to sacrifice our dearest rights, and our honour as Englishmen? He implored the House to consider before they granted such a power. He implored them not to grant it. The character of England, in all foreign countries, was deeply injured by this measure.

Mr. PROTHEROE supported the measure, as one not at all injurious to the Constitution.

Mr. LITTLETON opposed it, and stated the case of a M. Bafort, who sold the Eau Medicinale for the cure of the gout, and had been sent out of the country by Ministers, who ought to show, he said, that this medicine-vender was a conspirator against the peace and stability of England.—(A laugh.)—If such doings and such principles were to be sanctioned in England, we were subject to a mere simple despotism. Those who conducted our administration were gentlemen, he admitted, and honourable men; but they had never manifested any feeling of sympathy with the sufferings of their fellow-men under oppression and tyranny. They had aided and promoted despotism all over Europe.—(Hear, hear!)—They had never failed to support the powerful against the weak and injured.—(Hear.)

Mr. H. CLIVE said, that there was a number of persons in France who knew only war, and if they were allowed to settle in this country, their whole object would be to excite war. This country had surely a right to protect itself from such an evil.

Lord FOLKESTONE protested against this Bill, as one contrary to liberality and justice and sound policy; one by which the great bulwark of liberty, the trial by law, was superseded and made useless by this measure, and a door was opened to all the machinations of secret spies and informers.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. C. GRANT contended that the measure was not directed against foreigners generally, but against those turbulent spirits which still sought to torment the peace of Europe; those spirits which had at one time worshipped the Goddess of Reason, and at another the idol Bonaparte. Surely we might guard ourselves against the admission of such characters, without incurring the reproach of inhospitality.

Mr. F. Douglas expressed his sorrow at seeing that the result of the deliberations at Vienna had been to alter the policy of that Government which owed all its freedom to principles of a more liberal nature. Our ancestors had never expected that this country would be represented by a statesman, who would cause our sturdy Constitution to bend and truckle to a system framed with a view to the convenience of Foreign States.—(Hear, hear!)

Not a single word was uttered by the Ministers.—The House divided—For the second reading, 97—Against it, 35.—After some further business, an adjournment took place till Monday.

We are much obliged, and so will our readers feel, to two Correspondents, who severally inform us, that Mr. O'KEEFE is alive and living at Chichester. One of them adds a new and gratifying piece of intelligence, which is, that the venerable dramatist does not appear to be quite blind; as he has been seen walking alone. We ought to have put this information in our theatrical article, but it slipped us at the moment of writing. A very proper passage however in G. O.'s Letter shall be noticed in our next.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MAY 17.

News from the Continent is very barren this week. Nothing interesting has arrived from the French Chambers, nor did the Deputies meet on Monday, having finished their business for the present. The Report on the Budget was to be made on Friday. Even rumours of prisoners and seizures are almost silent, so that every thing from France sounds dull, illegitimate as well as legitimate. It seems like the hush of expectation, now that the Foreign Armies are supposed to be going away.

Some ministerial papers wish us to understand that the question with Spain, which the United States have cut short in so pithy a manner, is not likely to lead to any awkward results for the former power. It may be so; but if it be, thus much we can venture to predict, that it will be in consequence of some kind of succumbing on the part of Spain; and we will venture to add another prediction relative to any disputes that have arisen or may arise with our own Government relative to trade or any other matter,—which is this,—that with every wish and impatience to do the reverse, from old grudges and present anti-liberty consciousness, our Attornies will do their utmost to avoid a war. If the Spanish Court pretend to go to war, they know very well they will only hasten the emancipation of South America. If the British go to war, they know as well they will only hasten the renewed efforts of the lovers of liberty of Europe, besides giving chances to America for —, but perhaps they are not aware of the latter, and therefore, in greater love of freedom than of our beloved countryman the Cabinet, we shall not mention them.

From America we have a piece of intelligence of considerable importance. Some time since, a Bill was referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations, the object of which was to counteract the influence of the British navigation laws on the shipping interest of the United States, so far as affected the commercial intercourse of the United States with the colonies of Great Britain. A Bill on this subject has passed the Senate. The first section of this Act provides, that, from the 30th of next September, the ports of the United States shall be closed against every vessel, the property of a British subject, coming from any port in the dominions of Great Britain which is closed against the merchantmen of the United States.—The second section exacts bonds from British vessels outward-bound from American ports, and laden with American produce, that they shall not land their cargoes at any British port prohibited in the first section.—Thus the first clause prevents the export of English colonial produce in English vessels to America; and the second prohibits the supply of the English colonies with lumber, provisions, or other necessities from America, in ships belonging to Great Britain.—The Americans have of course a right to enforce against our colonies the same restraints which we have set the example of establishing in the commerce of our colonies with the States of North America. It becomes a mere consideration of interest who shall continue these repelling regulations longest, or who shall be the first to give in. Our colonists supply America with rum, sugar, and molasses, while she gives them in return many of the necessities of life.

Authentic intelligence has been received from Port-au-Prince, of the death of PÉTIÓN. It was supposed that he died of inanition, having obstinately refused all kinds of medicine and nourishment, and even water. His motives for this strange determination do not appear to have been accurately known.

AFFAIR OF FUALDES.—Under this head, the French papers have from time to time given an account of certain legal proceedings of the Assize Court at Albi, which have occupied greatly the public attention in France. It appears that about eight in the evening of the 13th March, 1817, M. FUALDES the elder, a respectable inhabitant of Rhodéz, was dragged into a house of ill-fame in that town, where he was made to sign several papers, and then murdered. He was stretched by force on a table, when his throat was cut, and his blood being caught in a basin, was given to a pig to drink. The body was afterwards thrown into the river. The persons concerned were tried at Rhodéz, but owing to some informality, a fresh trial took place at Albi, which terminated on the 1st inst.—The young FUALDES addressed the Court against his father's murderers.—The Jury deliberated for four hours and an half, during which time they came to an unanimous judgment—pronouncing Bastide, Jausson, Collet, the widow Bancel, and Bach, guilty of the murder with premeditation; Anne Bernot (the mistress of Collet), guilty as an accomplice, but without premeditation; Manson, guilty of aiding only in throwing the body into the river. The five first-named prisoners, therefore, were sentenced to suffer death—Anne Bernot to hard labour for life—Manson to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 50 francs. Madame Manson was fully acquitted, and is now restored to freedom. Bach, considering the importance of his confessions, was strenuously recommended to the clemency of the Crown.—The mysterious and singular conduct of Madame Manson, was the chief cause of the interest which this trial excited in France. It seems that she had visited the house, into which M. FUALDES was dragged, in male attire, and had hidden herself in a closet during the horrid event. She was however discovered, forced from her hiding-place by the murderers, and was about to have been sacrificed to their fears, but was saved at the intercession of two of them (supposed to be Jausson and Bach), on her taking an oath of secrecy. The oath it was, as it should seem, which made her assume an air of mystery, and at first deny that she knew any thing of the murder; but in order to exculpate herself from the charge of having aided in it, she at length spoke out, and was of course acquitted.

The widow of the late Prince of LIXEMBOURG, and sister of Prince LEOPOLD, will be 32 years of age in August next. She has a son and daughter by her deceased husband. The son is in his 14th year, the daughter in her 12th.

The secret as to the real author of Waverley, and the other Novels which have so justly attracted public notice is no longer kept. Mr. WALTER SCOTT has sold the copyright of four more volumes of Tales of my Landlord, and the produce of which he has purchased an edition of his own. The price of the book exactly pays for BANK FORGERIES.—The account of the number of persons prosecuted for forging, uttering, or having in their possession, forged notes of the Bank of England, as certified by their solicitor, from the 1st of January to the 10th of April last (little more than three months), amounts to the almost incredible number of 129!

A respectable tradesman of Windsor, having had a note of 5*l.* detained at the Bank of England as forged, determined on Monday last to put to the test the right of that Company to pronounce upon forgeries without explanation. He therefore demanded to see the clerk whose name the note in question purported to bear, and required from him an affidavit that the signature was not of his hand-writing. After some debate, that gentleman consented to the request; but eventually, on the interference of the Chief Cashier, was prevented acceding to so reasonable a proposition. The tradesman was therefore under the necessity of sitting down with the loss of his property, with no other satisfaction than the official assurance, under the hand of Mr. HASE, that the note was a forgery.—Windsor Express.

If the Bank Directors refuse to make Notes which cannot easily be forged, what is there to prevent our mounted men from establishing a Bank in the Metropolis, and by doing their duty, serve the public and themselves at the same time?

DISRUPTANCE AT WINCHESTER.—A serious disturbance, we are sorry to say, has taken place at the College School, near this city. The young Gentlemen, both scholars and commoners, (with the exception of a few College Prefects,) at half-past three on Thursday afternoon, armed themselves with sticks, stones, &c. got possession of the keys, and locked themselves within the College walls. The Warden, Fellows, and Masters, having refused to treat with them on any other terms than an unconditional return to their duty, they, at ten o'clock next morning, delivered up their sticks, opened the gates, and went to their respective quarters. The ringleaders, conscious of their demerits, and aware of the certain punishment which awaited them, had exacted a promise from their deluded school-fellows, that they all would share in their punishment whatever it might be. When, therefore, twelve ringleaders had been expelled, many of the others accompanied them into the town. The great majority, however, soon returned, though we understand that a few of the commoners proceeded to their respective homes. Of these latter the greatest part have been since brought back by their friends, and we are happy to say that order is now re-established.—Hampshire Chronicle, May 11.

A public meeting was held at Liverpool on the 12th inst., at which the Rev. WILLIAM GUNTER proposed Thomas LEECH, Esq. as a representative for that borough, in the event of a general election. The motion was seconded by Mr. ESTERLIN SMITH and carried with great applause. A requisition to that effect was immediately signed by upwards of 1000 persons.

DRURY-LANE.

Our old friend ELLISTON has appeared this week in the character of Vapid in the Dramatist, and of Belcour in the comedy of the West Indian; and has been received with his due applause. We are glad to find the visible effect his return has had upon this house, which wanted him certainly most thirstily. He is to Drury-Lane's comedy, what KEAN is to it's tragedy; his name in the play-bill is a sufficient voucher that you will not want entertainment. The actresses, above all, must be glad of his return; for in spite of their talents they were neutralized by the inefficient gentlemen they had to deal with; and very likely on this account, we never remember to have seen Mrs. DAVISON perform with more hearty spirit and good will than she did on Friday as Charlotte Rusport. Her looks, her laughter, her rallying shakes of the head, her sparkling turnings about, were all in her very best and youngest style, not excepting her fine figure, which is not the worse for a little more wisely fullness. When we saw her on the stage with ELLISTON, and heard his fine mellow voice, now deepening into a tremulous ardour, and now drawing itself up into one of his pithy pieces of dry humour, we were touched with a pleasure bordering on pain. We were again living at the period when the Honey Moon first came out, and the Duke Aranza and the tamed spirit of his happy wife were in all their glory; when there was a good self-tormenting Falkland in the Rivals, a good filial rogue in Captain Absolute, a good Archer, a good Henry Wildair, a good Ranger, an excellent Frederick in Matrimony, and an extraordinary triple fellow in Three and the Deuce, all of which, with twenty others, we trust we shall now have again.

But alas, saith the poet,—

Without black velvet breeches, what is man?

And alas, saith the critic,—with a whole suit of clothes half as large again as they used to be, what is youth? When we could not content ourselves with hearing Mr. ELLISTON, we saw the fullness of half a dozen additional years upon him. He has not been exempted, as LEWIS was, from this potent infirmity. He seems full half as fat again as he was; and we must add, whether from the same cause, or from his Circus and Olympic-Pavilion vagaries, he is more stiff in his graver scenes of gentility than he used to be,—does not seem to be so much at home, or in possession of his old spirit and readiness. His return, however, may perhaps renew him in this respect. He is still a delightful comedian, as of old; and if we lived in the country, and were not compelled by our office to go to theatres, we would at any time walk ten miles to see two of their favourite characters performed together by him and Miss DUNCAN,—no offence to Mrs. DAVISON either.

PHILARMONIC SOCIETY.

In making this society, as it ought to be, an object of critical attention, we should have put our remarks under some other head than a theatrical one, were not the convenience of doing so warranted in some measure by the necessity of criticising the opera under the same title. The opera sometimes has almost as little to do with the stage as a concert, at least to any real purpose; yet as we have been in the habit of criticising it in a theatrical as well as musical point of view, we must be excused for adding a subject entirely musical to these articles, if it be only to avoid having a separate head for musical criticism, in which the opera would be excluded, and which for our own sakes, as lovers rather than professed knowers of music, we would avoid. We might indeed take advantage of some less spectacular senses, in which the word theatre is used;—but what signifies all this preamble? We have warrants of many sorts for acting upon the principle that heads have little to do with bodies; and besides, we might have our way in such a matter, if for no other reason than because we were some how or other led to it; just as MONTAIGNE writes an essay On the Resemblance of Children to their Parents which is all about diseases and medicine, and gives us his opinion of the healthiness and modesty of scepticism under cover of a few words about Cripples.

The Philharmonic Society, though it has not yet met, we believe, with any particular criticism, in the newspapers, either from professors or admirers, is well known and appreciated in the musical world. It is an assembly of eminent professors, who resolved to do justice to masterly compositions by a masterly performance of them, and who execute their task to admiration. They meet in the Argyle Rooms at stated times on the first day of the week, and perform a concert of instrumental music, which subsequently, we believe, to the first conception of their plan, has been interspersed with vocal. But although this was a judicious innovation, and threw something of a more visibly social air over the entertainment, the great charm is the instrumental part of it. Those who in consequence of hearing bad, or indifferent, or careless performers, have sometimes been led to wonder what there can be in the mere playing of music,—those who have had their ears dinned with Vauxhall kettle-drums,—or furiously scraped and carbonadoed by theatre-orchestras,—or tiakled into an ungallant impatience by young ladies who halt, and hesitate, and cry One, Two!—t! t! and Dear me!—or tolled to death, as if by their own funeral bells, with the dreary repetitions facetiously called Glees,—or lastly jaded into a longing after their bolsters by maudlin concerts, in which ladies scream, and gentlemen mumble and growl, and the players are out and look at each other,—all these, and such-like sufferers from the enormities of unthinking fiddles, should go to the Philharmonic Society, and find out indeed the “concord of sweet sounds.” We were never at a real concert till last Monday. The simultaneous harmony, time, and other mechanical precision, with which the performers execute the most difficult movements, is the least part of the surprise. What most astonishes one, is the extraordinary sympathy with which they all feel together,—the ardour with which, at one and the same instant, they all swell out an enthusiastic note,—and the chastened recollection with which they recoil into gentleness, or sink gradually away through all the shades of diminished strength. It is like the expression of a face reflected and multiplied in a piece of cut glass. It is BRIAREUS playing with his hundred hands.

The entertainment of last Monday, at which Mr. WEICHSEL led, and Mr. NOVELLO was at the piano-forte, consisted of some vocal and instrumental pieces from MOZART and BEETHOVEN, a sextetto for the piano-forte and other instruments by Mr. RIES, a German professor now in London, an air by Mr. SOR, a Spanish professor of the guitar now in London also, a new overture by a living German composer of the name of ROMBERG, and a sacred duet from the works of that accomplished person, BENEDETTO MARCELLI, a Venetian Nobleman, who flourished at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and who was at once musician, poet, and philosopher. The opening of the concert with MOZART's symphony of E flat, perfectly electrified us. We never heard such playing before, nor can we pay it a more grateful compliment than by saying it was quite worthy of the exquisite beauty of the composition. The commencement of it, with those extraordinary runnings down that come in at intervals, was like —No mortal business, nor no sound

That the earth owns.

It seemed to the imagination as if some strange, kind, and visible intercourse was about to be opened between heaven and the world, and then as if angels one by one came stooping swiftly to the earth, each alighting with a firm foot, and proceeding to set about some mysterious and beautiful task. The pieces from BEETHOVEN seemed to resume this mystery, but with greater wildness and vehemence. Of the new overture by Mr. ROMBERG, we cannot speak highly. It reminded us too much of theatrical common-places, and seemed as if it should have been followed by the usual drawing up of a curtain,—scene a storm, with a chorus of fishermen or banditti. The sextetto by Mr. RIES, had some graceful passages, but was most remarkable for the consummate neatness and finish of his own playing at the piano-forte. He scattered the notes about like sprinkles of chrystal water. The new Air, composed by Mr. SOU who is known for the extraordinary perfection he contrives to fetch out of his national instrument the guitar, was very elegant, especially towards the beginning and the close. It is a characteristic mark of the nature and reputation of this Society, that it attracts to it the visits and compositions of the most eminent foreign professors, among whom last year was CHERUBINI. The Quartetto from MOZART for two violins, a tenor, and violoncello, went like the rest of the instrumental performances, with great sweetness and variety of emphasis; but we cannot say as much for the vocal part of the entertainment. The singers were Mrs. SALMON and Mr. BRAHAM, and both got into a very misplaced trick of singing out of tune. We think we heard it said in the room that the latter was unwell. Their repetition however of the duet, Qual anelante, from MARCELLO, was an amendment; and what a duet it is! It is the well known psalm,—As the hart panteth after the water-brooks,—and seems distilled drop by drop out of the composer's very core. Nothing can be more intense than the imploring tenderness of the first movement, and the passionate rapidity of remonstrance in the concluding one, while the repetition, at those gentle intervals, of the word Mai, breathes suddenly forth like so many little outcries. We never before heard any thing so truly devotional; and yet there is a vein of refinement and gentility running throughout, which seems to remind us of the accomplished man without hurting his religious attitude. It is in this respect like RAPHAEL's picture of the Sacrament at the altar, where the Pope is kneeling with his hands together in fervid devotion, yet preserving a certain air of elegant princeliness, not excepting in his hands themselves, the fingers of which are adorned with rings. But that passionate breathing on the word Mai, and the little upward pant in the word Anelante, have haunted us ever since.

AMEROGETTI'S CONCERT.

This active and spirited singer had a very successful concert at the house of Sir John and Lady Leicester, in Hill-street, Berkeley-square, where he was allowed to have the picture-gallery for the purpose, and was altogether treated with a liberal spirit, calculated to give foreigners a proper idea of the true English gentry. We are sorry to find that there is a party-cabal at the Opera-house, very unworthy of the talents of the performers; and the presence of Signor AMEROGETTI and Mons. BEGREZ at this concert, gave us a very pleasant idea of their tempers and dispositions, not excepting Mons. DEVILLE, who was present also. Signor CRIVELLI very likely deserves as much; but he was apologised for as being absent from sickness. The two French young ladies, DE LINT, who were among the singers, we shall notice another opportunity. We have only time to say at present that the singing of AMEROGETTI and his friends, a new and harmonious accompaniment on the walls in the pictures of the best British masters, a crowd of elegant people, some of them very beautiful women, and the consciousness that all this graceful enjoyment was taking place in the residence of liberal patrons, worthy to patronize the liberal, furnished altogether one of the completest gratifications that the true lovers of art could have had.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

No. 291. Una with the Satyrs. W. HILTON, A.—This is a sterling picture. It is not what new pictures in general are, a repetition of old ones, or a repetition of the Painter's manner, of his shapes, touches, colour, and effects; it is indeed a new work. It is Poetry spread before us, and rebounding in our breasts with pity, admiration, beauty, and nature, from the canvas. Whatever defect it may have, it makes its way to the inmost heart the moment it is seen, and prevents the judgment from hesitating till it has the cautious assent of criticism. Judgment indeed soon, if not at once, coalesces with the feelings; they stamp their combined decision on the heart, and leave a delightful and enduring impression. In looking at a picture, this general impression on hearts of genuine flesh is the best test of its merit; for it is not whether there is a want of certain good qualities, such as clearness of tint, accurate drawing, beauty, and facility of touch, &c. for in some one or more of these requisites nearly all, if not all pictures, are more or less deficient. It is sufficient to constitute a fine work, that admiration, feeling, thought, pleasure, are awakened. That is not the best work which best approves itself to the judgment in parts only, or in a display of excellence in some of the constituents of a picture, but whose aggregate power touches the soul with most intensity. We have seen very impressive pictures of STOTHARD, aye, of TITIAN, inferior in correctness of drawing, touch, &c. to many insipid works. But Mr. HILTON's dees abound in correct constituents of Art, though it may not give us all of them. Where, indeed, is the painting that does? It has some good, though not a refined touchiness of pencil. RAPHAEL's oils had not—but it has what is better still, and what his pre-eminently had, force and correctness of expression. It has also a briskness of colour, that, like the newly-awakened and vigorous hues of spring, rouses and charms our attention. There is a sprightliness of various colour, which adds to that cheerfulness so agreeably reflected on the spectator's mind, by the delighted and soothing looks and actions of the generous Fawns and Satyrs dancing, piping, wondering, and worshipping round Una, the scarcely assured and lone wanderer. In the trembling doubtfulness of her step, her crossed arms, her afflicted look, and sicklied skin—in fine, in this representation of

we have that pathetic interest excited which results from all its fine contrast to the surrounding gaiety of scene, to the admirably painted and graceful activity of the sylfuns, and from their earnest endeavours at conciliating her confidence. If to this painting of the impassioned soul, we add the Venetian-like, or, more properly, the Nature-like lustre of colour and of light, the clear sapphire of the sky, and the bright mountainous distance, harmonized to the eye by the blue-bell flowers and dresses—if we add the rich brown complexions of the Fawns, and the uniform vigour of thought and execution kept up in every part, we are sensible to the soul's core of the power of genius and of painting. The picture possesses our undivided attention. We no more wish to stray from it to others, till we have had a lengthened view of it, than the lover, who, among a number of common-place females, is looking at that one beloved among them, whose superior intelligence, sensibility, and beauty, have rivetted his attention, and fixed his happy destiny.

SIR J. F. LEICESTER'S GALLERY.

Painting, like Poetry, is the communication of what is reflected on the mind by visible things, and he of course is the best Painter or Poet whose imagination is not only most retentively susceptible of this reflexion, but who adds to this greatest qualification, this soul of genius, a less admirable but equally necessary acquaintance with and use of the outward and executive sign of his thoughts, which in Art is the science of Drawing, and in Poetry the science of Words. Susceptibility is altogether an original; execution more of an acquired power. The late Sir J. REYNOLDS had the first intensely, but was deficient in the latter. It was in a great measure the same with his pupil the late Academician HOPNER. His drawing was feeble, compared to his conception of the graces that are within and without the mind, that glow in the soul, and animate the body. He had more of genius than science, and was more than at the lamp of study. All his works shew this, and especially his Sleeping Nymph, in this Gallery. It is his masterpiece. It is, in our opinion, worth all his other performances put together, and were it a little more scientific in the Drawing, would be, and indeed is, one of those presents of Painting from the Circassia of Art, which is produced in one of the most genial moods. Though nearly uncovered, the impression of her beauty is chastened by her more soul-subduing look of perfect innocence, that no unhallowed emotion arises. Deep repose is seated on her calm countenance and amiably quiescent limbs. A delicate flush, like the glow that comes over the face of healthy slumbering infants, tinges her cheeks and lips; a clear mild blue is mixed among the carnation white of her Hygeian skin; her entire frame, lengthened, rounded, and modelled to the exact point, and no more, of youthful maturity and loveliness, makes every other idea of beauty and grace that may have occupied the mind, appear mean, and we look at her, in the heavenliness of her appearance, with an unmovable, charmed, and lengthened-out attention, with mingled esteem and affection. It is the triumph of shape, colour, sentiment, purity, all conjoined in a delicious power of represented excellence over the thoughts and the heart. It is the triumph of Painting.

CARTOON OF DELIVERING THE KEYS.

15. So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, feed my Lambs.

16. He saith unto him again the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, feed my Sheep.

17. He saith unto him the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved, because he said unto him the third time, lovest thou me? And he said unto him, Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, feed my Sheep.

At this simple command, such, as seen in this Cartoon, were the expressions, the characters, the actions, the grace, the composition, the beauty, the sentiments, and scenery, which instantly filled the conception of RAPHAEL. In the hands of a common painter, what could have been done with "feed my sheep?" But it is this power of conceiving from such simple suggestions, and what from the circumstances of the case must have happened, which ever marks the great capacity. Painters had ever better thus choose subjects from a suggesting line, than merely fill up, as they mostly do, the characters which Poets have previously pictured for them. Poets should only be called in as assistants: Painters should be ever jealous of doing nothing but realizing the conceptions of Poets: they should shew, by every subject they paint, that nature has given them the same fertility of imagination and powers of creation, the same power of exciting sympathies by the characters and the passions they display: they should ever take some simple few words of history, and by adding, inventing, and composing from nature, strike every heart by their truths, and delight every fancy by their beauties, or their Art will have no right to be considered as the Sister of Poetry. Could any one have believed, that without the graces of women any subject could have been made so interesting and delightful as RAPHAEL has made this? Few but RAPHAEL have ever done it; none but great geniuses can ever do it: and by none but by such men has it ever been done. What it wants in variety of character, as to sex and age, he has supplied by exhibiting the various ways in which different temperaments are affected by the same thing. What in picturesque beauty of dress, by infinite variations of the same dresses, affected by variety of action, which is the consequence of different sensation acting on the figure; and by harmony of colour, by landscape, and by arrangement, he has made it a subject very little less full of attraction perhaps than any other of the Cartoons.

Christ is the first figure which attracts one, standing in an unaffected and simple manner; not resting on one leg and throwing the other behind, like the eternal action of the common antique figures, but as all generally stand, when they are not standing to be seen, and only as their convenience or ease induces them: his expression has a mixture of melancholy and pathos, beautifully touching; it is the finest head of Christ in the room. He is pointing to a flock of sheep, indicative of the text, and to the keys in Peter's hand, as connecting him with the Catholic Church, St. Peter being the head of it. His white dress, and feet and hands, bearing marks of his sufferings, tell the time the event happened, and fill the mind of a Christian with associations of his persecutions and his virtues. St. Peter is on his knees, watching with eagerness the look of his divine Master, and listening with an intense and imploring attention to the utterance of his will. St. John behind presses forward, full of anxiety and love, his hands up, his cheek and head leaning a little, his nose, eye, and mouth, motion, action, and expression, denoting an affection as lovely and as genial, as the soul of the divine Father who conceived and painted him. Though RAPHAEL'S St. John is built on the St. Johns of all those who went before him, yet he added something which they left out, and which would ever have rendered all representations of him incomplete without this addition. He seems to say here,—"Don't think I have less love for thee than another: believe me as intensely devoted, oh divine Master, as the Apostle to whom thou hast committed this charge." Another Apostle, by his side seems to lift his hands in rather envious astonishment; the one behind is also pressing towards Christ with affection; the next turns round to his companion with simple wonder and inquiry, and, without speaking, looks with a scrutinizing vigour, first perhaps to ascertain what the other thinks by his air, before he ventures an opinion; while the other, with graceful simplicity, is holding his robe, and expressing also surprise, but mingled with pleasure. The one immediately behind this last is too far off to comprehend or hear exactly what is passing, and, with his head half dropped, he seems, in a breathless and inquisitive mixture of half eye and half ear, to make out as well as he can what is happening in front: he is so placed, that he could see Jesus between the head of the others, but is scarcely near enough to hear him: of the remaining three, the hair of one only is seen, and the faces of the two others denote also no particular emotion. This beautifully exhibits the interest dying off, as it were, the further it is from the cause of excitement.

By studying carefully the figure of Christ, as a composition, immense knowledge may be gained to all: it is a fine example of management; so as to prevent a single figure coming flatly and meagrely on its back-ground. On the left side, see how rich and full it is, by the great variety of shapes, produced by the folds of the drapery; then comes the part of a sheep feeding, and then a stump, and some weeds, while a creek, running in from the lake, crosses the left hand at the thumb joint: and again, the other line of this creek goes from the inside of the elbow to the drapery:—all these produce a variety of quantities, as to shape and figure, and break the meagre line of a naked arm, and take off the perpendicular and angular endings of contour, which the drapery of Christ on this side would otherwise make. On the other side, the right hand issues from a mass of broad drapery, and the flock of sheep, by their heads and bodies, break the uniformity of shape which there would be, if it had nothing behind it but a flat surface. This is what is called supporting a figure, preventing it rising abruptly out of the back-ground, as if there was nothing between the figure and distant objects. It can be done by light and shadow, or by line; it was this Sir JOSHUA so admirably understood, because he studied the great compositions of RAPHAEL, and took up Portrait, as BURKE said, “as if he had descended from a higher department.” REYNOLDS’ Portraits are all historical pictures in composition: all his smaller parts are made to support and carry off his larger quantities. RUBENS’ Portraits are equally excellent. TITIAN’S look often too much like single figures, inlaid on a dark flat wall, however exquisite their character; and RAPHAEL’S have often too much the air of being the Portraits of an Historical Painter. REYNOLDS appears to have hit the exact point, neither too much of the one or of the other: and as compositions only, are certainly more delightful than the compositions of any other Portraits in the world.

People are too much inclined to underrate composition. It is a question whether it be not the most important, after expression and character. What use are expression and character, to ever so great a pitch, without the lucidus ordo? especially too in an Art, where associations are all excited by having the soul affected through the eye.—Young Painters are too apt to think nakedness of figure more important than quantity or mass; but a few historical pictures will soon convince them, that though perfection of form is one of the first requisites, (and the knowledge of the figure the ground work of all excellence), when the naked figure is essential to the story told, the whole is of infinitely more importance in painting, where a variety of figures, objects, expressions, and characters, are to be arranged to develop a story, and is never to be sacrificed to display form: what parts of nakedness are shown must of course be perfect; but many an arm and a leg must be sacrificed to the quiet or repose of the mind. The first object in composition is to please the eye: composition is the means of conveying the story to the mind; all individual objects must be sacrificed to this. If a mass be wanted for harmony, for breadth, for repose, or to fill the eye, as it were, and prevent want of quantity, a mass must be had: the naked form, if ever so exquisite, must yield to that want, if the naked form be not broad, flat, or ponderous enough for the situation; other materials must then be selected, and as drapery is the most pliable of all materials, drapery by RAPHAEL was usually chosen. This was RAPHAEL’S great principle, and sound it is in every part. The eye must be carried on from one quantity of objects to another; then there must be vacancies to give value to each mass; and then no quantity must be of the same size; but one must predominate; so must one light, one shade, one figure, and one colour. There must be a captain or leader, and the inferior officers in each of these, &c. RAPHAEL’S great excellence being expression, and the head, wherein expression lies, being little as to mass, he could always put heads into any parts, and supply their deficiencies as to breadth, by masses of other materials beneath them; therefore he was never obliged to sacrifice that, in which his chief excellence lay, for the sake of composition; while those who put their reputation on beauty of figure will often find themselves condemned to cover up; for the sake of harmony of effect, many a beautiful body and many a beautiful limb, individually considered, but which are often not of size enough in the masses to be kept; and thus they are obliged to sacrifice what they were perhaps most qualified to represent.

The same bit of road which crosses behind Christ’s right shoulder, passes out behind his left, and cuts, at gentle angles, the hand of the astonished Apostle next St. John. On that road there are two small figures, the want of which would be felt, as they connect this hand and the shoulder of Christ, and prevent there being too great a distance between them. Every hand and head and line, throughout the Cartoon, is placed on this principle. Lines and inclinations of figures must also be repeated like colours, especially the predominant line or colour of the principal figure. Thus St. Peter and St. John, by their inclination, repeat that of Christ’s drapery, &c. &c. Then the bit of a creek, which so beautifully, by its bank, crosses and connects the line of the left hand of Christ to the face of St. Peter, comes out again at the back of the last figure of all; and then a bit of drapery, cutting the even line of the last back, prevents the back coming perpendicularly against the boat: this is repeated in inclination by the line of the boat, which carries the composition out of the picture. The boat, too, shews that they have been just fishing, and have just landed. Every bit of weed, line of ground, town, house, tree, or drapery, is introduced for these purposes, and yet so contrived as to have the appearance of being the natural consequences of natural causes, independently of art or arrangement. The greatest Painters, the greatest Poets, and the greatest Musicians, have been the greatest composers. However brilliant their imagination, however intense their capacity, however mellifluous their language, or harmonious their colour, it was their power of arranging their ideas which rendered them useful or effectual to the world. Every sentiment, character, or beauty, was so marshalled, as to have the best effect, according to the effect wanted, to elicit a story, or to produce harmony; and “order from disorder sprung.”

“Simplicity,” says REYNOLDS, “when so very inartificial as to avoid the difficulties of the Art, is a very suspicious virtue.”

Composition requires as much thinking as any part of the Art.

“The mental disease of the present generation is impatience of study, contempt of the great Masters of ancient wisdom, and a disposition to rely wholly on unassisted genius and natural sagacity. The wits of these days have discovered a way to fame, which the dull caution of our laborious ancestors durst never attempt.”

“Fame cannot spread wide, or endure long, that is not rooted in Nature and manured by Art.”—Rambler.

The Exhibition of the Cartoons has struck a blow and elicited a spark, which will never die; and if there be any who don’t admire them, let them be a little diffident of their own judgment, and not doubt the judgment of all the greatest Artists since they were painted. Perhaps if all their beauties were proved to such men, it might appear extraordinary that every body had not the power to see and execute beauties, the chief excellence of which was their truth. They might say, as some one said at the Elgin Marbles, who, when he asked what was their great excellence, and was answered, “their being so like life,” replied, with great contempt, “Why, what of that?”—It might appear no great effort to him, in the professors of an Art whose object is an imitation of nature, to make their imitations like the which they professed to imitate; but so many are the road that branch from the main one, so much do men sophisticate in favour of their own propensities, so inconsistent is practice with principle, that, in 4000 years, few indeed have been those who could make their imitations like the life, with which they have been eternally surrounded.

The plans of the Noble Directors are now consistent, persevering, and firm; their efforts have been, are, and will be, a mighty lever in public taste. Contrast the feeling for Art before the Gallery was founded, and now! This Exhibition will do endless good, if the young Artist select some picture suited to his own taste, study it every morning, and then return home to paint from nature: he will thus feel the beauties of great works a great deal more, when he sees them at the time he is making similar attempts himself: he will recognise attempts in them at imitating what perhaps he has been attempting the same day; the sympathy will be delightful: he will daily drink their excellence, and be roused to extraordinary effort to rival and, if possible, exceed them. Possible it is, because they are buthy mortals; and great and beautiful as their effects are, how feeble by the beauty of life!

What a wonderful creation is the world! how beautiful in ornament! how intensely deep in principle! how simple in arrangement! how singularly delightful, that the elements of our physical being, should thus afford materials for the exercise of our intellectual faculties!

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Thursday, May 14.

THE KING v. ARTHUR THISTLEWOOD.

The defendant was indicted for sending a challenge to Lord Sidmouth, one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State. The plea was Not Guilty.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL addressed the Jury, stating, that his Lordship had brought the defendant before the Court on public as well as private grounds, but that he had no resentment to gratify by so doing.—[The letter was then read, which was manifestly a challenge to fight. It has already appeared in this paper.]

Lord Sidmouth proved the receipt of the letter, &c.

A conversation then ensued between Mr. Thistlewood and Mr. Justice BAYLEY—the former saying that he had been deprived of all means of defence, not having had time allowed him to serve a single subpoena, so that he could not call a single witness.—To this the JUDGE answered, that on a future occasion, if he could make it appear that he had been deprived of his proper means of defence, what was passing would not be to his detriment; but the trial must then go on.—Mr. Thistlewood repeated, that justice had not been done, and that he was brought there like a victim, not like a defendant.

The trial was then proceeded in, and the Jury found a verdict of "Guilty of sending a challenge with intent to provoke Lord Sidmouth to fight a duel."—Sentence was not pronounced.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

LADY PERROT v. FARNWORTH.

This was an action which, from the nature of the defence set up, excited considerable interest.

Mr. CLARKE stated the circumstances. The plaintiff, Lady Perrot, was the widow of a Baronet of very small fortune, and was under the necessity to bring this action against the husband of one of her daughters, for expenses to which she had been put for the maintenance of that daughter. When the defendant married his wife, which was some time back, he was a general merchant, supporting a respectable establishment; he had since become a bankrupt. Subsequent to this misfortune, he had again got into business, and was now carrying on the trade of a wine-merchant, in Elbow-lane. For reasons which it was impossible satisfactorily to explain, he had refused to maintain his wife, who was in consequence obliged to resort to her mother for a living; and for expenses incurred in this way, the mother now sought, as she was entitled to do, compensation from the hands of the Jury. He apprehended 2l. 2s. a week would not be considered too extravagant a sum for a wine-merchant to pay for the board and other accommodations of his wife.

Sir Edward P. Perrot, Bart. deposed that he was the son of Lady Perrot. Mrs. Farnworth was his sister: he was present at her marriage about twelve years ago. At that time Mrs. Farnworth was living in Tavistock-place. Witness was present at Lady Perrot's lodgings in 1816, at an interview which took place between the defendant and his wife and Lady Perrot. Witness had learnt that, for some time previously, Mrs. Farnworth had been living with her mother. A question was put to the defendant in witness's presence, whether he intended to maintain his wife? He answered, that it was then out of his power; but he expected shortly to be in some sort of business, and was looking after a house. He added, that then his wife should have one-half of whatever he got. The conversation ended by his saying, that he was determined never to live with his wife any more. It was impossible to live with her; but he would share with her what he received.

Mr. DAUNCEY, for the defendant, after some ungenerous reflections on Lady Perrot and her daughter as actresses, stated, that Mr. Farnworth had married Miss Perrot 12 years ago, and had hoped of course for a different result to that which had been described. He had hoped to have lived in unity and affection with his wife. He had been disappointed. The evidence which had been given apprized them that a separation had taken place so far back as 1809; and now, in 1818, they were trying an action brought by the mother against the husband for the maintenance which she had afforded her daughter. There was no doubt that, if Lady Perrot had, with the view of saving her daughter from going to the parish, received her into her house, and given her support, she was entitled to recover the expense to which she had been put; but if it should appear that the wife supported herself, no matter by what means, then the claim was at an end, as the husband was entitled to the fruits of his wife's labour. The defence, however, was not founded upon this latter suggestion. He had already admitted the liability of a husband, under certain circumstances, to pay for the maintenance of his wife; but he had now to put another proposition, which was equally well founded in law, and equally upheld by cases; it was this—that if a wife permitted other men to take those liberties with her to which a husband was alone entitled, and thus forfeited her duty as well to her husband as to herself and to her God, then the husband was no longer bound to pay any expenses which she might incur; and that too, even although the husband had committed adultery himself previously, and that the crime of the wife had not been committed till after she had been turned from the house of her husband. He would call witnesses, whose testimony would leave no doubt of the fact which he had stated—a fact which did not come to the knowledge of the defendant until recently.

Ann Winter deposed, that she was engaged as wet-nurse to Mrs. Farnworth's child, in 1806. Mrs. Farnworth at that time lived in Tavistock-place.

Mr. CLARKE.—This was so far back as 1806?

Mr. DAUNCEY.—The distance of time makes no difference.

Mr. CLARKE submitted, that the husband having separated from his wife without making any charge of the sort alluded to by Mr. Dauncey, could not now bring such a charge in bar of this action.

Mr. Baron RICHARDS said, he should like to know upon what authority Mr. Clarke's argument was founded?

Mr. CLARKE said, he did not recollect any immediate authority bearing upon the case.

Mr. DAUNCEY cited two cases in which Judge Buller had laid it down, that adultery in the wife, at any time, relieved the husband from all responsibility for her support.

Mr. Baron RICHARDS decided that the evidence was admissible.

The witness then went on. She recollected an officer in the army used to visit her mistress very frequently, about six months before she left. She saw them once in a very particular situation. She was a married woman herself, and had no doubt of what occurred. The gentleman used to come as a sweetheart to Miss Farnworth, the defendant's sister. She took letters after this, and previous to the separation of Mrs. Farnworth from her husband, from Mrs. Farnworth to other gentlemen. Mr. Farnworth usually went out in the morning at eleven, and returned at five to dinner. He sometimes went out afterwards to spend the afternoon. During his absence, several gentlemen used to call. She recollected one evening going to Mrs. Farnworth's bed-room, and finding it locked. She had previously been waiting at supper, and took in some ducks. She had seen Mrs. Farnworth a short time before in the parlour with a gentleman. The gentleman followed Mrs. Farnworth when she left the room. Witness afterwards went into the bed-room, and found the bed tumbled. At this time Lady Perrot and Mr. Du Tertre were in the parlour. Recollected Mrs. Farnworth taking her to a Mrs. Simmons's, in Marchmont-street. Witness waited in the front parlour with the infant, while her mistress went into a back parlour to speak to a gentleman there. It was the same gentleman who had supped on the ducks. Witness was afterwards desired to carry the child into the back parlour, and saw a bed there much tumbled.—She could not say whether it had been previously made or not.—Cross-examined.—She was a married woman, and respected her character; and yet did not, after what she had witnessed feel shocked, or go away. She had no quarrel with her mistress. She first told Mr. Farnworth all she knew about five months ago. She met him and asked about the child; he seemed very much distressed, and said his wife had left him. Witness pitied him, that he should be deceived by such a woman, and told him what she knew. On being questioned on the same subject again, she said she met Mr. Farnworth, and that he asked her if she could tell him any thing respecting the conduct of his wife; and that she then told him all she knew. She lastly said, that before she told him she went home and asked her husband, and that she sent for Mr. Farnworth to her house, and then told him. She considered Mrs. Farnworth as common as dirt in the streets.

Frances Merrit deposed, that she lived with Mrs. Farnworth in 1808 and 1809, and frequently saw gentlemen take improper liberties with her. The gentlemen came after her master went out in the morning. When any gentleman was there, her mistress always desired that she might be denied to any person who might call.—In cross-examination, she said she was a married woman. She did not quit her service when she saw her mistress's conduct. She told her master what she had seen, as did the cook, who knew more. It was a Mr. Spurren whom she saw with her mistress.

Thomas Thompson, a footman, who lived with Mr. Farnworth in Nov. 1808, saw Mr. Spurren sitting by his mistress on the sofa in an improper attitude. He had told his master what he had seen.

Mrs. Sarah Creese deposed, that Mrs. Farnworth came to live at her house after her separation from her husband, in June, 1812. During the time she was with her, she was visited by several gentlemen. Mrs. Farnworth had but one bed in her apartments. A gentleman slept in her apartments for several nights; she could not tell in which room. There was a sofa in the front room; the bed was in the back room. She met the gentleman on the stairs one morning, and remonstrated with him on sleeping in Mrs. Farnworth's apartments; he was very abusive, and was going to strike her son. She could not tell how many gentlemen were in the habit of visiting Mrs. Farnworth, but she thought four or five.—In cross-examination she said, that, notwithstanding her suspicions of Mrs. Farnworth's misconduct, she did not give her warning. Her neighbours opposite said her house was a nuisance. Mrs. Farnworth's sister was sometimes with her. She did not sleep with her, but went to her mother's to sleep.

Mr. CLARKE now called witnesses to rebut the evidence for the defendant.

Mr. Du Tertre remembered supping with Mrs. Farnworth at the time described by Anne Winter. Lady Perrot was present, with a Mrs. Ware, and a gentleman from the Bank. He was quite satisfied if such an incident had happened as had been described by the witness, he must have recollected it. No such incident did happen, nor did he ever see any thing in the conduct of Mrs. Farnworth in the slightest degree incorrect.

Miss Augusta Matilda Perrot was then called to contradict Mrs. Creese. She deposed that she almost invariably slept with her sister every night, and that the gentleman who had been described as having slept in their apartments was a distant cousin, a son of Colonel Montague. He slept on the sofa, which had frequently been used as a bed for her brother and mother.—In cross-examination, she admitted that she went by the assumed name of Fitzhenry, and was an actress.

Mr. CLARKE said he could not tell what impression the evidence which they had heard had made upon the Jury; but, for his own part, he looked upon the whole as a foul and abominable conspiracy, in order to prevent the plaintiff from recovering those damages to which she was justly entitled. He particularly adverted to the contradiction as well as the improbable statements of Ann Winter. With regard to the testimony of the other servants, he appealed to the common sense of his auditors, whether they thought, that if Mr. Farnworth had himself believed their story, he could have allowed his wife 300*l.* per annum upon their separation; and would afterwards, instead of accusing her of infidelity, have declared his intention to share with her equally whatever property he obtained. Was this probable? With regard to Mrs. Creese, what credit could be attached to her evidence? If Mrs. Farnworth was the worthless character she would insinuate, would she not have taken the earliest means of removing her from her premises? No such effort had been made; and as to the gentleman sleeping there, that had been fully explained by Miss Perrot, who was a young woman of unimpeachable character. To this was added the contradiction given by Mr. Du Tertre to Ann Winter, who, unfortunately for her own dark purpose, had mixed up such circumstances with her story as enabled that respectable Catholic Clergyman to give her the most unequivocal denial. Why, he would ask, was not Miss Farnworth called? Upon the whole he trusted the Jury would see through the real merits of the case, and defeat a conspiracy which, in point of moral guilt, was beyond parallel.

Mr. Baron RICHARDS felt it his duty to recapitulate the whole of the evidence to the Jury. It was a serious question, involving consequences of great importance to the parties; and if the defendant's witnesses were not believed, his conduct was of the most malignant description.

The Jury, after a short consideration, found a verdict for the plaintiff, of two guineas per week for 52 weeks.

Bath husband and wife were in Court: the latter is a pretty petite figure. Lady Perrot was also present.

OLD BAILEY.

On Thursday, the whole of the trials having been gone through, sentence of death was passed upon the following 16 prisoners:—

Thomas Mitchell, James Pearson, John Freak, Charles Smith, Thomas Norris, Christopher Fernandi, Thomas Spencer, James Clarke, Eliza Bason, William Holland, George Smith, Thomas Buttery, Timothy McNameara, William Bailey, Robert Spencer, and Charles Gogery. The five latter prisoners, it will be recollected, have had their cases considered upon certain points of law by the twelve Judges, and the question has been decided against them.—Five were sentenced to transportation for life, and many others for fourteen and seven years. The whole number upon whom sentence was passed was 125.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

John Rippon and George Yardley were sentenced to be imprisoned each six months, W. Chisholme three, and W. Howell one month in the New Prison, for most outrageous conduct at the head of a numerous mob, in driving a bullock into the warehouse of Racine and Co., in Spitalfields, in which considerable damage was done, and all the windows broken. The poor animal soon after dropped down dead of fatigue.

POLICE.

HATTON-GARDEN.

Lake, a chimney-sweeper, in John-street, Tottenham-court-road, was summoned to answer a complaint against him for letting-out his apprentice-boy on hire.—Wm. Bluman, the boy, had been seen in a very exhausted state on Wednesday morning, in company with a person to whom he had lent the child to obtain soot at 2s. a sack, which could afterwards be sold by Lake for 6s. The Magistrates inspected the knees and ankles of the boy, and found them to be in a most shocking state.—Mr. Skinner, surgeon, said he considered them as very highly inflamed, but with proper poulticing, and rest, the limbs might be restored; he did not think the boy could be 10 years of age.—The poor boy, who could hardly support himself during the examination, was evidently intimidated by his master into a statement of unqualified good usage, though he admitted that the preceding day he had been employed from four o'clock in the morning in sweeping 24 flues, with little if any clothing to cover him, and no brass plate on his cap, to avoid detection.—Mr. Tooke, who attended on behalf of the Society, requested leave to inquire into the age of the child, with a view to cancel the indenture, should he have been under eight at the date of it. Mr. Sellon delivered up the boy to Mr. Tooke, who took him to the workhouse of St. Andrew, Holborn, and saw him safe in the care of the matron, who would wash and poultice the wounds; and Mr. Skinner promised to visit him and report thereon to the Magistrate.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

About one o'clock on Monday afternoon, the inhabitants of King-street, Drury-lane, were alarmed at hearing the cries of murder issuing from a woman in the garret of the house No. 14, in that street. Many persons were passing at the time, and a great crowd assembled, who in a short time saw a man force himself in spite of the woman, out of the garret window; he had neither coat, hat, nor shoes on; he stood on the parapet, then in a frantic manner he ran along the parapet; after running the length of seven houses, his foot slipped, and he was in the sight of several persons precipitated to the ground the height of four stories: falling on the pavement he was literally dashed to pieces; he was immediately taken up and carried home a lifeless corpse. His name was Anderson, a coach-face weaver: he was about 45 years of age, with a wife but no children. He was subject to sudden fits of derangement, particularly when he got in liquor. He made it a rule never to work on a Monday, as he usually went out on that morning and got drunk, and on his return home to go to bed: this was the case with the unfortunate man on Monday; but after going to bed, he started up in a fit of derangement, and no person being in the room but his wife, he forced himself out of the window, and met with his death as above described.

On Monday night, about eight o'clock, the upper part of Drury-lane, which is in St. Giles's parish, was a scene of the greatest confusion, which was caused by a general fight. A great crowd witnessed the outrage, and there were at least an hundred who were concerned in the breach of the peace. The fight commenced first by a few individuals of the lowest class of the Irish, who were drunk, and turned out to fight. Many heads were broken.

An inquisition was taken on Tuesday, at the Three Crowns, Dowgate-hill, on the body of Mr. George Clifton, clerk in the house of Messrs. Lewis, Mortimer, and Co. 10, Bush-lane, Cannon-street, who put a period to his existence on Monday morning about seven o'clock, in the counting-house of his employers. The Jury, who consisted of 20 persons, consulted a long time, and not being able to agree in their verdict, the Coroner took their presentments severally.—The Foreman and six others returned a verdict of Felo de se; and thirteen returned a verdict of Insanity. The majority signed the inquisition, and their verdict was recorded.

On Friday a boy of eleven years of age hanged himself at his father's house in Compton-street, Clerkenwell. The boy's father is a calico-glazier, and works for Mr. Marriot. On going to his work in the morning he usually set the boy a task, threatening to chastise him if he did not perform it; and on his coming home to dinner, he found the deceased suspended from the frame at which he worked, quite dead: it is supposed that fear drove him to commit the act, he not having his work done.

A poor female lunatic, who attempted a few days ago to carry off the seals from the Court of Chancery, was very troublesome at the Queen's palace on Tuesday. Her passion is to steal keys wherever she gains admission. She has in her possession no fewer than 146 of these stolen keys.—She has been committed to Tothillfields.

ATTACK ON THE WORCESTER MAIL.—On Sunday morning, between one and two o'clock, as the London and Worcester mail was ascending Stokenchurch-hill, two men came out of the wood, and threw large stones at the guard and coachman, some of which hit them on the head, and one passed through the window; they then got upon that part of the coach on which the guard sits, and demanded the bags; the guard immediately snapped his pistols at them; but they both flashed in the pan; the fellows, however, quitted the coach, and as they were moving off, the guard discharged his blunderbuss at them. When the coach arrived at Oxford, the passengers signed a paper testifying to the proper conduct of the guard on the occasion.

A dreadful circumstance took place at Weare, near Cross, on Wednesday evening. A farmer having for some time paid his addresses to a woman who kept a public-house, and the latter not encouraging his suit, he called on the above evening, and meeting with the unfortunate woman, discharged a pistol at her, a ball from which entered her head near the left eye, and she instantly expired. The villain is in custody.—Bristol Mirror.

THE assertion usually made in behalf of the flogging system is that it prepares boys for the world, or (as the phrase with instinctive ingenuity is translated) renders them manly. Now let us anatomize the word a little, and see in what real manliness consists. To be manly is to possess the finished properties of a man. It is to have strength of body and of mind, and to use it nobly. It is to have strength of mind, when that of the body fails; or if both fail, it is to prove it's natural inclination by generosity, humanity, charitable opinion, and other virtues which flow out of a protecting spirit. It is to defend, rather than to offend; for the weakest creatures can do the latter, but it belongs to the strongest to do the former. If it offend, it does it on a principle of defence, and for a great and social good; and those whom it most offends are the most powerful to do hurt, at least of all those who are inclined to do it. It is to oppose the wrong use of power in others, from a very sense of the right kind of power in itself. It is of a fine aspiration, pressing upward not downward; and it presses upward not upon those that are underneath, but off from them, taking them where it can along with it. It resists tyranny, it bears while it endeavours to alter adversity, it makes allowances for infirmity, it more than tolerates difference, it will bear even iniquity, it abhors cruelty, it sees through obloquy and austerity, it affords sincerity, it stands in defence of amity, it beguiles not innocence, it meets cordiality, it wraps its arm round femininity, it is—humanity.

Now how is this noble virtue cultivated by the system in question? Take the lesser boys in their submission to the caprices and cruelty of the elder. Is this submission to an adversity that ought to be borne? And are means taken to alter it, while it is borne? No; it is mere submission to tyranny,—that is to say, to an unjust oppression willfully inflicted by others. Again, take the elder boys, who have gone through this oppression. Is their propensity to inflict pain, manliness? Is it not, of itself, a proof, wanting no other proof whatsoever of the reverse? Are we so stupid as to suppose for an instant that an unhappy, mischievous urchin, who has been provoked into resentment against or contempt for every thing but power, makes a less boy warm his bed for him in winter out of a love for his future welfare? Do we imagine that he uses him as a screen for his fire, in order to render him cool-headed? Or makes him swallow disgusting compounds and bear shocking inhumanities, in order to cultivate his abstract taste and benevolence? Or do we fancy, that he does all this for the purpose even of disgusting the boy with his master,—whatever disgust may ensue? Or in short, do we suppose that he does it all in order to insinuate sympathy by the dangerous means of antipathy! and with meditative kicks on the shin, and philanthropic pokes in the short ribs, only commits a pensive mistake in philosophy!

That a boy here and there is roused to a better sense of his nature, may be granted, especially in schools where the system is neither carried to excess nor countenanced by the masters, and where the mistaken young despot himself is likely to find out his mistake, or to have the means of the discovery left in his nature. That a boy of excellent disposition may be fairly enraged into it at worse schools, may be granted also; but it will be at some expense perhaps even to his nature; and ninety-nine times out of a hundred, it may fairly be asserted that no such result takes place, or the schools and “the world” itself would not be as they are. The boys merely learn to enjoy themselves in their turn at the expense of others. They all fear the power that trampled upon them, and only wanted to be feared themselves. They only want to taste this position and premature excitement for which their predecessors were taught to barter their social kindness. They sometimes affect indeed to be manly; and among the latter examples which are set them by the mobs in the street, is the indignation manifested at a fighter who strikes his antagonist when he is down. But how do they apply this to any purpose of justice or self-knowledge? A flogger is always striking a boy when down. It is the principle of his system; and this system is to make the cowering sufferer manly! Yes; just as much as it made his tyrant so.

If the boys under a flogging system could be taught to make light of their own pain without committing their feeling for others or their zeal for diminishing the pains of mankind, they would only be fitting themselves for that godlike task. But in the first place, they do not make light of pain, either first or last: in the second place, they do commit their feeling for others: and in the third, they are far from turning out philanthropists. They are sullen or slavish under the pain inflicted upon them, when fags; they are quite as impatient of pain, when masters, which is half the secret of their tyranny; and they are so very averse from pain, when out in the world, that the only pains they take, generally speaking, is for their own exquisite selves, and to forward their glory or riches through every species of received violence, prejudice, and time-serving.

And here lies the whole secret. A flourishing man of the world, with a few glasses of wine more than ordinary in his head, will sometimes own it to you. The instinctive, if not the professed object of this sort of discipline, is to fit men for what is called “the world;” that is to say, not for the world as it ought to be, or as it has been, or as it might be; nor for the world largely so called, for a love of the beauties of nature and the claims and proper powers of humanity; but for a small crowd of men who in consequence of the spirit of money-getting and the facilities it gives to corruption have the luck at present to be at the head of their country. Such men have not less ruled it ever since the trading and manufacturing system grew like a disease over the agricultural, and wasted away our internal strength and cheerfulness; and the alternate slavery and tyranny of this nonsensical boy-bullying tends at once to flatter, to secure, and to perpetuate the race.

A regularly bred man of this school was most probably connected in his childhood with those who had come out of it themselves. He enters it therefore with a notion that he is going to be a little man at once, whose business it is to serve greater little men, and to pretend to himself that he is superior to all other mannikins that are not regularly, cuffed, kicked, over-ridden, trampled upon, and made screens and warming-pans of. He soon gets over the novelty of this first importance, and finds it rather fatiguing; in a little while he begins to think his treatment tyrannical, then disgusting, then extremely irritating, and then humiliating (if he is not one of those whom wiser teachers or the experience of some kindlier adversity has taught better), he thinks it vain to resist, becomes a confirmed slave, secretly beginning to hate or think ill and angrily of all others, and treasures up a quantity of cunning and malignity to vent it when it shall come to his turn. His turn comes; and every blow that has sunk into his body and soul, every contempt that has been forced upon him of his species, every painful want of excitement that has been given him in lieu of healthier and kindly pleasures, he pays off, as it were, upon his successors in slavery. His mind is spoilt, and his look with it. His eye is cunning, or malignant, or vacantly callous; his brow sullen or impudent, or both; his demeanour full of a ridiculous affectation of manliness; his folly, not his wisdom, premature. He gets out in the world; and "the child is father to the man." He is no longer afraid of the blows of his superiors, because blows are not given; but all that he can fear, in the shape of prejudice and worldliness, he does; instead of cringing with terror, he cringes now with smiling; instead of carrying his master on his back, and eating cakes steeped in a gutter, he helps him through the dirt of politics, canvasses and votes at his bidding, or at best makes a servile bargain of what talent he may possess, screens every powerful delinquent, persecutes every powerless adversary, makes a private, perhaps a public, jest of enthusiasm, tramples in all that he can upon the community, is flourishing, scornful, hateful, shallow, and unhappy.

(We must have one more paper on this subject, in which we shall give instances of public men who have and have not been brought up in this system.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

Sir,—As a parent, I beg leave to offer my best thanks for your remarks on the subject of fagging, which you have placed in its true light, as tending to corrupt both sufferers and actors,—introducing much individual misery into some of the fairest hours of existence, and admirably suited to generate and organise tyranny in after life, by habits, first of abject submission to caprice, and then of uncontrolled power over the weak and unresisting. The mind of man is curiously inventive in cruelty, and a long list of tortures might be produced in addition to the few you have mentioned. In the Advertiser, a periodical work in four volumes, of which the truth has never been disproved, though many have an interest in contradicting it, you will find some useful information on this subject.

If fagging were admissible, it could only be so were it exactly reversed, and the older and stronger boys obliged to assist the younger, as is practised in the bosom of a kind hearted, well regulated family; but that a little child should, in addition to his first leaving home, and all the pains of being initiated into school discipline, suffer those of finding a whole host of unbridled tyrants let loose upon him, is a distressing thought, not merely to fond mothers, but to every man of common humanity; and I never could discover what was gained by his acting as a foot-man, at best, but more frequently as a slave; repaid either by kicks, or, in some rare instances, by the permission of making himself sick, at his boy-master's expense, at the cake-shop, where this young satrap "keeps a bill."

It is true this arrangement, by throwing that degree of personal service boys growing to manhood may require, on the hands of their juniors, saves some expense to those with whom they are lodged. This is, to speak plainly, the head and front of what is gained by it. Parents will judge whether it is a sufficient exchequer for its continuance.

Nothing is more trite than that power should never be placed, without absolute necessity, in any hands, old or young: but it ought to be repeated, until it becomes an axiom as generally received and understood, as that two and two make four. I wish you, Sir, all possible success against the head of this hydra; and I invite those who have suffered from the fagging system to detail its abuses, which I believe would astonish some of those delicate Ladies, who, while they sip their tea, vote it to be "an excellent plan," and declare that "nothing teaches boys the world so well."—I have the honour to be, Sir,

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MAY 14.—In the night between Tuesday and Wednesday, his Serene Highness the Prince of Condé had reposed for two hours, but at three o'clock in the morning of yesterday the fever returned, and he died at a quarter before eight o'clock. At eleven o'clock the body was exposed in state, in one of the halls of his palace. The Curé of Sainte-Valère, and two Vicars, read during the day the office for the dead, in presence of M. Hubert, the Prince's Almoner. The body of his Serene Highness will be embalmed, put into a leaden coffin, &c. and exposed in the saloon of the palace, till the funeral honours due to his rank as a Prince of the Blood Royal shall be paid him.

MAY 16.—Some founders and chasers have lately been arrested at Lyons, accused of making copper busts of the Usurper.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, May 19.

Petitions from Bolton-le-Moors, Stockport, and Manchester, signed by many thousand persons of all classes, were presented in favour of the Cotton Manufacturers Regulation Bill.

CUSTODY OF HIS MAJESTY'S PERSON.

The LORD CHANCELLOR begged leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act relative to the custody of his Majesty's person during the regency. Their Lordships were aware that a Council was by that Act appointed to assist her Majesty in the exercise of the important trust vested in her. It was found, however, that a due attention to the state of her Majesty's health did not permit her constant attendance at the place where his Majesty resides. As her Majesty must therefore be occasionally absent, it had been thought right that an addition should be made to the number of her Majesty's Council. There was another reason for this; many of the persons who formed that Council had official duties to perform, which sometimes rendered their attendance impossible, and on that account alone it would be advisable to grant her Majesty some additional assistance. The Bill proposed, that the Members to be added should be nominated by her Majesty; what the number should be would be a subject of future consideration. There was another provision in the Act to which he had referred, which it was considered expedient to alter. Their Lordships would recollect, that, according to that Act, if her Majesty ceases to have the custody of the King's person during a prorogation, it is provided that Parliament shall meet forthwith; but if Parliament should at that time be dissolved, it is provided that the same Parliament shall be re-assembled. He did not know how this clause, which seemed very inconsistent, should have found its way into the Bill. If the case were to happen that the Queen should cease to have the custody of the King's person, after a dissolution, the old Parliament, which had no longer any functions to execute, might be made to supersede the new. This was totally unnecessary, as the new Parliament, as the law now stands, can be called within 14 days. It was therefore an object of the present Bill, if the event to which he had alluded should occur during a dissolution, to give the new Parliament an opportunity of meeting forthwith.—He should propose that the Bill be now read a first time.

Earl GREY made a few observations. He said, the Act alluded to very likely wanted alteration; and when he considered the unfortunate state of the King's mind, and the lamentable circumstances of the country, when every man was suffering more or less distress in consequence of the heavy burden of taxation, it became their Lordships to look carefully to every means by which the public expenditure might be diminished, and one of these means might be found in a reduction of the Establishment at Windsor. Were that Establishment calculated in any way to contribute to the comfort of his Majesty, there was not a man in the country who would not regret any proposal for altering it; but that was not the case, and it was their duty to see that no unnecessary burdens were continued on the people.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL made a few remarks, but did not at all notice the allusion to a reduction of the Windsor Establishment.

The Bill was read a first time.

BAIL IN CASES OF LIBEL, &c.

Lord ERSKINE introduced a Bill for declaring the law with respect to the power of justices of the peace to apprehend and hold to bail, or commit for libel, before any bill of indictment was found. The preamble of the Bill stated, that whereas doubts on the law had arisen, and the Bill went on to declare that the magistrates had no such power.—He moved that it be now read a first time, and should move the second reading on this day se'nnight.

The Lord CHANCELLOR wished it not to be understood that he entertained any doubt whatever on the subject of the law.

The Bill was read a first time.

The House then went into a Committee on the Cotton Factories Bill, when it was agreed that further evidence should be heard in a Committee above stairs.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, May 20.

CHURCHES BUILDING BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on this Bill, and various clauses were discussed.

Lord GRENVILLE expressed a doubt whether the words of the clause, limiting the powers of the Commissioners to the building of Churches, so as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the largest number of persons, were sufficiently explanatory of the intentions of its framers.

Lords LIVERPOOL and HARROWBY, the Archbishop of CANTERBURY and the Bishop of LANDAFF, were of opinion that the Churches should be erected with that decent decoration becoming the Established Church, and that the clause was distinct enough on that subject.—The clause was agreed to.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 21.

On the 2d reading of the Spanish Treaty Bill, Lord HOLLAND said, he was surprised to find that so large a sum as four hundred thousand pounds had been given to Spain, merely for her promise to abolish the Slave Trade in two years, particularly after the heavy sacrifices already made by this country in her favour.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 22.

CUSTODY OF THE KING'S PERSON.

A conversation of some length took place on the 2d reading of this Bill, which was opposed by Earl GREY, on the ground, principally, that by it the trust now vested in the Council would be committed to persons of whom the House knew nothing. He moved the previous question.—The Earl of LIVERPOOL, in reply, said that the present measure had her Majesty's sanction.—Earl GREY's motion was negatived.

The Bank Restriction Bill, after a short conversation, was read a second time.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 18.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Lord ARCHBISHOP HAMILTON presented a Petition from Thomas Ferguson, now in Newgate through incurring the displeasure of Parliament. With respect to his own views in bringing forward this business, he had been actuated by no sort of hostility towards Mr. Thomas Ferguson, individually. His object had been the peace and interest of Lanarkshire.—The Petition was read. It stated the Petitioner's deep contrition at having given such offence to the House, and prayed, that after what he had already undergone, the House would be pleased to order his discharge from imprisonment.—Ordered to lie on the table.

GAME LAWS BILL.

On the motion for the 2d reading of this Bill, it was opposed by Mr. CORWEN and Sir S. ROSSLY; but it was carried by 116 to 21.

POOR EDUCATION BILL.

Mr. BROUGHAM, in moving the order of the day for going into a Committee on this Bill, noticed the mass of information which had been supplied to the Committee on the subject, and the discoveries that had been consequently made. The Committee, he said, had been much occupied with the returns that had been made; but still there were some very suspicious omissions in certain quarters, which the parties alluded to would do well to rectify. If not, if they did not disclose the facts known to them upon this subject—whether good nature, or negligence, or unwillingness to get into quarrels, or, what approached very nearly to corruption, base servility to a patron, induced them to withhold returns, they might be assured that the abuses he alluded to would not escape detection; for the Committee were already in possession of evidence of those abuses, and the consequence would be that the eyes of the Committee, instead of being fixed exclusively on the abuses themselves, would be directed to the reverend persons who concealed them. He should mention one or two gross instances of abuse which had been discovered. In Hertfordshire, a salary of 14*l.* was provided for several scholars in Cambridge. No scholars were sent. In Essex, in 1584, 200 acres had been appropriated for education; no school was kept. In Devon, 170*l.* were appropriated. Only two or three scholars were taught, while, according to Lancaster's or Bell's system, 150 scholars might be taught.—(Hear, hear!)—In Lancashire, from 200*l.* to 300*l.* were in trust for a school. A school had formerly been established: there was now none. In Devonshire, lands worth 1,000*l.* a-year were let by the worshipful corporation for 4*l.* a-year.—(Hear.)—The heirs of a noble person, who were trustees, had given the lands to the steward, the steward had let them to an inferior agent, the agent to the gamekeeper. Scholars ought to have been sent to Cambridge from this institution. None had been sent for 100 years. In Lancashire, there were charity lands, for 70 years back, with 100*l.* a-year, for which 20*l.* per annum were paid.—(Hear, hear!)—In Nottinghamshire, very ample funds were stated by the reverend reporter to have been "sold or alienated in a shameful way." An attorney had fully stated the fact, which was more like alienation than any thing else. The subject had been let at a peppercorn rent for 999 years. In Worcester, the principal master had 100*l.*, the other master 90*l.* 300*l.* a-year were applicable to education. The number taught ought to be nearer 4,000 than 300. There was not one scholar.—(Hear.)—There were many more cases, but he would not weary the House with them. They were only repetitions of the same gross abuses. There was another kind of abuse which he even dreaded to mention. Leases worth 1,000*l.* a-year were let for a term of years as long as the funds in Nottingham, for 3*l.* or 4*l.* a-year. They were so misapplied by agents or tools who got into trust for the very purpose. But not many days would elapse when the House would have a special report upon the subject. He must again say, that he was most anxious that the Bill should not be crippled by any further restrictions. If any restrictions were attached to it elsewhere, let others have the glory of them; that House would, in tenderness to the objects of their interposition, and in regard to the Commissioners, intrust them with the same inquisitorial powers which they themselves possessed. He had one more word to say as to the six Commissioners to be appointed. He implored of the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite to consider that all would depend on the personal characters of those appointed—(Hear.)—It had been first intended that they should be named by the House. It was next urged by reasons, which he certainly thought very strong, that Ministers should name them. He hoped, however, that there would be no jobbing in the selection. Some of the Commissioners were to have no salary. The appointment conferred no patronage. Of the persons whom he had heard suggested, he could say nothing but what was respectful. But as nothing was to be received by the appointment but labour, he begged leave to address himself to Ministers, and to express his own willingness to undertake the part of a Commissioner—(Hear.)—The Committee had taken the point into consideration, and thought it fair that he should offer himself, as having a title to be one of the commission; and if he had the good fortune to be named, he should most willingly take an active part, but only on the terms he had mentioned. If even Members of Parliament were excluded, although among those he had heard mentioned was one of the most respectable members of that House, yet he should not hope to have the refusal. He felt most deeply and from the bottom of his heart anxious for the success of this inquiry; and he was therefore willing, for the sake of the security which his personal exertions would give, to make a temporary retreat from other business. He felt this a very delicate subject; but he could not, in duty to the investigation he had originated, refrain from saying what he had said—(Much cheering.)—He again expressed his hope that the measure would find no interposition elsewhere. In that House there was none particularly connected with the abuses which were the objects of the commission; but he looked confidently for the special and strenuous support of the heads of the Christian Church. The Gospel was emphatically the Gospel of the poor. Surely the heads of our great establishment for teaching the Gospel could not fail to exert all their power in providing that the poor should not be robbed!—(Hear.)

The Bill went then through a Committee.

BANK-RESTRICTION BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the report be taken into further consideration.

Mr. F. LEWIS made various remarks, and concluded with moving an amendment to the preamble, stating, that the restriction was further continued for the purpose of enabling the Bank to resume their cash-payments at the earliest possible period.

Mr. CANNING said, that part of the Act which his Hon. Friend proposed to displace contained the grounds on which he consented to the measure. The alteration proposed went a great way to assume that there had been an incapacity in the Bank to resume, if the determination of Parliament had not been as it was. It was his opinion that the country would never be rightly herself till she returned to her sound and proper circulation. Circumstances had occurred that had prevented the resumption—circumstances which it was no shame to the sagacity of any man not to have perceived. It was said such might again take place; but in his mind it was impossible to think that circumstances equally unforeseen, equally unexpected, equally unanticipated, should again arise. Many circumstances had occurred certainly; but none without the French loan would have fairly justified the measure.

Mr. BANKES most sincerely wished that the House had acceded to a motion made some weeks ago to inquire into this matter (Hear, hear!); and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to an investigation early in the next session. If a Committee had been appointed, he should have asked the Right Hon. Gentleman on what grounds he conceived that the Bank would be enabled, at the end of one year, to resume its payments. Was this likely to be the last year during which the suspension would be continued? For his own part, he thought from time to time there would be either some foreseen or unforeseen cause to prevent the resumption of payment in specie. (Hear, hear!) It was a great point to come back to a sound state of currency, and the country had a right to demand it.

The House divided—For the motion, 88—Against it, 21—Majority, 67.

Mr. J. P. GRANT proposed that, instead of the 5th July, six weeks after the commencement of the next session should be inserted.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that a term of six weeks would be too short for considering so serious a question.

Mr. TIERNEY proposed the 25th of March for the resumption of cash-payments, or that a Committee should be appointed for that day. The 5th of July was the Chancellor's best friend. If there was any juggle between him and the Bank, he hoped he would have the candour of the Gentleman under the gallery, who held the payment of paper in specie an abominable heresy.

Mr. J. P. GRANT withdrew his motion, for the purpose of giving way to the 25th of March.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 27—Against it, 88—Majority, 61.

THE LOTTERY.

The House then went into a Committee of Ways and Means. On the resolution that £250,000 be raised for the service of the year by Lottery.

Mr. LYTTELTON spoke against the measure. It was objectionable on all grounds of morality, and he had hoped that it would have been withdrawn, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had lately changed his opinion on subjects of less importance. The most honourable distinction of a deliberative assembly was, that it acted on general principles, and not on the convenience of the moment. If it was urged that the revenue of £250,000 could not be spared, it might as well be said that a revenue might be raised from brothels and gambling-houses. He feared that the Chancellor might be influenced by the patronage of the system. There was one place of 7000 a-year, two of 5000, and three of 2000. Another evil arising from the system was the encouragement it gave to informers and prying people. It struck also at the root of all industry, and so injured more than it assisted the revenue. Perhaps those who were so earnest in building the new churches thought by so doing to atone for the mischief they thus created. But it was utterly inconsistent to be anxious about the education of the people and the improvement of morality on one side, if all that was done was defeated by the Lottery on the other.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER thought himself not called on to give additional reasons in favour of a measure in which he only followed all his predecessors. The Hon. Gentleman had advanced no new argument, and as there would always be a certain quantity of gambling, lotteries were not more mischievous than unauthorized play.

Sir M. W. RIPLEY remarked the gross inconsistency of setting up saving-banks for the purpose of alluring people to venture their earnings in a lottery.

Sir J. NEWPORT related an anecdote of the present High Sheriff of Dublin, who was a lottery-office-keeper, and had been lately convicted in the penalty of 50*l.* for illegal insurances; after a similar conviction for a similar offence last year; notwithstanding which, his licence had been renewed.—There were six other prosecutions against him.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that if an office-keeper in London had been guilty of such an offence, his licence would not have been renewed.

Sir J. NEWPORT replied, that the Hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Irish as well as of the English Exchequer. (Hear.)

Mr. WILPERFORCE, in answer to the argument that unauthorized gambling would exist if the Lottery did not, said that the latter was a national crime, encouraging immorality at large, and not exciting reprobation like a private vice. There was no ground of defending this, which would not go also to defend any other crime, and he hoped to see the end of a system so injurious and destructive of industry.

Mr. W. SMITH knew the difficulty of raising a revenue, but thought it could not justify every expedient. The Hon. Gentleman seemed to think that there was a certain portion of gambling that would always exist; if so, it might certainly as well contribute to the revenue. To erect saving-banks with one hand and lotteries with the other was a political solecism; it was urging the honest man to spend his little savings in mischievous and ruinous adventure; and it could not be denied that this was urged by every species of mountebankery, or mountebankism, if he might use the word.

Mr. LYTTELTON briefly replied, that he believed there was very little propensity to gambling in the genius of the people; but that the price of a sixteenth tempted people to purchase, and the very poorest would form societies for that purpose.

The House then divided on the question, when the numbers were—For the resolutions, 75—Against them, 33—Majority, 42. The resolutions for granting 6,000*l.* a-year to the Duke of Kent, and 6,000*l.* a-year of dower to the Princess of Saxe-Coburg, in case of her surviving his Royal Highness, were agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.—IRISH ESTIMATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply. When the resolution for granting 15,000*l.* towards the erection or support of fever-hospitals in Ireland was proposed, a conversation took place as to the propriety of increasing the grant, and on the extent of private exertions for removing or checking the contagion; Mr. PEEL stating, that this sum was one in addition to 43,000*l.* already voted for a similar object, and Sir J. NEWPORT condemning strongly the conduct of absentee proprietors, who made such grants necessary by withholding those charitable contributions to the support and relief of the diseased poor which it was their duty to advance.—The resolution was agreed to, as was that for 13,461*l.* for building churches and purchasing glebes in Ireland. A sum of 15,600*l.* was voted towards making a canal between Lake Allen and the river Shannon; 207,000*l.* for the Ordnance Estimates, and 141,000*l.* for the disembodied militia.

LORD-JUSTICE-GENERAL OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. BANKES moved that the order of the day for the House going into a Committee on the Lord-Justice-General of Scotland's Office Regulation Bill be discharged, and the Committee postponed to this day three months.

Mr. TIERNEY said he did not wish to get rid of it, if it was to be introduced next year, which he did not believe it would be, as the job was so abominable, that nobody could rise to defend it.—(Hear, hear!)

After a few words from Mr. HUSKISSON, Mr. TIERNEY, Sir J. NEWPORT, and Mr. J. P. GRANT, the motion was agreed to.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, May 19.

Lord RANCLIFFE presented two Petitions from Nottingham, signed by 20 persons each, praying for Parliamentary Reform.

A Petition was presented by Mr. P. MOORE, from the Proprietors of Drury-lane Theatre, stating that they were under certain incumbrances, and praying for leave for a Bill to enable them to give securities for demands upon them.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The Bank Restriction Bill, after a brief conversation, was read a third time and passed.

The Conviction of Offenders' Bill was read a third time and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Lord COCHRANE said he held in his hand several Petitions, which he was anxious to present previously to a motion which was to be made connected with the subject. The first Petition, from Paisley, prayed for radical reform as the only remedy for the country. This reform was more likely to be effected by the measures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than by any vote of the House.—Lord Cochrane next presented four Petitions from Manchester, three from Glasgow, four from Sheffield, three from Huddersfield, four from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, one from Poole-shaws, and from Oldham, all praying for Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.—They were laid upon the table.

REPEAL OF THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.

Sir ROBERT HERON said, although this precise question had not for a long time been before the House, yet the general question of Parliamentary Reform had been so ably discussed, that it would not be necessary for him to occupy much of their time. A very general impression had for a long period prevailed among the people of England, that a renovation of that House was necessary, in order to make it in fact what it was in theory, the Commons House of Parliament. (Hear.) When it had been observed that the House adhered very generally to the Minister, whatever measures he might please to propose, it became a very important object with the people to remove such an evil by reform, and this object had been supported by most respectable and able men. After the peace of 1783, there was a strenuous effort made; but the cause was soon forsaken by one of its ablest supporters, who afterwards became its bitterest enemy. Not long after a war arose, which threw the nations of Europe centuries back in the career of improvement and reform. The people had then, to use a favourite phrase of a Noble Lord's, "turned their backs on themselves." Rights were taken from them which they had never abused, under the pretence of plots, which, if they existed at all, had been greatly exaggerated. The machinery of plots was, indeed, still kept among the stores of the Treasury; but he trusted that the bottom of the green-bag would now be found so much damaged, that it would never produce an explosion again. On the several occasions on which Reform had been strongly urged, proof of its necessity was offered to be produced at the Bar, but the House had never shown any particular desire to throw the petitioners on their proof. When the Grenville Act had been introduced, it had been stated that the House was so corrupt that they were not to be trusted with the trial of their own elections. Oaths were accordingly prescribed in order to prevent corruption. The Grenville Act had done good; but the enormous expenses of Petitions almost amounted to a denial of justice. The most frequent objection to such a measure as he was to propose was, that the time was not proper. To him every time was proper; to the objectors no time was proper. In prosperous times Reform was unnecessary; in times of distress it was dangerous. The next objection was, that the reformers could not agree, and that they had views beyond a Reform. This objection was never applied to other measures. The imposers of taxes often disagreed; and yet taxes were imposed. But the want of agreement was at least proof of sincerity among the reformers. Annual Parliaments, Triennial Parliaments, Universal Suffrage, Ballot, any measure would be thought good enough by them if they only wanted a covered way for the purpose of attacking the fortress of the Constitution. A third objection was, that the Constitution was perfect, and required no Reform. A Constitution more perfect than ever issued from the constitution shops, from Plato down to the Abbé Sieyès, had arisen from accidents, and had worked itself into a fully poised and equally balanced system! But the most successful objection to every kind of Reform was the French Revolution—he meant the consequences of that Revolution. If gentlemen would only consider the causes of those events, which none regarded with more horror than he, they would find that they were quite applicable to any question of Reform in this country. The first cause was, the total unfitness of the French nation at that time for any thing like public liberty. The second was, that a weak and vacillating king inclined towards every thing benevolent, but kept his purpose in nothing. The third was, the unbounded extravagance of the French Court, which made it impossible for any minister to hold his place for any time. The last, but not the least cause was, the Duke of Orleans, who had been properly styled, Monter Kénille. But let them look to the character of the people of England, let them trace their history through all their former revolutions, and they would never find them inclined to anarchy. They were always afraid of going too far. They generally slept short too soon. The objection as to the danger of changes was not sincere. Nay, were there not in 1792, and most important changes, on their own side of the House?—(Hear, hear!)—The great struggle must come, and we would be to prevent all changes. There would then destroy the Constitution. That time should be gradually destroying whatever was not improving by means of reform, was the immutable decree of Heaven. The proposition he was to make for shortening the duration of Parliament, might be made without any of those dangers which were apprehended from any other reform, and would produce the most salutary effects. It was not necessary to go into the complicated question, whether Parliament had been originally annual or not. Annual they certainly appeared to have been, whether by special law or otherwise. It was not till six years after the Revolution that Parliaments were made triennial. It was well known how this salutary measure was lost in 1715. A civil war then broke forth. In this state, the government was afraid to trust the people with the election of members. The Septennial Act was then passed—an Act as extremely indiscreet as it was grossly unjust. It was not necessary to refer to legislative volumes and the doctrines of statesmen to show that the Act was not legal. It had been said that the previous Triennial Act had lengthened the duration of Parliament; certain it was that the Septennial Act lengthened it beyond any legislative precedent, and beyond every principle of justice. Before they was now prohibited. Why should not every member be obliged to take an oath that he would give no compensation, nor contemplate the giving of any compensation, for late or expected elections? A Bill could certainly be introduced by which expenses would be as much as possible prevented. Great apprehension was entertained of increasing the power of the people. But was it from popular principles that the only danger was apprehended? If they refused Reform, might not a powerful oligarchy obtain a more complete control over the country, and render it a more dangerous? He was not afraid of this; but a little was he afraid of the people becoming too powerful. While great offences were not even checked, and were openly avowed, it was obvious that some alteration should be introduced. It was only ignorance and inexperience, which did not practise corruption in the experienced Parliamentary mode, that called down their vengeance. But the greatest offence that had ever been committed in elections was the Septennial Act. It was another argument, therefore, for repealing it, that that House had robbed the people, and ought to restore what they had taken away. If there had been a temporary necessity for prolonging the duration of Parliament, the Act ought to have been temporary. A permanent act ought not to have been passed for a temporary object. But they had wanted to strengthen the power of the Crown, and they availed themselves of the people's alarm to accomplish what they probably could not have done otherwise. During the last two Sessions he had seen strong instances of the benefit to be expected from short Parliaments. It had often been his melancholy lot to be sent out into the lobby when the House divided.—(A laugh.)—There he had often seen, particularly during this Session, faces not known to him. He had been so astonished, that he sometimes feared he had committed some fatal mistake, and taken the side of the question he intended to oppose.—(Hear, hear, hear, and a laugh.)—He was convinced that every member in that House on all occasions voted most conscientiously: but it did, somehow or other, so happen, that gentlemen voted very differently from their usual practice when they approached to the period of elections!—(Hear.)—He thence inferred that the most beneficial effects would result from shortening the duration of Parliament. He again repeated that the House could have no right to prolong itself. He did not deny that they had the power, but they could not possibly have the right to exercise such a power. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the 2d Act of George I. chapter 38, commonly called the Septennial Act.—(Hear, hear, hear!)

After a considerable pause, strangers were ordered to withdraw, and the gallery was almost cleared, when

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY said, that the motion had his most cordial support. It was quite free from all those inconveniences supposed to be connected with a more extensive reform. It might do good, and there was no possibility of any danger from it. He would take notice of only one argument that had been often advanced against Triennial Parliaments, that an advantage would arise to the Crown from frequent contests against the people. If it was so, why should a Triennial Act be always opposed by the Ministers of the Crown? How different were the votes of Members in the last years of a parliament? In this present session let them recollect the aversion to the measure respecting country bank-notes, the refusal of increasing the burdens of the people, and the reduction of taxes, and they must see at once that the approach of a general election had great effect. (Hear.)

Mr. W. SMITH said, there was one reason which was alone sufficient to induce him to give his support to the motion, and that was the opportunity it afforded of marking his disapprobation of one of the most flagitious abuses of a public trust that ever had been committed. He alluded to that Act by which a House of Commons, elected for three years, had prolonged its own duration to seven.

Mr. BROUGHAM did not wish to prolong the discussion of a subject, which there seemed to be no disposition in the House to consider in that serious manner which its importance rendered desirable. In the few words which he should offer on this occasion, in order to declare his hearty approbation of the measure recommended by the Hon. Baronet, viz. a return to Triennial Parliaments, he should not, however, satisfy his own feelings, were he not to state his dissent from some of the opinions which had been expressed. He should not stop to inquire whether the mode in which the Septennial Act was passed might not be made matter of charge against its illustrious authors; but of the fact he could entertain no doubt, that by its means the Whig Administration which brought it forward had saved the country from popery and from despotism. (Hear, hear!) His Hon. Friend had thought proper to raise a question respecting the right of Parliament to prolong its own existence; but, on the same principle, he might deny its right to perform various other legislative acts, the authority of which had never been contested. If in holding these doctrines he was in the wrong, he was perfectly ready to be set right; but he begged to make his appeal, not to men wholly ignorant of the matter, but to those who had studied the Constitution in the works of those great masters who had understood it.

Not a word being uttered by Ministers or their adherents, and as they had shown much impatience to go to the vote, the House divided—For the motion, 42—Against it, 117—Majority, 75.

ALIEN BILL.

Lord CASTLEREACH moved that the Alien Bill be committed.

Mr. BENNET spoke strongly against the measure, and wished to learn on what information Ministers proceeded against foreigners under this Act, whether from foreign or domestic spies? He asked whether the final judgment depended on the Foreign or Home Secretary, for he could feel no sort of respect for the decision of the latter, as he believed him to be the greatest dupe in the country. Might not the dupe of Oliver, who had been described by the Noble Secretary, as "a much-injured individual," be equally betrayed by others? (Hear, hear!) Did Ministers expect to see foreigners haranguing in Spa-fields in broken English? Why should England follow the degrading example of despotic governments? He feared that at the Vienna Congress,—that Congress whose declared object was the restoration of freedom, but which had subverted all national independence,—a solemn covenant had been entered into, from which Ministers knew not how to depart, and upon which this unwise, tyrannical, and injurious measure was founded.

Mr. ELLISON thought that the services of the Noble Lord (Castlereach) entitled him to the gratitude of the country. The Bill would exclude the outcasts from other nations, and that was a sufficient reason for its enactment.

Mr. B. BATHURST was satisfied that the House would agree in the policy of continuing this Act, until the spirit of the French Revolution had evaporated—until this country could be rendered secure against the designs of a dangerous class of persons, who were continually plotting the overthrow of all governments, and the subversion of all order in society, and who thought it most convenient to repair to this country, violating its laws, and abusing its hospitality, until their plans were ready to be put into execution. Men of sound principles would have nothing to dread from the existence of these powers in the hands of Ministers.

Mr. LITTLETON contended that the measure was unworthy of the time in which we lived, and hostile to the spirit of liberty, more particularly to the liberties of this free country; it was one into which no inquiry had been instituted, and into which, in the present temper of this House, no inquiry was likely to be instituted.—(Hear, hear!)

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY said that he was not surprised at the course which Ministers had thought proper to adopt, they knew that their strength consisted, not in speaking, but in voting.—(Hear, hear, and a laugh.)—He hoped the House, however, would consider, that those who resisted this measure were speaking on the behalf of persons who had no representatives in that House.—(Hear, hear!)—It was manifest, that the executive government could act only on the suggestion of foreign powers, in preventing individuals from coming here; for whether they came from France, from the Netherlands, or from other places, how could they guard themselves against such persons, but by listening to the representations of foreign ministers? So that a person who was endeavouring to shelter himself here from religious or political persecution, from the terrors of the Holy Inquisition, the tyranny of the King of Sardinia, or the despotism of some other government that we had established on the ruins of independent states, must be deprived of an asylum, on the statements made to this Government by their own persecutors and enemies!—It was said, that such powers could not be abused, when entrusted to the hands of the Noble Lord (Sidmouth.) However he might respect the private character of the Noble Secretary, yet, when he reflected on the manner he had acted towards the unfortunate persons imprisoned under the Suspension Act, on his refusal to hear their petitions, and on his sheltering himself and colleagues under an Indemnity Act,—there was no man in whose hands he should be more unwilling to entrust the exercise of the powers of an Alien Bill. This measure was a fatal blow to the character of this country; and he could not but reflect, that when we should have lost all our liberties, we should not even have the compassion of any nation in the world, because it would be said, that a people who were so regardless of the liberties of others did not deserve to enjoy their own.—(Loud cheering.)

Mr. Serjeant COPELEY said he was not one of those venturesome politicians, who would agree to allow this country to become the seat of intrigue which might destroy other countries, and through the sides of other countries finally bring destruction on our own. Much had been said of connexion with other nations, but who was there that would say that this country was not dependent for security on the systems and arrangements of other countries?

Sir J. MACKINTOSH spoke against and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL in favour of the measure.

A division took place. For the motion, 99—Against it, 32—Majority, 67.—The House then went into a Committee on the Bill, when an amendment was proposed, that its duration should be one instead of two years.—This was opposed by Ministers, and rejected by a majority of 66.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, May 20.

FEVER HOSPITALS.

Mr. BENNET, in presenting the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the state of Fever Hospitals, remarked on the insufficiency of the present number of Hospitals, and the fatal consequences of mixing contagious fever patients with ordinary fever patients. There was but one establishment in the metropolis for fever patients alone. The wants of the population were so great, compared with the means of providing for them, that, at some of the principal hospitals, four out of five of the applicants were refused. The Committee recommended that 2000*l.* should be granted in addition to the 1000*l.* now allowed by Government to the Fever Hospital.—The Report was ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

Mr. BROUGHAM moved the third reading of this Bill. It was his intention, after the inquiry had been gone into, to ground further legislative proceedings on it, without waiting until the inquiry was concluded. At all events, he should bring forward such measures as might be necessary in aid of the law.

The Bill was read a third time and passed.

THOMAS FERGUSON.

On the motion of Lord A. HAMILTON, Thomas Ferguson was brought up, reprimanded by the Speaker, and ordered to be discharged on payment of the fees.

SCOTCH LAWS.

Sir JOHN NEWPORT called the attention of the House to the practice of the Courts of Scotland respecting laws which had fallen into disuse. It had been stated, that when a law had not been acted upon, it fell into desuetude, and was no longer binding. If that principle were applied to criminal laws, they would become a mere nullity. But the system he complained of went still further, as it placed some parts of an Act in a state of desuetude, and retained others. Whatever might be the absurdity of ancient Scottish statutes, it was fit that Parliament should pronounce upon them, and that the Courts should not erect themselves into legislatures. He therefore moved that the Courts of Session, of Justiciary, and of Exchequer, in Scotland, be directed to present to the House, within six weeks after the commencement of next Session, a statement of such laws, or parts of laws, as they considered in desuetude, and why.

Mr. B. BATHURST opposed the motion. He thought a particular Bill might be brought in, if necessary.

Mr. ABERCROMBY said it was a most important question, whether Courts should hold a practice by which they could silently subvert the laws of Parliament.

There was some further conversation; but the motion was negatived without a division.

TRANSACTIONS IN THE WEST INDIES.

Sir S. ROMILLY moved that certain papers, relating to transactions in the island of Nevis, should be referred to a Select Committee. The Hon. Gentleman entered into the detail of Mr. Huggins's infamous conduct, which he had before brought before the House.

Mr. GOULBURN objected to the motion, on the principle that the House should not interfere on ex-parte evidence with the judicial proceedings of competent tribunals.

Mr. WILBERFORCE said, that he would distinctly affirm that justice was not properly administered in the West Indies. The unfortunate slaves, it should be remembered, had no representatives in that House; it should therefore take greater interest in their welfare.

Mr. MARRYAT replied to the statements of Sir Samuel Romilly respecting Huggins, whose treatment of the slaves he did not think so cruel or so wanton.

Mr. BARRHAM thought much good would be done by the present motion. He wished the governments of the smaller colonies were made as good as those of the larger, where the condition of the slaves was better than that of the peasantry and labouring poor of this country!

The motion was agreed to nem. diss.

Mr. BROGDEN presented a Petition from the Company of Proprietors of Drury-lane Theatre, praying parliamentary aid. It was referred to a Committee.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 21.

CITY ACCOUNTS.

Sir W. CURTIS made some remarks on the subject of the Accounts ordered to be laid before the House, contending that it was strange to call for accounts of private funds; and finally moved to refer the City Petition to a Select Committee, who might hear Counsel and report thereon.

Mr. Serjeant ONSLOW observed, that this motion was the last resort of the City to obtain delay; but the House would not be so taken in. If a Committee were appointed, the Session would expire before anything could be done.—He moved the previous question.

A long conversation arose. It was at length determined, that the Bill which gave rise to the order for the production of the papers should not be pressed. The previous question was then withdrawn, and the order for the accounts rescinded.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Sir F. BURDETT said, he had to present Petitions from Middlesex, Lancashire, Northallerton, Darlington, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and several other places, in all 173, praying for a Reform of that House.—The Hon. Baronet then went forward to the table with an immense pile of Petitions.—They were ordered to lie upon the table.—Sir Francis then said, he took that opportunity of giving notice of a motion on the subject of Parliamentary Reform for Tuesday next.

SHOP WINDOWS, &c.

Lord LASCELLES stated, shortly, the hardships suffered in consequence of taxes imposed on Shop Windows. In many cases, too, children were charged, as if they had been servants in the house. These grievances deserved inquiry; and the only mode of inquiring was before a Committee. He therefore moved, that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the subject, although he was afraid that no relief could be given this Session.—A Select Committee was accordingly appointed.

Sir S. ROMILLY moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the relief of bona fide holders of negotiable securities, without notice that they were usurious transactions.—Leave was given. The Bill was afterwards brought in.

Mr. S. COOPER brought in a Bill to amend the laws regarding County Infirmarys in Ireland. It was read a first time and a second time.

LORD SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR.

Mr. BENNET called the attention of the House to certain proceedings under Lord Sidmouth's Circular. This celebrated Letter was written in February 1817. In the same month, J. B. Mellor and S. Pilling were arrested on the charge of selling libellous writings. The Magistrates held them to bail, in default of which, they were sent to the House of Correction, ironed like felons, and compelled to labour as felons! Mellor's house was most illegally searched, and several historical books were carried off by the Officers. A more illegal transaction never occurred. As to irreligious parodies, by whomsoever written, he held them in abhorrence; but to be treated as these men were for selling them, was equally unjust and illegal. They were associated with felons, and had felons' fare. They were removed in an open cart with others, handcuffed, taken 18 miles to trial, and then huddled together in one room in the jail. They were not brought to a trial; but were afterwards discharged on their recognizances.—Some of the statements might be overcharged, but it was clear that great severity had been used; and he need not waste the time of the House in proving, that imprisonment before conviction was not intended for any other purpose than safe custody. If any thing were superadded, if persons were put into irons, or subjected to any species of punishment, it was not only illegal, but disgraceful to the country in which we lived, a reproach to the age in which we were born.—Mr. Bennet then stated the case of Robert Swindells, of Macclesfield: by which it appeared, that in March 1817, about twelve o'clock at night, when Mr. Swindells and his wife, who was eight months gone with child, were in bed, they were disturbed by a knock at the door. Mr. Swindells looked out, and saw some persons, who desired him to open the door, or they would force it. Alarmed by this threat, he came down and opened the door, when they rushed in, and asked for persons who they supposed lodged in the house. A strict search was made, but no such persons were discovered. They then tore open all the trunks, took several papers out of them, and stripped Mr. Swindells of the little property that belonged to him. The terror of the wife was so great that she never recovered. On the 25th of April she was delivered of a child, and on the 28th she died. The child, deprived of the support of its mother, expired. Mr. Swindells himself, after suffering various hardships, was at last liberated, without having been brought to trial. Here, then, was another instance of the tender mercies of his Majesty's Government, another example of persons taken up without having committed any crime, and discharged without any opportunity of proving their innocence! Such cases of injustice could not fail to make a very powerful impression on the minds of the people. He thought it right to state, that the individual whose case he had just described was an old seaman; he had been eleven years in the service, during four of which he was on board the Ville de Paris, blockading the squadron at Brest. He would now put it to them, whether, supposing that the Petitioners had somewhat coloured their statements, these cases did not deserve the most serious attention? They were about to be sent back to their constituents; and would they return to them with the stigma on their characters, that when people were imprisoned by Magistrates, under the sanction of his Majesty's Government, the House shut its ears to their petitions, and refused to institute any inquiry?—Leaving them to answer this question by the vote which they would give to-night, he should now conclude with moving, "That a Select Committee be appointed to consider the petitions of J. B. Mellor and Pilling, of Warrington, and of R. Swindells, of Macclesfield, and to report their opinions thereupon to the House."

Messrs. DAVENPORT and BLACKBURN made some remarks, which were inaudible in the gallery. It was understood that they asserted the parties were not ill-used on these occasions.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL stated, that the law had been executed with the utmost lenity in the cases of Mellor and Pilling. The parties had been indicted, the bill found by the Grand Jury, and the proceedings then removed into the Court of King's Bench. Being in custody, he had a right, unless they found bail, to keep them in prison; but as the trial was postponed by his Act, he had them discharged on their own recognizances. Could the Officers of the Crown have acted with greater leniency? (Hear, hear!) Two statutes existed, by which Magistrates were authorized to commit to the House of Correction for misdemeanours. This was the law. Persons committed to the House of Correction, though not for trial, may be set to work, though not to severe work, and the half of their earnings given to them. These men were ordered to pick 2lbs. of cotton.—As for Swindells, he had repeatedly circulated these publications, and an Ex-Officio information had been filed against him. He was merely served with a subpoena. The day of appearance having gone by, an attachment was issued for his apprehension. Swindells applied to the Magistrates, who said they had nothing to do with it. In consequence of his remaining in jail, he (the Attorney-General) sent him a notice: he appeared, pleaded, and was discharged. On the night Swindell's house was entered, a great body of Blanketers had assembled at Manchester, and it was said that some had gone to his house. The Magistrates sent; and it was true, that some papers were taken; which he did not justify; but the House, considering all the circumstances, would not be disposed to blame them for what had been done. Mrs. Swindells had been ill before; she had never complained, and went to work the next day. Swindells lived as well as the debtors who were in prison. As therefore lenity, and not severity, had been shown, he should oppose the motion.

Sir S. ROMILLY contended that the motion was a most important one. These persons had been arrested, loaded with iron, and confined with felons for selling what was called a political libel,—proceedings which a few years ago would have been deemed impossible. They had been carried in irons even to the magistrate. The respectable Petition of the Bishops, in the case of Jones R., had been considered a libel. Such a construction might be put upon any thing that was obnoxious to those in power. There had been searchings for and seizures of papers. There had been a decision on that subject, declaring it to be utterly illegal. Would any man write as Algernon Sidney had done, if he was liable to have every country magistrate sending a constable to examine or carry off his papers? Was there any law that such men as the petitioners were to be sent to prison, and treated as they had been, without having been guilty of any crime? Was there any law that they should be punished before they had been tried? He did not know that the warrant declared that they should be kept to hard labour; but no one had denied that to be the fact, and they had been so treated.—He hoped the House would agree to so important a motion.

Mr. P. BARNES denied that any unnecessary severity had been used.

Mr. LOCKHART thought the Attorney-General had done nothing but his duty; but he should vote for the motion, that inquiry should be instituted into the practice of putting men into irons charged with misdemeanours—a practice not known to our ancestors, and altogether unnecessary, oppressive, and unconstitutional.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. BENNET shortly replied. He hoped the country would bear in mind, that one of the last Acts of the House of Commons was the refusal of inquiry into acts of oppression.

The House then divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 17—Against it, 73—Majority, 56.

NABOB OF OUDE.

Mr. MARSH, after detailing a number of circumstances relating to the debts of the Nabob of Oude, moved that the petitions of certain of his creditors (Messrs. Chase, Chinnery, and Co., Messrs. Abbott and Maitland) might be referred to a Select Committee.—Agreed to.

The Savings' Banks Bill was read a third time, and passed.—Adjourned.

Friday, May 22.

In a Committee of Supply, 15,000*l*s. were voted for the purchase of 300 acres on Hounslow Heath, for cavalry exercise.—This vote was opposed, but was carried by 65 to 23.—Various other sums were voted.

ALIEN BILL.

On the 3d reading of this Bill, another debate ensued.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, he took this last opportunity to express his disapprobation, not to say his abhorrence of it, as it was neither more nor less than a suspension of the Constitution.

Mr. CANNING contended that it was the duty of Parliament to prevent this country being overrun by the pests and refuse of Europe; and if the measure offered a slight violence to the Constitution, that was only a temporary sacrifice for a necessary purpose.

Sir F. BURDETT urged that the measure expressly violated Magna Charta. The real object of it, he said, was to aid that European conspiracy in which the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) had taken so active a part, and the effect of it would be to destroy that character for generosity by which the people of England had hitherto been distinguished. Another effect would be, to drive all the talent and industry of Europe to that now only free country in the world, America. The Right Hon. Gentleman had objected to what he called making the measure judicial, and for the plain reason that it established some control over Ministers. It would compel them to be less despotic, because they might be brought before another tribunal. The usual pretence of ministerial responsibility, by which the House had been so frequently juggled, was again urged, though the country could not quite so easily be deceived: that responsibility had been used and abused with regard to our own subjects, who had been tyrannically imprisoned, and was it to be expected, that it would be more respected when the defenceless subjects of other states were concerned? Responsibility in the first instance was usually converted into indemnity in the last, as was proved in the case of the Habeas Corpus suspension; in fact, Ministers were no more controlled by this stalking horse responsibility, than they had been by the natural feelings of humanity and the dictates of conscience.—(Hear.)

Sir S. ROMILLY again ably opposed the Bill.

Mr. BARHAM opposed the Bill, as totally unnecessary in time of peace.

Mr. W. SMITH opposed the Bill, as sapping the best principle of the Constitution, and affording no advantage whatever.

Sir J. NEWPORT contended, that, by the effect of this Bill, the blood of Waterloo was shed in vain, and that tyranny, by being permitted in one place, would spring up in another: he, therefore, hoped the measure would be treated with the abhorrence it merited.

Several amendments were proposed in the course of the proceedings, which were negatived. One of them, proposed by Mr. BROUGHAM, went to except women married to natural born subjects.—On the question that the Bill do pass, there appeared—Ayes, 94—Noes, 23—Majority, 65.

The Game Purchase Bill was then read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MAY 24.

The public ear is naturally open to catch the smallest sound of news from the continent, now that the departure of the Allied troops is determined upon; but all is still silent at present, like the sensation described in the couplet for which DRYDEN was so rallied by the wits:—

"A horrid stillness first invades the ear,
"And in that silence we the tempest fear."

The session of the Chambers was closed by proclamation yesterday week. The funeral of the Prince de CONDE was to take place on Tuesday last. He was the representative of the most respectable branch of the House of BOURBON, which will most probably terminate in the present Prince, the late Duke DE BOURBON, whose son the Duke d'ENGHIEN was put to death by BONAPARTE for conspiring against his government. BONAPARTE violated a neutral territory in order to get the young Duke into his power;—for which he was justly reprobated by the voice of Europe; and among other voices, those of the "legitimists" were of course the loudest. It is a pity that they have since imitated the bad part of his actions without the good, and violated territories almost all over Europe. Colonel MASSENBACH was seized but the other day in a neutral city by that alternately succumbing and domineering person the King of PRUSSIA,—a true fag of fortune; and under pretence of keeping out the bad sort of Aliens, the governments of allied countries have leagued together to persecute and order higher and thither any one who is not favourably regarded by their respective precious faces. It only shews what they think necessary to their existence; and we may safely say of them as the wag did of a bad arguer in company;—"Let them go on;—they will get more and more absurd every minute." The late member of the House of BOURBON, the Prince de CONDE, was, we believe, a very respectable man,—not only not a glutton, or a drunkard, or a heartless profligate, but amiable and manly. He was the only Prince of his family that maintained in its adversity its old reputation for courage and military conduct. He loved the sex with a proper and kindly gallantry, and was fond also of polite letters. His Highness left a Memoir of the Great CONDE, the friend of MOLIERE, which is well spoken of.

An article from Frankfort says, that "while Count LAS CASAS was at St. Helena, he composed a work and sent it to Europe, the title of which is 'A regular Journal of all that NAPOLEON said and did at St. Helena, day by day, for the space of three months,—his conversations, public and private, &c.' This work," adds the article, "which will be uncommonly interesting on account of its authenticity, has not yet been able to be published, because the manuscript was detained by the English. It belongs to history, which has a right to claim it."—By the English is of course meant the English Government, consisting partly of a descendant of Dutch money-getters,—of an Irishman whom nobody would suppose to be Irish, not even from his blunders (which he makes from poverty of ideas),—and of an Englishman (we believe) who takes upon him to ridicule people of no birth as well as no health, though no one knows where his family came from. This is the person also who called BONAPARTE Mr. BONAPARTE. Now history may claim the manuscript in question from such persons; but how are they to be expected to give it up! They cannot afford it. What! Mr. VANSITTART, who sits doggedly blowing the bubble of our finance, patronize the publication of what a man of genius did! My Lord CASTLEREAGH, the publication of what he said! And Mr. CANNING, any thing that might at all gratify a prisoner with swelling legs and a palpitation at his heart! Bless your soul, M. LAS CASAS, you seem to have the simplicity of your namesake of old in South America!

It is the prevailing belief that the business of the Session will be terminated by the end of the first week in June, so as to allow of a prorogation by the 6th or 8th of June—and a dissolution, it is supposed, may then take place about the 10th, or before the 15th. Such is the general impression.—Courier.

Bulletins have been published by General BOLIVAR of his victories over the Spanish General MORILLO, in the course of last February. The fighting was severe. MORILLO's army continued its retreat, first on Barbacoa, and next on Camatagua; and BOLIVAR's bulletin is dated from Head-quarters at Sombbrero, the 17th of February, the day following that on which the battle was fought. The Spaniards being still in possession of the coast, the patriot accounts are somewhat tardy in crossing the Atlantic. But the narratives to which we now allude very positively state, that the Independent army was advancing to besiege the capital of Venezuela.

Mr. MEADE, the American Consul, who was imprisoned two years at Cadiz, upon some pecuniary transactions between him and a British merchant, in which the Spanish Government was also interested, has at length been released by a royal order issued by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

It has been stated in letters from St. Helena, that BONAPARTE has lately received, by some unknown means, 400,000 francs in gold, and a large quantity of diamonds. Money does not seem to be wanting either to him or to any of his adherents. LAS CASES, it is asserted, very recently drew bills for 3,000*l.* by the way of Frankfort on a banker in London, and they were duly honoured. It is even said, that a draft for 10,000*l.*, signed NAPOLEON, was lately presented to and paid by a London house.

"M. de SARTINES," says Madame de STAEL, "was an example of the kind of choice made in Monarchies, where the Freedom of the Press and the Representative Assembly do not compel the appointment of men of talent. By some intrigue he got nominated Minister of Marine. M. NECKER called upon him some days after. He had caused his chamber to be hung with geographical charts, and said to M. NECKER: 'Observe what progress I have already made! I can put my hand on this chart, and shutting my eyes, I will point out to you the position of the four quarters of the world.'"

We are happy to state, that notwithstanding the defalcation of the sugar, in the Custom duties, amounting to 257,753*l.*, there has been an increase of the Customs in the quarter since the 5th of April, of 58,038*l.* In the Excise, the increase in the quarter since the 5th of April has been 350,274*l.*; making a total increase of 408,312*l.*—Courier.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—It appears from the accounts just presented to the House of Commons, that the amount of the sums paid by the public to the Bank, as a remuneration for receiving the contributions on Loans, independent of the annual expence of management, from 1793 to 1816 inclusive, is 397,086*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* That the number of Notes discovered by the Bank to have been forged from June, 1812, to April, 1818, distinguishing those from 1*l.* to 20*l.* and upwards, is one hundred and thirty-one thousand three hundred and sixty-one. That the total expence for prosecutions for forgeries from March, 1797, to April, 1818, amounts to 148,370*l.* That the nominal value of the Notes, of which payment was refused, from Jan. 1816, to April, 1818, is 74,760*l.*; and that the nominal value of forged Notes paid by the Bank for the same period, which was afterwards recovered on the forgeries being detected, amounted only to 75*l.* To shew the great and alarming increase of forgeries of Bank Notes, the whole expence of their prosecutions in 1797 was only about 1,500*l.* while in the first three months of the present year, it amounted to the enormous sum of nineteen thousand, eight hundred and ninety pounds!

The German papers complain rather seriously of the unfavourable issue of the late Leipzig fair. The old charge is renewed against the English manufacturers, that they throw away their goods for little or nothing.

REFORM.—Mr. J. W. PARKINS has accepted the invitation of several freemen of Carlisle, to become a Candidate for the Representation of that his native city, at the ensuing Election. Mr. PARKINS, in his Letter, speaks out plainly about the "Boroughmongers' House,"—states that he possesses an independent fortune by his own exertions,—that he has been educated in the school of adversity,—that no difficulties in a good cause will intimidate him,—that he has been animated from his cradle by a love of liberty,—and that he holds his exertions, and even his life, in trust for his country's welfare. He adds, that a few distinguished Patriots have undertaken to conduct the Election, and defray the necessary expences, for which above 2000*l.* had already been subscribed.—This is the right way.

Mr. BRISTOL HUNT, the other day, personally addressed the Electors of Bristol, and informed them, that unless they could ensure him, on the commencement of his canvass, 1000 votes, he should not again offer himself for that city. What his hopes were in that quarter may be gathered from his subsequent conduct. On Friday, he put forth an advertisement, offering himself for Westminster at the ensuing Election, in which he says that he will oppose upon the hustings the friends of the cruel Corn Bill, and the enemies of Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage.—Mr. HUNT, it should seem, has a passion for subjecting himself to disappointments.

A Collector of the Assessed Taxes in Rotherhithe, being accidentally discovered to have made a charge upon one house for more than he had paid into the tax-office, an investigation took place, which led to the discovery that he had carried on this practice for many years, and had thereby, from a state of insolvency, been enabled to realize a considerable property. The Correspondent who informs us of this recommends, as a precaution against similar frauds, that those who pay the taxes should, before paying, demand a sight of the rate signed by the Commissioners.—Times.

MR. RECORDER.—On Thursday week, when sentence of death was about to be passed on R. SPENCER, he wished to have a paper read in open Court. The RECORDER refused, but said he would hear any thing he had to say. The prisoner then said, that the evidence laid before the Judges was incorrect. The RECORDER observed, that his case had been well considered; and then passed sentence, concluding the usual address with expressing a hope that God would have mercy on their souls. On this SPENCER exclaimed, "I hope he will, for I'm sure you will not."

A great number of persons have assembled for the last four or five nights about the shop of Messrs. GILBERT and POWELL, the corner of Whitecross-street, in Chiswell-street, Finsbury-square, grocers, (who were recently convicted for mixing sloe-leaves with tea, &c.) making a great noise and disturbance, and throwing peas, &c. at the windows, whereby several have been broken. Messrs. G. and P. say they shall be under the necessity of leaving their shop.

DISTURBANCE IN BERNARD-STREET.—A number of people having been attracted in front of No. 1, Bernard-street, where the unfortunate female was killed on Friday, they proceeded to acts of violence, demolishing the doors, windows, &c. Their execrations are vented principally on the mistress of the house, who, as it is said, with what truth we know not, caused the poor girl to clean a second time the window from which she fell.—Surely it is high time to prohibit the practice of exposing females in situations so revolting to decency and humanity, and which has already led to many tragical results.

A private letter from Paris says, that a farrier belonging to the Royal Guard having called out "Vive l'Empereur!" he was ordered to be whipped to death with leather thongs!—He was whipped, but not to death, being conveyed to the hospital alive, owing to the humanity of the Lieut.-Colonel, who was however put under arrest by the Colonel (the Count DE PORTIER) for disobedience of orders.

In the Court of King's Bench yesterday morning, Mr. THISTLEWOOD moved for a rule for a new trial, in the case in which he was convicted for sending a challenge to Lord SIDMOUTH. He urged the same grounds which he alleged at the trial, with respect to the not having time to procure the attendance of witnesses. The Court (all the Judges being present) unanimously refused the rule. No day is yet fixed for his being brought up for judgment.

THE KALIEDOSCOPE.—A Correspondent says, the brilliantly varied and seemingly endless scenes exhibited by the Kaliedoscope have excited more pleasing astonishment than any other optical discovery since the invention of the Camera Obscura: but it is an incontrovertible truth, "that all created substances must submit to the unerring laws of order and number;" and however infinite the changing scenes of the pieces of coloured glass, &c. may appear to the eye of an observer, they are as strictly subject to calculation as the changes of bells, or the varied order of a pack of cards. Perhaps it will not be unamusing to the Reader to be shewn how to calculate the astonishing number of changes that can be effected by a few pieces of coloured glass, &c. placed in the object cavity of the Kaliedoscope. Suppose the number of pieces to be 20, and as they are irregular in form, that each piece exhibits three distinct scenes, like a die with three faces marked 1, 2, 3, exhibiting three distinct numbers. Now 20 such dice as these, according to an easy rule given in Rouse's Doctrine of Chances, will produce more than five thousand two hundred and thirty millions of different numbers or appearances, and if we allow ten changes of scene every minute, without ceasing, it will take upwards of nine hundred and ninety-five years to exhibit them all: this is on the supposition that each of the three faces of the 20 pieces of glass, &c. are as uniform as the three faces of the supposed die are; but such is not the fact, for the 20 different faces of the die, each marked 2, exhibit but one No. 2, although 20 distinct digits, whilst the 20 supposed similar faces of the pieces of glass exhibit 20 distinct forms; therefore the number of changes (as to scenery) must even greatly exceed this calculation, as is remarked in the above work, when the law of combination is applied to chance.

Matthias Maker, for forgery; Leon de Cassaux, for stabbing a Catholic Priest; and David Davis, for shooting at Lord PALMERSTON, who were acquitted at the Old Bailey Session on the ground of insanity, but ordered to be confined until his Majesty's pleasure should be known, have been removed to Bethlem Hospital.

Some years since, three men of the name of M'Grath, a father and his two sons, were executed at the village of Bausha, in the county of Tipperary, under the following extraordinary circumstances, for robberies committed in that neighbourhood:—One of the sons was convicted at the Clonmell Assizes, and at his execution his father and brother attended, and received his corpse in their arms from the gallows!—Soon after, the second son was convicted for a fresh offence, and his execution was likewise attended by his father, who also received his body in like manner! It might be reasonably supposed that two such awful examples would have made such an impression on the mind of the old man as should have induced him to avoid a similar fate; but, strange as it may appear, the effect was otherwise, as the deluded man was, within the next six months, convicted for a new crime, and executed on the spot where his two sons had so recently suffered!—Such is the inefficacy of capital punishment.

A letter from Cambray announces a disturbance which took place between some soldiers of a French legion passing through this town, and a part of the English military composing the garrison.

SONNET

TO THE SEA.

[Written in September 1817.]

Pötsr of the Universe, mysterious Seal!
Thou visible life of impulse unrevealed,
Deep let thy awful nature rest concealed
From the downward-ken of proud Philosophy.
I would not that the heartless tribe should see,
With their self-glorious and unhallowed eyes,
The mystic secret of the energies
That rule thee in thy lone sublimity.
Then let thy tides unquestioned hold their way,
Feared in their power, and viewless in their cause;
Whilst mute admiring Phantasy may find,
In the still grandeur of thy boundless sway,
In the hidden might of thy unchanging laws,
No feeble emblem of THE ETERNAL MIND.

PARLIAMENT,—PROPERLY SO CALLED.

MR. EXAMINER.—There is one advantage that England has over other nations, which, is clearly demonstrated in the following dialogue, between two boys lately returned from the Continent.

C. W. W.
JACK. I don't like England so well as France; there's not near so many cakes and sweetmeats to be bought.

TOM. Sweetmeats there may not be quite so many; yet I'm sure there are a great many kinds of cakes, and one sort are bought and sold almost in every town in England.

JACK. And what kind of cakes are those?

TOM. Parliament cakes.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

The QUEEN, on Monday morning, was attacked by her usual complaint. By the help of a blister, she was better in the evening. She still however continues unwell. Her repose is said in some private accounts to have been chiefly obtained by opiates, and she is described as being much weakened.—Indeed the general state of her health is such, that it has been deemed advisable she should take up her habitual residence in town; the spasms, to which she is subject frequently requiring the most prompt medical attention.

Tuesday was the Anniversary of her MAJESTY's Natal-day, when she completed her 74th year, and upon which occasion the PRINCE REGENT had a dress party in the evening at Carlton-house.

Yesterday morning the following Bulletin was issued:—

"Queen's Palace, May 23, Eleven, A.M.
"The Queen felt herself better throughout the whole of yesterday—her Majesty has passed a very good night,

"FR. MILMAN,

"HENRY HALFORD."

Her MAJESTY got up in the afternoon, and found herself much refreshed afterwards.

"The above is the report furnished by the Court Newsman; but we are sorry to understand, that the refreshment experienced by her MAJESTY was not thought to indicate any change materially favourable to her MAJESTY's condition. The fact is, that the medicines, which alleviated the first attack of the disorder, and which are necessary to prevent its recurrence, have added to the bodily infirmities, that have been too plainly perceived of late. The Queen required much support while out of bed yesterday afternoon; and we fear that the oppression on the chest is far from being removed. Messengers were sent early in the week, to hasten the return of the Dukes of KENT and CAMBRIDGE. The latter was expected by his domestics during the whole of Thursday night, and it is probable that his Royal Highness will arrive in the course of the day."—Courier—Saturday.

No. 324.

DRURY-LANE.

WE see more and more reason to congratulate Drury-lane on the return of Mr. ELLISTON. Comedy has all her feathers again, and sees company to advantage. The pit is now regularly filled, when he plays,—standing-room and all; and the boxes on Friday last became completely filled also, as the play proceeded,—at least as far as we could discern. We rejoice to see this, for more reasons than one. We are supposed by some to have a preference for Drury-lane Theatre; and we do not deny it, though we neither speak well of its bad productions, nor ill of good ones at Covent-garden. But Drury-lane is, and has always been, more to our taste, in its associations with older times, in its possession of the last best dramatist, in its present possession of the best tragedian, in its excellent comic company, which we prefer to a tragic one, and even in the superior lightness and elegance of its internal structure, without that mercenary pack-saddle at its back called a basket. In addition to these grounds of preference, which are critical ones as well as any other grounds, we have thought we discerned lately among our beloved and money-getting countrymen a tendency to run down Drury-lane, upon a suspicion of its being poorer than Covent-garden; and whether such a suspicion be false or true (we believe neither of these overgrown establishments is in the most flourishing condition), every one of our theories, small and great, induces us to combat the tendency to the utmost. Besides, we think it an instance of bad taste in the public that they prefer tragedy to comedy as they have done of late,—such tragedy at all events,—Fazio, Bertram, and the gratuitous and nonsensical tortures of Isabella. It argues a coarse want of excitement; and we would willingly do our best to get them out of it, as we did to deliver them from the more humane domination of our old friends Messrs. DINDIN, REYNOLDS, and CHERRY. If this were to be their only change, we should have done them a disservice. We prefer Tom DINDIN at any time to a mere solemn poacher in boots, or tragifier of what need not be tragic at all. He has a bit of something real and genial about him, if not in the best taste; and as to O'KEEFE, that cordial redeemer of farce, he is worth all the modern tragedy writers put together,—except one, who shews he has got a heart in him.

The Honeymoon was performed here on Tuesday, and the Suspicious Husband on Friday. We have still the same objection to make to ELLISTON's quieter passages, which appear to us something stiffer than formerly; but his scenes with his wife in the Honeymoon were in his old style of dry humour; and when he got well warmed into the livelier passages of Ranger, all his old spirits seemed to flow in upon him. We hope he has seized them, and made them stay. His want of a certain airiness of look and action is perhaps not such a drawback upon his performance of this character as some may think. Ranger is a lively but not a very fluttering person. He exercises a sort of jurisdiction over flutterers, and plays his vagaries with an air of dominancy and deliberation. Mrs. DAV-

SON looked and played excellently well in the Honey Moon; and seemed more than ever at home with ELLISTON. She has not so much room for her powers in the Suspicious Husband, nor did she help to make up for it by dressing herself with her usual taste. She looks infinitely better in her hair than a cap or feathers, as all women do whose hair is luxuriant. Mr. HARLEY is as quaint and twang-voiced, and Mrs. MARDYN as handsome as ever.—Why is the dance left out at the end of this latter play? It was revived a short time since, and finished the piece with a very nice air of gracefulness and good-temper. It should be revived by all means, both for its own sake and for the sake of encouraging dancing in general, which of all town amusements is the one that most unites taste and health. Dancing is undervalued only by those who cannot dance or cannot reason.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

PAINTING, with its many subdivisions, may be classed under three heads, Portraiture, History or Narrative, and Poetry. Portraiture gives the form and colour of objects; History the public and private transactions of mankind; Poetry a selection of the choicest objects, with an intensity that delights the imagination by their beauty, their sublimity or their novelty. With the same power it also displays fictitious circumstances. In this latter and highest class are Mr. HILTON's rare and admirable picture of Una, Mr. TURNER's Waterloo, Mr. HOWARD's Fairies, Mr. FUSELI's Dante in Hell and The Deluge, and Mr. STOTHARD's Fête Champêtre. The Una, as we before said, is profuse in masterly colour, drawing, and expression. The poetry of Mr. TURNER's Field of Waterloo is mainly in its magical illustration of that principle of colour and claire obscure, which combines all their varieties of tint and strength in exhibiting at night the fiery explosions and carnage after battle, when the wives and brothers and sons of the slain come, with anxious eyes and agonized hearts, to look in Ambition's charnel-house, after the slaughtered victims of legitimate and illegitimate selfishness and wickedness. TURNER wants, for his entire greatness and proficiency in the detailed drawing. In whatever relates to massing and to composition, he leaves nothing for us to wish; he enlightens, he surprises, he delights. Like the sunshine he so well imitates, the fervour of his genius is resplendent on all the objects he paints, be they in themselves trifling or important. He has often, too, as here, considerable power over our sensibilities, in the general look and action of his figures, miserably as they are drawn.

Mr. HOWARD's Fairies is worthy of the Painter of The Pleiades, Morning, in Sir J. LEICESTER's Collection. It is Animal Spirits personated by the Graces: the Fairies move with such beauty and delight in their looks, and with such spontaneous elasticity of limb, as by moonlight and a ray-emitting night-fly they dance along the sea margin, and endeavour to seize the Nautilus and shell-fish before the return of the tide.—This Picture really gives a fillip of cheerfulness to the mind that is in a grave mood before it, at least we felt this to be its effect. Hung up in the room of a person with low spirits, it would cheer and sunshine his heart, it would be a pleasing mental stimulant, and would cordialize the wounded mind, as do often the liquid notes that are breathed from Painting's twin sister, Music. So would Mr. STOTHARD's Fête Champêtre. It is the bower of elegance and of happiness, where lovers, in the brightest season of their lives, are feasting their eyes and their hearts, as they sit, ramble, talk, whisper, and dance with each other on the smooth turf, and advance from the shaly and arched foliage, the soothingly pensive walks, "for whispering lovers made." From these shady walks of beautifully clustering trees in the middle-ground, the light advances with delicious gradation to the front, the luminous focus of the Picture. This has a due counterbalance in the sunny hill that rises behind, mantled by distant, blue-tinted groves, and classic edifices. The whole is as hazy on a scene of colour, sentiment, sensibility, and personal grace, as a warm and true imagination can well pourtray. After repeated studies of this exquisite picture, we pronounce it as our opinion, to be one of this elegant minded Painter's master-pieces.

The grey and black of the larger half of the picture of Wellington, by Sir T. LAWRENCE, blends in its gravity so charmingly into the mild and subdued yellow of the other half,—the formal coat, &c. are so nearly obscured by the long, loosely-pendant cloak,—the extended arm forms so noble a line with the rest of the figure,—the uncovered head and steady attitude of the Duke look so self-possessed, intent, and intellectual,—the intermixed softness and brightness of the effect so entirely suit the direful character of battle, and the sentiment of the picture is so raised above the accustomed style of Portraiture, that we doubt whether we ought not to place it in the class of Poetry.

Many years since, Mr. WEST painted a scene representing The Great Mogul making a Grant to the East India Company. He has painted this subject afresh, and it forms a striking feature in the large room of the Exhibition; for it has a sober richness of colour, and an aspect of propriety, splendour, and dignity, quite becoming the nature of the scene. It is in most admirable costume of manners, dress, architecture, climate, &c.; and the stiff European dresses contrast with the picturesque, easy, and elegant dresses of Asia,—the vest, the turban, the sash, &c. while they all harmonise in colour.

Well understood, forcible tones of colour and character, in their varieties of light and shade, impress on our feelings the highly interesting subject, painted by Mr. STEPHANOFF, of The Trial of Algernon Sydney. The shrewd, surprised, impudent looks of some of the Lawyers, courtier-like and tyrannical,—the sympathy and anxious listening of the people present,—the manly steadiness and energetic look of Sydney, though pale from confinement and ministerial oppression, brought to our recollection Mr. HONE's trial, though the results of these legitimate trials were so different. The Patriot is here described holding up his hand, and saying to the Judge, who had insolently pronounced him insane, "Feel my pulse, my Lord." We are glad to see at this time such a noble subject so nobly treated in a public Exhibition. This picture is rich in contrasted character, in the minions of Legitimacy and lovers of Freedom. It is altogether honourable to Mr. STEPHANOFF's very improved powers.

Sir J. LEICESTER has further enriched his Gallery with one of the President's grand Sketches from the Revelations, representing The Destruction of the False Prophet and the Great Beast by the Rider on the White Horse.

MUSIC SLATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR.—I presume to ask the favour of you (after reading the little pamphlet I enclose) to speak of me as I deserve. You will perceive by the letters addressed to me, that I have for many years taught Music, upon the system which is now called a New System. I beg leave, in addition to the honourable testimonies of my friends, to assure you, that the Music Slates were invented by me; and it is now ten years since I had the first engraved; that I taught in classes sixteen years since: from that time I have pursued the same plan, with the exception of using a plurality of Piano Fortes. This I relinquished, from a thorough conviction of the impossibility of doing the justice to my pupils, which my undivided attention enabled me to do; not that I contend against children playing in concert, when perfect in such pieces as the heaven-born Mozart's Zauberflöte, and other such pieces: on the contrary, my pupils are frequently indulged even now with such a performance on two Grand Piano Fortes. Mr. Logier, who is the accredited inventor of my system, and who, I doubt not, is a man of great talent and extraordinary perseverance, has certainly followed the same plan with his pupils; perhaps he has improved upon it: but no one will hesitate to believe, since I taught the theory in classes, used a plurality of instruments, invented and made my pupils write on engraved Slates, gave prizes to the best performers for so many years, and that Mr. Logier's System consists almost entirely of the same points, that I have an undoubted right to the merit of it. I am too great an admirer of talent, not to be pleased with any man who endeavours to bring to a higher state of perfection any art or science, even though he may borrow hints from all his brother professors; much less can I condemn a man who flatters me so much as Mr. Logier does, by adopting my own system, his chiropast excepted. But at the same time I cannot sit quietly by, and see myself deprived of the credit of the invention of the system.—I remain, Sir, respectfully yours, &c.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Saturday, May 16.

THE KING v. JOSEPH MERCERON, ESQ.

This was an indictment against the defendant, a magistrate, and for many years treasurer of the poor of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, for appropriating to his own purposes the sum of 925*l.* 1*1s.* 3*d.*—It appeared that the defendant had given rise to some suspicions of having levied more than was proper on certain parishioners, and he was prosecuted; but no witnesses being called, obtained an acquittal. The bill of Messrs. Dann and Crosland, his attorneys, amounted to 914*l.* 1*1s.* 3*d.*, which, together with 10 guineas for his coach-hire and private expenses, was paid by him out of the parish funds, on the 10th of April, 1813. A meeting of the vestry was held on the 23d of August, when, after the ordinary business was gone through, and all were gone except six or seven of Mr. Merceron's friends, a resolution proposed by Mr. Platt, a dissenting minister, was passed, declaring that the expenses incurred by the defendant should be paid by the parish. This resolution was copied as usual into the proper book by Mr. May's clerk; but the thing getting known, most of the parishioners determined to oppose the payment of the bill when the treasurer's accounts should be audited. Respecting what passed at that time, the most opposite statements were made by the different witnesses.—Mr. James May, vestry-clerk, swore, that at the audit-vestry Mr. Platt held the treasurer's book in his hand, and witness sat opposite to check the accounts as they were announced; that Messrs. Dann and Crosland's bill was in the book, yet it was not called out nor produced by Mr. Merceron; that Mr. Merceron's book was taken to witness's house to be copied, but he did not know of the entry of the bill until the inquiry before the Police Committee, in 1816.—This evidence was confirmed by Mr. Wrightson and three other witnesses. The former said, that all bills passed through his hands, and among them was not that of the defendant's attorneys.—On the part of the defendant, Mr. Platt swore, that he distinctly recollected calling over the item of Messrs. Dann and Crosland's bill, and at the same time shrugging his shoulders, observing aloud, "This is a monstrous business."—Mr. James B. Unwin, surgeon, commissioner of assessed-taxes and of the land-tax, and one of the governors of the parish, swore most positively that Dann and Crosland's bill was mentioned and the sum: Mr. Platt, he said, read it in a clear voice. Other witnesses, with some slight variations, confirmed the foregoing testimony.—The Jury consulted a few minutes, and returned a verdict of—Guilty.

Monday, May 18.

THE KING v. JOSEPH MERCERON, ESQ.

The defendant was again indicted for a misdemeanour, in procuring certain public-houses in St. Matthew, Bethwal-green, from corrupt and illegal motives, to be licensed. The five houses charged in the indictment bore the signs of the Seven Stars, the King's Arms, the Queen's Head, the Turk and Slave, and the Ram and Magpie.

Mr. SCARLETT opened the case for the prosecution with some general observations upon the duties of persons in the situation of the defendant, who as a magistrate had a sacred trust reposed in him for preserving the peace and good order of the district. Instead of doing so, the charge against the defendant was, that from corrupt motives, and against his better knowledge, he had concurred in granting licenses to houses that were the schools of all kinds of the lowest vice and debauchery. The offence was one of the most heinous nature, and he did not ask the Jury to convict unless the clearest and most indubitable testimony warranted their verdict.

Mr. John Whitby Perry was head constable of St. Matthew, for 1815, and, accompanied by the headboroughs, he had frequently gone round to inspect the conduct of the public-houses, among others the Seven Stars. It was conducted in a very bad manner; it was kept open till one or two in the morning; it was frequented by the lower orders, young people of both sexes, generally playing at cards, sometimes 20, 30, or 40 at a time; the witness remonstrated with the landlord; but whenever he went round it was the same; the house was open during divine service on Sundays, and his remonstrances received no attention. He had also visited the King's Arms, in George-street, and there he found the game of shuffle-board played at a long table, and about 30 persons drinking and smoking during divine service; he again often remonstrated, and threatened in vain. He also visited the Queen's Head, in Fleet-street, which was not less irregular than the other two; cards, bad hours, and open during divine service. The Turk and Slave, in Brick-lane, was as ill-conducted as the others. Four or five days before the licensing-day, in 1815, witness was sent for by the defendant, to his office; he inquired whether witness had any complaints to make: witness answered in the affirmative, naming particularly the five abovementioned, giving the details, and saying that he must report them before the licensing-board. Merceron bade him not to be litigious, as such representations might be the means of their losing their license, and they and their families would be reduced to beggary. He would send to the publicans, and after such remonstrance, their demeanour would no doubt be different; he added, that he should be upon the bench, and presentation would be unnecessary. On the licensing day, Mr. Merceron and Sir Daniel Williams were only on the bench. Sir Daniel Williams asked the witness how the licensed victuallers had conducted themselves: the witness answered, that he had certainly found some of them very irregular, but that Mr. Merceron had promised to admonish them: Mr. Merceron confirmed this statement, and added, "Sir Daniel, I have seen to it." The licenses were renewed. On visiting them afterwards, the witness did not find their conduct at all improved. Great differences prevailed in the parish; he had never had the slightest dispute with Mr. Merceron, and was of no party.

Matthew Cadot, one of the headboroughs, John Smith, and Thomas Field, another of the headboroughs, gave nearly the same representation.

Mr. Isaac Reynoldson was constable of St. Matthew, in 1816; he knew Merceron, and had communicated with him previous to the licensing day, on the subject of public-houses. On the 2d of September, the licensing-day, Mr. Merceron called upon the witness between nine and eleven, the magistrates meeting at twelve o'clock. He said, "Mr. Reynoldson, have you any complaints against any of the public-houses?" The witness answered that he had, and gave him a list of six or seven of the most irregular—the Seven Stars, the Ram and Magpie, the Adam and Eve, the Turk and Slave, and the Golden Key, were among them. The defendant said, "You must be very particular how you present these houses, as you may be the means of depriving the publicans and their families of their livelihood." The witness observed that he should be very sorry to do them an injury; and the defendant said, if it were left to him, he would see them himself, and chastise them. The witness asked if he should not be obliged to take the oath, and the defendant answered, Yes, but it was a mere matter of form. The witness said, he could not take an oath, and represent that the public-houses were in good order: the defendant added, "If you must mention it, be careful what you do." When the witness attended at the Board, he saw Mr. Merceron, and three or four other Magistrates, one of whom was Sir Daniel Williams: the latter asked a question regarding the publicans: he mentioned the Golden Key as disorderly; but no further questions were asked, and the witness gave no further information, as the defendant had said that he would see the tenants. All these houses but the Golden Key were relicensed, and that about a week afterwards.

Thomas Lefevre, James Gardner, John Scrase, James Essex, and Wm. Fishwick, other headboroughs, gave nearly the same evidence.

The evidence of the Defendant before the Committee of the House of Commons was then read; from this it appeared, that he had stated that three of the public-houses in question belonged to him, as well as some others not enumerated on the record.

Mr. TOPPING addressed the Jury for the defendant, arguing that there was not sufficient evidence to induce the Jury to conclude that the defendant had concurred in licensing these houses from the guilty motives imputed, when others much more natural could be assigned: the evidence had not brought down the knowledge of the irregularities in the public-houses, on the part of Mr. Merceron, later than July, and, between that date and September, the defendant might have taken, and perhaps did take, such steps as would reform their conduct, and render them fit to be licensed. He contended that the Jury could only convict on positive facts, while scarcely so much as suspicion had been made out. It was sworn that these houses had been licensed for the last 50 years, and was it fair to presume corruption because the defendant had not been anxious to deprive the tenants of the means by which they obtained bread for their families? He would show, by documents which could not be doubted, that, in truth, Mr. Merceron had no interest in the houses, but that he had assigned his leases to other individuals, with whom he had no concern.

Mr. Charles Lush proved the assignment, by the defendant, of a lease of the Seven Stars to Mr. Hanbury the brewer. Another under-lease of the King's Arms was also put in. A third, of the Queen's Head, was also established.

Peter Charrier had been beadle of the parish for 21 years, and had been employed by Mr. Merceron to carry complaints to the landlord of the Seven Stars: he sometimes ordered the publicans to attend him, if disorders occurred: this happened many times in the course of a year. He had taken similar messages to the keepers of the King's Arms, the Queen's Head, the Turk and Slave, the Ram and Magpie, and the Adam and Eve. They all were desired to attend the magistrate.

Mr. Thomas Cutbill was constable in 1814 and 1815; he had visited all the public-houses in rotation about eight times in the year, and always considered the Turk's Head and the Adam and Eve very regular houses.

Mr. J. J. Downes, high constable of the Tower division, had gone to the Seven Stars, Adam and Eve, Turk and Slave, King's Arms, Queen's Head, and the Ram and Magpie, and had seen nothing more reprehensible in them than in others. He had never felt it necessary to make any complaint to the magistrates on the subject.

Mr. SCARLETT replied, dwelling most emphatically upon the conduct of the defendant at his interview with Reynoldson, when he told the latter that his oath was but a matter of form.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT observed, that there was no part of the functions of a magistrate more important than the licensing of public-houses; the trust was indeed sacred, for upon its due discharge depended the health and even the lives of the lower orders of society: dissipation led to crime, and crime to death. With regard to this offence, charged to have been wilfully and corruptly committed, it was fit to remark, that, in order to maintain it, it was not necessary to show direct pecuniary motive in the defendant to grant licenses in opposition to his own conviction of the unfitness of so doing; it was enough to establish, that the defendant had even a remote and general interest in the renewal of the licenses. True it was, that by closing the house, one family, that of the landlord, might be reduced to beggary; but who should say how many families might be ruined in health and circumstances by keeping them open? The difficulty seemed to be to attribute conduct like this to any other than a bad motive; and a bad motive, in point of law, was a corrupt motive.

The Jury scarcely turned round, and found the defendant, Guilty.

CRIMINAL INFORMATION.

Mr. CLARKE moved for a criminal information against the proprietor of the Stamford News, for a libel upon the Marquis of Exeter, in a letter addressed to the Marquis. The letter inquired by what authority his Lordship continually rode up and down the streets of Stamford, making the fronts of all the houses the object of his rigid stare—how he could condescend to become a winnower, nodding at all the well-looking females he could discover, and why he disgusted the modest daughters of the inhabitants by the obtrusive winks of nobility, followed by a blown kiss? To say the least of it, this conduct was indecent; and as his Lordship had a most amiable sister, the writer put it to him how he would like her to be subject to such treatment. His Lordship might bespeak plays at the theatre, and the buskin'd hero might proclaim his Lordship "a rare one for the girls," or he might press the cheek of a modest female in the box lobby, but such conduct was unworthy of any man, much more of an individual so exalted, &c. &c. The paper also contained a reference to the application made last term for a criminal information, in which Mr. Clarke had stated that Mr. Drakard, the proprietor, had expressed no contrition; the proprietor added to this paragraph, (after quoting it,) that this artful begging for contrition would be of no avail; and he recommended his Lordship's Counsel to adhere to truth when next he moved for a criminal information. The present motion was made to put a stop to such calumnies as imputed to his Lordship that he rode about the streets of Stamford, for the purpose of selecting objects for his illicit amours.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH asked if the noble Marquis denied the imputation.

Mr. CLARKE.—He says that the charges are groundless, false, and malicious; that while riding through the streets, or in the box-lobby, he had not conducted himself in any indecent or improper manner so as to violate the decorum due to the female sex. He cannot deny that he has ridden through the streets, and while so doing he probably did not shut his eyes.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—Does Lord Exeter state, that while so doing he did not conduct himself in a manner to attract the notice of females at the windows, or elsewhere?

Mr. CLARKE read a part of his Lordship's affidavit, from which it appeared that he had separately quoted each paragraph of the letter, and had denied the truth of its statements seriatim.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—It certainly appears that his Lordship is accused in this newspaper of indecent and indecorous conduct, and the object of the letter is to draw down upon him public censure: it is, undoubtedly, not a very strong case; but after the offence was made the subject of complaint here last term, it appears that it has been persevered in. The Court is therefore of opinion, that sufficient has been shown to induce it to require, upon affidavit, some explanation from the proprietor of the newspaper: he may be able to prove that his conduct is more venial than it now appears to be.—Rule to show cause granted.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

IMITATION TEA.—THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. PALMER.

This was an information filed against the defendant, which charged him, being a dealer in tea, with having in his possession a quantity of sloe-leaves and whitethorn-leaves, fabricated into an imitation of tea, whereby he forfeited 10*l.* for every pounds weight of such imitation.

It was proved, that the defendant received this composition from a regular manufactory in Goldstone-street, which was conducted by Thomas Proctor, and John Malins, the son of Wm. Malins, who carried on business in Northumberland-alley, Fenchurch-street, as a coffee-roaster. These two persons engaged others to furnish them with leaves. The parties gathering the leaves, which were of the white and black thorn tree, were paid at the rate of 2*d.* per pound for the produce of their labour. These leaves, in order to be converted into an article resembling black tea, were first boiled, then baked upon an iron plate; and, when dry, rubbed with the hand, in order to produce that curl which the genuine tea had. The colour, which was yet to be given to it, was produced by logwood. With regard to the green tea, it appeared that the leaves, after having been pressed and dried, were laid upon sheets of copper, where they received their colour from an article known by the name of Dutch pink (a powder of a yellowish hue). One of the component parts of this powder was understood to be white lead; the other, used to produce the appearance of the fine green bloom on the China tea, was verdigrise, which was a deadly poison!—(Here a feeling of horror seemed to pervade the Court.)—Verdict for the Crown for the full penalties, 840*l.*

Verdicts for the Crown, for the same offences, were also either submitted to by the following defendants, or found against them:—John Prentice, Red Lion-street, Spital-fields;—Lawson Holmes, Ratcliff-Highway;—John Orkney, Shadwell High-street;—James Gray, Bishopsgate-street;—Gilbert and Powell, Chiswell-street;—W. Clarke, East Smithfield;—John Horner, Union-street, Southwerk;—W. Dowling, King-street, Tower-Hill;—George David Bellis, Gray's-inn-lane.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. FRANCIS WARD.

This was an information filed against the defendant, a respectable brewer, at Leicester. It appeared that the defendant had, in 1812, brewed a large quantity of porter, which he placed in a store-vat to improve by age. In 1816 this liquor became sour, and unfit for use as porter. It was in consequence suffered to remain until it became more sour, and was then sold to various grocers as alegar, being in quality equal to what is sold as vinegar, by the regular vinegar manufacturers.—A special verdict was taken from the Jury, which was, "that the defendant brewed the liquor in question as porter, but that upon its becoming sour, he sold it as vinegar without paying the duty, or taking out a license as a vinegar dealer."—The penalties recovered amounted to 540*l.*

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. WM. MALINS.

This was an information filed against the defendant, charging him, a dealer in coffee, with having in his possession a large quantity of vegetable powder made from scorched pease and beans, resembling coffee, and intended to be sold as such, whereby he became liable to pay a fine of 100*l.*—The facts being proved, a verdict was found against the defendant.—Penalty, 100*l.*

EXCISE BOARD.

On Wednesday the Commissioners of Excise sat in the Judicial-room at the Excise in Broad-street, to decide upon the cases of certain grocers, residing in various parts of the metropolis, who have been detected in the act of selling adulterated coffee. Elizabeth Soare, living in Clare-street, Clare-market; James Pearson, residing in Bridge-road, Westminster; and Robert Shearing, living at Rotherhithe, were all found guilty of that offence, and sentenced to the payment of 50*l.* fine each. It appeared that the adulteration consisted in a vegetable powder, formed of roasted pease and beans, and mixed up with the genuine coffee. It was stated by one of the defendants, that this was a common practice among the grocers; and by all, that they were ignorant that they were doing an illegal act. It was also said that it was a custom among the grocers to sell the vegetable powder to poor people at a penny an ounce; and the defence set up by Robert Shearing, the last defendant, was, that by accident some of this vegetable powder was in the mill in which he ground the genuine coffee.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.—On Wednesday George Eyles, porter at the coach-office of the Blue Boar, Holborn, appeared to answer the complaint of Mr. Midgewood, for an overcharge in the carriage of a parcel.—Mr. Alderman ANSLEY observed, that the defendant was not perhaps aware that, by the statute, he was liable to a criminal prosecution for obtaining money under false pretences, and it was to be regretted that some spirited individual did not institute a proceeding of that kind, in order to check so infamous a practice. The Magistrate ordered the defendant to pay a fine of 20*s.*—Defendant—I hope your Worship will mitigate the penalty?—MAGISTRATE—Not one farthing, and I only wish I could fine you 10*l.*

UNION-HALL.

E. Hooper, a midshipman, was ordered to find bail for a violent assault upon Captain Coppinger, an officer in the army. The defendant paid his addresses to the daughter of the complainant. Captain Coppinger disapproved of the connexion, and had repeatedly desired the defendant to discontinue his visits; but he continued to frequent the house (Trafalgar-street, Walworth.) On Tuesday evening the Captain, hearing a loud rap at the door, stepped out of his parlour into the passage, when the defendant entered, and commenced an attack upon him, of so violent a nature, that his features were so disfigured they could not be recognized by his intimate friends.—The Defendant stated that the Captain had insulted him, and refused to give him satisfaction.—Capt. Coppinger said, that he had received many severe wounds in the service, from the effects of which he had long been suffering, and that he was still afflicted with painful indisposition. His character was too well known to be affected by the imputation of the defendant.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

It is our painful duty to record a most diabolical attempt to murder a young woman.—The person charged is John Deneel, who keeps a green-grocer's shop in the Edgeware-road; and the victim of premeditated injury is Jane Rogers, a good looking woman, between 20 and 30 years of age. It appeared that the woman had cohabited with the prisoner for nine years, but on May-day she was married to Rogers, a gardener. She had, according to his statement, left him for the purpose of marrying Rogers. From this time he harboured revenge. He at length resolved on murder, and he took the opportunity of making the attempt on Thursday morning, by calling the woman up, after her husband had gone to work.—Two men, Goodchild and Court, stated, that they were at the Coach and Horses soon after seven o'clock on Thursday morning, when the prisoner came in; and observed, with much coolness, that he had killed a woman at Westbourne Green that morning. They disbelieved him from his easy manner, but he gave them some gin, and then stated that he had been long unhappy in his mind about Mrs. Rogers, and that he had called her up at seven o'clock that morning, under pretence that he wanted some roots; when she came down stairs, he requested a few minutes conversation with her. He observed to her that her cap was on wrong, and on her turning round to look in a glass, seized a bill-hook, and inflicted a severe wound at the back of her head; he then drew from his pocket a razor, with which he cut her throat in a most shocking manner, and in resisting the dreadful attack, her fingers were nearly cut off.—The wounded woman was conveyed to St. George's Hospital. The Surgeon described the manner in which her throat and fingers were cut; besides which there were twenty wounds about the back of her head.—The unfortunate woman related the story, which corresponded with the prisoner's confession, when she was brought into the hospital. The certificate of Mr. Cronin, the house surgeon, to the Magistrate, was "that the sufferer could not long survive."—The husband stated, that the prisoner so far from not having been reconciled at their marriage, was present at the festival, and drank success to them. The prisoner appeared with his waistcoat and his hands imbrued in blood. He complained of the woman having plundered and ill-used him; and on hearing that she was not dead, he expressed his sorrow at it, as he went on purpose to gratify his revenge, and had he completed his work he would not mind then ascending the scaffold.—He was remanded.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

Mr. Gordon, of the City, passing along the road leading to Deptford, on horseback, about ten o'clock on Monday night, was stopped by a footpad, who, cutting the reins of the horse, demanded his money. Mr. G. pretended to look after his money, but pulled out a pocket pistol, but it flashed in the pan; before he could get ready to discharge it the robber knocked it out of his hand, and pulled him off his horse; resistance was now useless (the robber having a knife in his hand, with which he threatened to murder him if he did not give him his money), and he delivered a 5*l.* and 3*s.* in silver to his assailant, who was dressed like a sailor, and is a short stout fellow, with dark features.—Mr. Robinson was met by a man answering his description on Sunday night, who, after knocking Mr. R. down and severely beating him, robbed him of 2*l.* and a few shillings in silver.

Tuesday night about eight o'clock, Mrs. Henrietta Lamb, of Brick-street, Piccadilly, was stopped in Grosvenor-place by two men, who demanded her money; one of them presenting at the same time a large clasp knife. They robbed her of a half sovereign and two sixpences, also her bonnet and spencer, after which one of the ruffians had the cruelty to knock her down, and they both ran away.

On Tuesday, as Mr. Seager, of Pimlico, was passing through Fleet-street, he was hustled by a gang of thieves, who cut his pocket-book out of his pocket, containing bank-notes to the amount of 178*l.* with which they got clear off.

On Wednesday an inquest was held at Islington, on the body of Mr. John Knight, an old and respectable inhabitant. The deceased had spent Tuesday evening with some friends in Holborn, and on walking home, about eleven at night, was seized with an apoplectic fit. While in a state of insensibility he was carried by a watchman to the watch-house, where he was suffered to lie in a senseless state, without the least attention being paid, till ten o'clock on Wednesday morning, when, as he still continued insensible, a surgeon was sent for, who found him dead.—After some consultation, the Jury returned the following verdict—Died by the visitation of God, in a Fit of Apoplexy; and added—At the same time the Jury cannot record the verdict, without expressing their indignation at the want of attention manifested on the part of the superintendents of the watch of St. John, Clerkenwell, in permitting the deceased to remain ten hours in a state of insensibility, without calling in medical assistance.

A dreadful accident occurred, on Wednesday evening, in the King's Road, Chelsea, by a single horse-chaise, in which were a gentleman and two ladies, coming in contact with the carriage of Lord Spencer Churchill, by which the gentleman and ladies were thrown out, and one of the ladies so much hurt, that she died in about two hours. The gentleman had his leg broken, and the other lady received a violent contusion. His Lordship escaped without injury, but his carriage was much damaged.

Friday morning, as the female servant of Mr. Crisp, at No. 1, Bernard-street, Russell-square, was cleaning the windows of the upper story, her foot slipped, and she fell into the area, when she was literally dashed to pieces.

Mr. Turner, schoolmaster, of Owlerton, Yorkshire, was struck dead by lightning, on Thursday week, while passing a farm-yard: his watch, seals, and chain, were each found in different directions from the body, and an umbrella, which belonged to deceased, was stripped to its skeleton.

At Inverness Sessions, Roderick Dingwall, accused of the crime of attempting to prevail upon a Physician to enter into a conspiracy to administer poison to his wife, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

DISCIPLINE OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

No. III.

According to the warrant afforded us by the practice of our illustrious predecessors the Tatler, Whig Examiner, and others, whom if we are like them in nothing else, we resemble (as is usual in that case) in certain infirmities,—such as not being as punctual with copy as “the devil” would have it, and sometimes being compelled by bad farces and seduced by good friends to sit up too late at night,—we take a liberty in which we do not often indulge ourselves, of supplying our present article from our correspondence. The subject of Fagging, in which by the way is included every species of wanton school tyranny, general as well as individual, has excited, as might have been expected, a good deal of observation, and in very different tempers. We have already published a letter, which agreed with us. We now proceed to lay before our readers the others, which we have received, favourable and unfavourable. One of the latter shall have its turn first, especially as the author, while opposing us personally, writes in the spirit of a gentleman. He does not however mention in what school he was brought up; and from the manner in which he speaks of the fagging which he experienced, it is hardly possible that it could have been of the description we have noticed. To his argument, we conceive we are under no necessity of replying. We insert the letter according to the wish expressed at the close of it. It is a mere begging of the question to say, that society requires subordination. Subordination, like the “order and degree” of which a great opposer of tyranny has spoken, “jars not with liberty, but well consists.” But subordination itself is subordinate to justice, and can only exist properly while it breathes a free air. This question however has already been discussed by implication in our last; and we must really beg our Correspondent to look again at what we argued, as well as asserted, in that paper.

Monday, May 25, 1818.

SIR,—I have been a long time a constant reader of yours, and never till the last week or two, in which you have taken up the system of fagging, have your sentiments and my own differed. I should not, however, have troubled you with this, had it not been for an invitation in last Sunday's Examiner of “An Old Correspondent,” who called upon those who had been subject to the system, to state their opinions upon the subject.

I readily attend the call; and who more proper than myself, who was subject to fagging for many years in a public school? who feel it my duty to declare, that so far from seeing any thing in the system deserving censure, I am of opinion, that if we were to look for an expedient which would contribute more than another to the good of society, we should fix on the present.

This was my opinion while I yet laboured under these alleged evils (imaginary, I should say); for had they been in reality evils, surely they would have struck those persons who are represented as groaning beneath them. It may here be necessary to add, that I never attained myself the rank which would have allowed me a fag of my own; I cannot therefore be said to support a system from a consciousness of having abused it.

Who will be hardy enough to deny, that half of the evils which torment the world derive their source from insubordination, or the want of the observance which is due to the authority of superiors; without which, what a confused chaos would society be! Make every man's power equal,—level all authority,—you would level integrity, genius, and principle with them; what a miserable scene would then open itself to our view! yet no less true is it than appalling. On the other hand, view the benefits of subordination; by that alone is the social tie made fast. And what is calculated to bring up a boy with more just ideas of this incumbent duty than the present system, which, while it teaches the junior boys to look up with an obedience to their monitors, does not exonerate the monitors themselves from the reverence due to their common master.

That the system may be abused, I deny not (but what custom, even the best, may not be abused?); but even that argument must be allowed to plead our cause, when we reflect that those by whom it is thus abused, have evinced the same pride in refusing to obey all lawful authority of this kind while juniors, who, soon as they hold the reins of power, exercise their despotic sway with the most remorseless cruelty; but who can say such examples are frequent?

Having said thus much, I trust your candour will allow these remarks publication; I shall now leave to abler hands than mine to point out the many other advantages (and many such there are) attending this system.—I remain, your most obedient servant,
Berners-street, Oxford-street. A CONSTANT READER.

The next letter appears to come also from one who has been brought up under a milder system of fagging than those we have had chiefly in our eye, though we dare say, bad and tyrannical enough. Yet here is an opposer, not an advocate of the system; and we may add, that he is a gentleman well known to the metropolis for his intelligence and public zeal.

London, May 17, 1818.

SIR,—It seems to me that you do well to point attention and to excite some restraint or corrective of the abuse of practice among the boys in our Public and Grammar Schools, which is commonly called “Fagging.”

In the year 1780, I was sent to an Academy near London, which had been erected on the foundation of an old but small endowment for a Grammar School, and is well known to many men prominent in this city. Here I found the practice of fagging in full vigour, but in the undisguised appellation, as in the correct imitation, of the relation of Master and Scholar, the condition was bluntly termed “Slavery,” and its obligation was commonly established by purchase, though sometimes by the promise of protection merely. The little boy, when a “New Comer,” was seized on, by the lure of some small gratification, to promise to be the faithful slave of some older urchin of a higher form, or of the “Upper End,” or was reduced to shelter himself from indiscriminate oppressions to select an absolute master. Manumissions could be obtained by purchase; and the condition was outgrown in turn, or lapsed by length of time, or too much robustness for longer subjection.

Nothing can perhaps be said or written, by a faculty inferior to that of Milton, Swift, Sterne, Wilberforce, Brougham, Caning, Macintosh, and Corrahan, all combined and quintessenced in one perfect sublimation, to describe adequately the urchin but often fiend-like depravity of caprice, cruelty, and oppression, which this bad habit has displayed in our youth; or has elicited or engendered; nor could any thing short of this power conceive or display the bad consequences, which, in the broken spirit and injured faculty of many, and the bad disposition fostered or inflamed by flagitious tyranny on one part, and an abject and despairing submission on the other, have ensued, as I will not attempt this dismal theme. It is on the memory of too many, and clouds at this hour the faculty and the destiny of thousands with timidity and shame stamped early, but indelibly, on the whole character of the mind.

The accidental peculiarity of my own individual experience and particular observation of this habit was of this sort:—I did not enter the school till after the usual age, being nearly eleven years old, well-grown, and more than commonly-ripened by previous habit and education; having the Bible and Milton almost by heart, with Shakspeare, Addison, Fielding, Gil Blas, Sir Charles Grandison, and all the English reading that the family schools and the stock of a suburban circulating library could supply; and having had, besides, some rule and influence in the school and domestic economy of a seminary (the first of its kind) of "little boys, boarded and educated till fit for a master's school." This preparation, and having been in some degree an observer of the riots of that year in St. George's-fields, and a reader of history and of the daily journals of that time, gave me some advantages.

Notwithstanding these, a shrewd descendant of a trader of Fish-street-hill, in whose "room" I was placed to sleep, with his two brothers and two others, soon succeeded to persuade me that it was my interest to take the protection of being his "slave;" he represented that they were three, and formed a strong party in the school as well as in the room; in short, I pronounced the irrevocable "I will."

Memory does not now retain the particulars of my servitude, nor was it of the worst, but it was soon by me unbearable: I groined, repented, rebelled, and with my earliest means "purchased my freedom," by a heavy pecuniary sacrifice; and catching the spirit which was then on earth, and hovering round many a head in Europe and America, I resolved to free all my fellows in the small orb of our play-ground from these shameful shackles. Before I quitted, within five years, slavery was no more—the name and the thing were abolished.

I know not what has succeeded, nor whether it is re-established; but what was our petty misery to the wanton flagranties I hear of, of Westminster and of Eton? Let those who know them tell the secrets of their severe poviciate in the slavery of fagging.

In the next letter we get into the greater fagging regions,—strange regions, truly for a country, which other slaves no sooner touch than they are free! But not to mention their five-years guarantee of the Slave Trade, the full-grown faggers do their best with their Alien Bills and their opposition to equities and ameliorations at home to shew how little sympathy with oppression is to be traced to them. The resentment, which our Correspondent says we shall incur, is no new thing to us. Part of the inevitable office of a journalist, if he does any thing like his duty, is to irritate the self-love of the mean, the worldly, and the overbearing. He does it even by talking against them generally—nay, even by praising the reverse qualities. It would make people stare if they knew to what small and unintentional punctures of this sort, the most vindictive passions are sometimes traceable;—and yet it would not, for private life affords but too many proofs of it. But we are old soldiers, and know where to care for hostility, as well as to meet it. Two tygrown faggers amount to about one bad anonymous critic.

Sir,—Your Paper of the 17th, on which day I first experienced the loss I had sustained in not having been accustomed to read your weekly publications, drew my most earnest attention to your article on "Fagging in Public Schools," and of course made me anxious for the continuation of the ensuing Sunday, when I met with an equal degree of interest and gratification.

I felt a most heartfelt satisfaction in this, I believe, the first public exposure of a most pernicious system; a system which I regard with horror, the greater perhaps from having felt, "in propria persona," its barbarous, and if I may be allowed the expression, its dehumanizing tendency.

Frequently, from the ungenerous and meanly-tempered minds of those whose only superiority was that of physical strength, whilst their mental capacities must, from their conduct, have been even below the almost infant objects which they abused, have I suffered the most degrading and degrading labours, the most shameful and unprovoked insults;—and all this, for the mere amusement of a great boy-baby! What, in the name of honour, what can a mind be good for, that can prompt such unnatural amusements?

Indeed, Sir, I perfectly agree with yourself, and cannot too much praise—(though my individual praise I am ashamed to offer)—I cannot too much thank you, for your open and generous expression of your sentiments, in a matter wherein the very morals and mental spirit of the nation are naturally and most interestedly concerned.

You will, I promise you, incur the resentment of many a hectoring bully, as I suffer myself at present from a refusal to join the "common cause;" you will be presently pestered, perhaps threatened, by their virulent communications;—but you will have the support, the expressive good wishes, of every reflecting, every virtuous soul; and you have the inwardly-speaking gratification of having contributed, and I think effectually as well as principally contributed, to the overthrow of an invidious scholastic oligarchy, which is, if possible, more oppressive though more confined (and not from want of will) than a political.

Allow me once more to offer the thanks of one who, though he has himself passed the trying ordeal, has happily, I may say miraculously, escaped from being blunted in his feelings for others.

WESTMONASTERIENSIS.

To Mr. L. Hunt, Editor of the Examiner.

The letter that follows next begins in the true old theme fashion, and would be otherwise amusing, did not all which the writer of it may be able to inflict, both upon those within his sphere and upon himself, come over one's mind. Here is a young fagger for you, who comes forth of his own accord to vindicate the descriptions of his species. He presents the voluntary spectacle of a person taking pains to render himself callous to all really happy feeling, and glorying (poor fellow!) in his growing hide. His notion, among others, about writing letters to one's self, is a singular specimen of premature worldliness and folly. We trust however, seeing what grammar and English the young dog talks, that he does not belong to the celebrated school from which he dates. We remember how Dr. ROBERTS used to open his eyes at a false quantity, for he was Examiner at our school; and we know not how he would have looked at neither with or, and befitting in the sense of training. A complete fagger however is the likeliest person to disgrace his teachers in this way; for sensitiveness is the great inlet of knowledge; and that our brazen friend is a fagger or has been one, somewhere or other, we have no doubt. It is impossible to help laughing at the recoil of his concluding paragraph; and we have to thank him for informing us of a very remarkable circumstance,—viz., that the Editor is his own brother. The letter opens in the true old theme fashion.

Sir,—It has been observed by many eminent men, that "conceited people rail most virulently at what they least understand." Such, Mr. Examiner, is your case; you have been at the trouble, (and for aught I know you may have been at the expence, of hiring somebody to write them for you) of publishing two articles (as you please to call them) against "Fagging;" with the good proceeding from which, you are as well acquainted as a Captain, who has never seen the inside of a book.

Your sapient self, Mr. Examiner, is grown infinitely wise and consistent on a sudden. One week you are professing your admiration of that maxim so much worshipped and so scrupulously attended to by virtuosi, viz. Sanctum est omne vetus, by writing in favour of old customs; and the next week, with the greatest virulence and most profound illiberality, rail at them; and, to crown the whole, write letters, forsooth, in praise of the said articles to yourself, and publish them as coming from other people.—Excellent! But, Mr. Examiner, lay aside your empty pride, and recollect, though you edit articles upon Politics and Theatricals, as also the Fine Arts,—and your brother, Leigh Hunt, has exposed his folly and self-conceit by the publication of his "admirable" Poem of Rimini,—that neither he or you are infallible. Know, then, I have been a fag, and am now arrived at the delightful honour of having fags under my dominion; and do avow, in spite of your sapient arguments, that it is a style of discipline most salutary to us, befitting us to bear with adversity without murmuring and with resignation, and to subdue all unbecoming insolence and incitement to domineering over our fellow-creatures, whenever Fortune shall be pleased to place us on the top of her wheel.—Your's, &c.

S. P. A., or SOCI. PAULI ALEMNICI.

P. S. My Fag is cleaning my boots, so I have seized this minute to scribble this to your "Sapient Worship," and as I shall pass through Catharine-street, I shall drop it into your box as I pass, not caring to send him with it. His "warming-pau" season is over, and he is turned "green."

Soci. Pauli Scholæ, Die Martis Meridie.

We conclude for the present with the letter of a friend, who in addition to the qualities that give him right to speak on this subject as a man, has a double claim to be heard upon it, as he was once engaged in tuition himself. It follows the other one, like a human voice after a mongrel's.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am very glad you have taken up the affair of the Public Schools, as it respects that atrocious system of the elder compelling the younger boys to become their slaves, their Helots. I have long and often thought of drawing your attention to the subject, by sending you a few cases, the truth of which I have no reason to doubt, from the general character of the party, and the feeling manner in which they were told me. This youth had been at the Charter-house. Before his admission, I have heard his friends say (not his mother or father, for they are hardly impartial evidence upon such an occasion) that he was a boy of lively and quick faculties; also of a sweet and gentle disposition. When I knew him, this had not changed, from the treatment he had experienced; but his faculties were quite the reverse of quick, and his aspect was perhaps one of the most gloomy you ever beheld. I was young when we became acquainted; but I can recall to my mind the horror that came over me, after some of his relations, at the idea of my father sending me to such a school. And this is not an over-coloured picture, in order to make a strong impression upon your readers; for who would not inwardly groan at the idea of a poor boy's being torn by his heels, at one jerk, while asleep, from his bed headlong upon the floor? At his being seized by the arms and legs by two fag-masters, and flung from the door into the school? It would not be very creditable to any one's feelings, who could not be shocked when he heard, that if this poor lad were engaged in any game, he must leave it at the command of his master, and jog out for him at cricket; while the reward of an "innings" was never even thought of. If he was sullen, he was beaten; if he missed a ball, and the tyrant suspected it to be done purposely, he pelted him with it. Fancy a boy standing to be thrown at by a cricket ball! Upon one occasion, on his awaking in the morning, he found his eyes sealed up with wafers, and he was obliged to dress himself in that situation, and go down stairs to moisten them off. This of itself may not be considered an act of cruelty,—but the accompaniments to the act, the hootings, the jeerings, the "ingenious tormentings." After such an occurrence, a boy must be admirably prepared to go through his morning's task! a meek boy too!

There were many other circumstances, which at this distance of time have escaped me; but these in all conscience are enough, and I repeat that I believe them, from the general character of the boy, and his manner of relating them. The late Richard Warburton Lytton, who was class-fellow with Sir William Jones, and, I believe, the present Bishop of Cloyne, at Harrow, told me that the conduct of a great boy at that school, a fag-master, was so tyrannical, that he could never, through the course of his life, think of him but with sentiments of unmingled disgust. He would make the wretched little slave warm his bed for him in the first instance; he would then order him to stand upon the floor, in a winter's night, and sing to him till he thought fit to compose himself to sleep.

A short time since, a gentleman was relating to his company the actions of his fagmaster at the Charter-house—a man who is now a great lawyer; and he declared solemnly, that he now bore upon his body the marks of that fellow's brutality when at school. Who can wonder that a youth with such propensities unchecked, should, in after life, show himself to be a Bonner or a Jefferies held up the slips?—Your sincere Friend,

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS, MAY 24.—Accounts from Pesaro state, that the Princess of Wales, spouse of the Prince Regent, is seriously indisposed. Couriers have been despatched to England with the utmost diligence, and two most eminent physicians summoned from Milan. Her Royal Highness has felt for some time the attacks of a fever, which at first bore no alarming character, but which has since terminated in becoming very disquieting.

The son of the Archduchess Maria Louisa has received the Dukedom of Reichstadt, in Bohemia, which title, with the appellation of Highness, he is hereafter to bear.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

TAUNTON, MAY 28.—We have great pleasure (says the Taunton Courier) in noticing the very luxuriant appearance of the country at the present season, and particularly of the orchards through Somersetshire, which exhibit a more determinate probability of fruitfulness, than they have for many years past. The spread of blossom is uncommonly profuse, and vast numbers of trees already shew that they have not disclosed their flowers in vain; the apples being well set. This part of the country is indeed now what the Poet describes—

"One boundless blush, one white empurpled shower

"Of mingled blossoms; where the raptur'd eye

"Hurries from joy to joy, and, hid beneath

"The fair profusion, yellow Autumn spies."

And in reference to the blue, cloudless sky, we have for several days past enjoyed—the gaiety of our meadows—the green leafiness of our woods—and the antiring song of their feathered choristers, we might say, with the elegant author of that admirable poem, The Fast of the Poets, that

"All things above—and beneath—and around

"Seem a world of bright vision, set floating in sound!"

MILFORD HAVEN, MAY 21.—Baynes, who was convicted at the last Carmarthen Assizes of making and uttering forged Bank of England notes, is ordered for execution. The greatest exertions have been used in behalf of this unfortunate young man. He is said to be a person possessing very superior abilities, and at the time of being informed of the warrant for his execution, was employed in engraving a plate to be submitted to the Bank, which, by the difficulty of its imitation, would prevent the frequency of forgeries.

At Blakeney fair, Gloucestershire, on Tuesday week, a pig-dealer, named Coopey, drank three pints of gin with little or no intermission, and almost instantly expired.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, May 25.

CUSTODY OF THE KING'S PERSON.

The LORD CHANCELLOR proposed, in a Committee on this Bill, various clauses. One was, that Parliament should nominate the four additional persons who were to be added to the eight now composing the Queen's Council; and that her Majesty, in case of a vacancy, should fill it up. He proposed the following names—the Earl of Macclesfield, the Bishop of London, Lord St. Helens, and Lord Henley.—Agreed to.

Some conversation arose, in which Earl GREY and Lord HOWLAND urged several objections; but the clauses proposed by the Chancellor were added, and the Bill was ordered to be engrossed.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion for the commitment of this Bill, the Earl of HARDWICKE said, that it was not to be considered as a solitary measure, but as part of a system intended for the reform of the Poor Laws.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN observed, that the provision in this Bill, which made it lawful for overseers and churchwardens to take from parish paupers their children under 12 years of age, would manifestly tend to increase the want of foresight in parents.

which was the great evil of the present system. It might lead to the effect, which had been pointed out as the consequence of Infanticide in China, which was the great cause of the misery to which a vast portion of her overloaded population was reduced. The moral effect of the separation was also to be considered. Any system of education not founded on the interchange of the domestic affections was vicious. God and Nature had rendered the cherishing these affections as necessary to the strengthening the moral character, as healthy exercise was to the physical constitution of children. The only true remedy for the evil was to breed up the lower classes with the idea that they must depend entirely on their own exertions. The Noble Marquis also objected to the clause which enabled the parish officers to buy land for the purpose of employing those out of work, and gave his reasons for opposing the present system, which, if persevered in, would end only in a convulsion.

After a short conversation, the clause respecting the providing for children separate from their parents, was withdrawn; and the others were carried.—The Vestry Bill and New Churches Bill were then forwarded, and the House adjourned.

Tuesday, May 26.

The New Churches Bill was read a third time and passed without any debate.

BANK RESTRICTION.

The Bank Restriction Bill was committed, after a long conversation, in which the Earl of LIVERPOOL said, that the Bank were perfectly prepared to pay in cash.

Lord GRENVILLE spoke strongly against the measure, maintaining that after making every allowance for the enormous expense of the last year of the war (120,000,000*l.*), for the distress and dearth that attended the first year of peace, for the extent to which the exchanges were affected, and all other operating causes, he was confident that the principal cause of all our late calamities, arose from the extensive issue of Bank paper, and the ruin of the monied men consequent on the depreciation of that issue. To that, more than to any other cause, must thousands in every rank of life, in the highest circles of commercial and agricultural enterprise, and the lowest sphere of laborious earnings, attribute the sufferings they had so grievously experienced.—The measure, he said, gave the Bank the power, as it were, of putting a pump into the estate of every man, and pumping out just as much as it was thought convenient. Now it was at the rate of 5 per cent., but if the issues of the Bank were augmented, in a short time it might be 10 per cent., or even more. This was a state of things not to be endured. From a perseverance in this paper currency, he saw nothing but mischief and ultimate destruction to the finances of the country. The evils were so many, that he could not enumerate them; and so great, that his Majesty's Ministers did not dare to look them in the face.

Lord HARBOROUGH made a few remarks, in the course of which he said, that the Constitution itself was not more firm and stable than the credit of the Bank; and that the only proper time for a resumption of Cash Payments would be when no person could perceive the removal of the Restriction.

After several amendments had been rejected, the Bill was reported.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, May 27.

The Bank Restriction Bill was read a third time and passed.

POOR EDUCATION BILL.

The Earl of ROSSELYN, in moving the second reading of the Poor Education Bill, pointed out at considerable length the advantages that Scotland had derived from the blessings of education, and contrasted them with the disadvantages that Ireland experienced from the want of it. Into whatever country Scotchmen emigrated, they had always succeeded in improving and humanizing that country, as well as in deriving emolument from the exercise of their own talents and acquirements. The number of Scotch beggars was not above one in a hundred compared with the Irish; and yet the funds for the support of education in Scotland were exceedingly small; but they were well managed, and no abuses existed: whereas, in England, abuses had prevailed in the administration of charitable funds from the earliest period, down to the present moment. The Noble Earl then referred to various ancient and modern Acts of Parliament, the necessity of finding a remedy. When he last 50 years, the poor-rates had increased nearly 8,000,000*l.* he thought it highly into the state of all charitable funds for the relief of the poor should be made at the same time. These charities were the property of the public; and it was too absurd to say, that any private interests could be affected or should be considered in their examination. His Lordship then detailed the chief provisions of the Bill. They were for the appointment of 14 Commissioners, six of whom were to have no salaries; and all of them to be appointed by the Crown. The commission was to be armed with power to examine on oath, and to call for papers, persons, and records. His Lordship then concluded by moving, that the Bill should be read a second time.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he could not help thinking that this Bill would be much more detrimental to the charities than any mode of proceeding that could be devised. If the legislature did not protect all honorary trustees in the execution of their trusts, if they were to be exposed to vexatious inquiries, not one honourable man would be found to take upon himself the responsibility of a charitable trust. He did not wish to be understood as asserting that there were no abuses in charities. He should be glad to know where was the power of Parliament to interpose between negligent schoolmasters and their scholars; even supposing they were negligent; but the fact was, that a foolish fashion prevailed of sending boys to private seminaries, so that the endowed grammar-schools were deserted, and the deficiency of pupils was unfairly attributed to the misconduct of masters. His Lordship admitted that the law required amendment, but the alteration now proposed was injudicious; there was nothing in the nature of a charity that was not within the cognizance of these commissioners; even the national schools would be subject to them, and to-morrow the Archbishop of Canterbury himself might be summoned before them to give an account of his demeanour.

Lord HOLLAND observed that it was not a Bill empowering Commissioners to judge, but only to inquire—to ascertain the nature and extent of existing abuses. It was not an inquiry directed against trustees or visitors, but in their favour; and if they discharged their duty faithfully, it would only redound to their honour and to the satisfaction of the House.

Lord REMESDALE was convinced that the Bill could do no good, and might occasion infinite mischief. The Bill, it had been said, would be a vehicle for information; but it would be a vehicle for scandal, and a vehicle for immense vexation. The expenses of carrying the Bill into effect would also be enormous. The machinery already existing was sufficient to correct any abuse that could be pointed out.

The Earl of CARNARVON could conceive no reason, and he heard no reason, why the Bill should not be committed. It might come out of the Committee a Bill much improved, and certainly a Bill calculated to do infinite good.

The House then divided.—Contents, 10.—Not-contents, 8.—Majority for the Committee, 2.—The Bill was then committed.

Lord LIVERPOOL, by several amendments in the preamble and clauses, restricted the Bill to charities for the purposes of education.

Several other amendments were also introduced and agreed to.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 28.

The Royal Assent was given, by Commission, to the Irish Paper Duties Bill, the Bank Restriction Bill, the Spanish Slave Trade Bill, the Irish Yeomanry Corps Bill, the Irish Tenantry Regulation Bill, the Salmon Fishing Regulation Bill, and various private Bills; in all 15.

The Duke of Kent's Annuity Bill, the Vestries Bill, the Workmen's Wages Bill, the Watch and Ward Bill, and several other Bills, were read a third time, and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 25.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

Mr. BROUCHAM moved an address to the Regent, for a copy of all sums received by the Crown, under the will of the late Samuel Towson, Esq. The Learned Member said, that understanding 120,000*l.* had been bequeathed by the testator to charitable purposes, and forfeited to the Crown in consequence of some formal error in the will, he considered that it had happened very opportunely, as it might afford the means of discharging the expenses of a commission (for education) provided by a Bill now in progress.—Ordered.

POOR LAWS.

Mr. STURGES BOURNE moved the order of the day for the further consideration of the report on the settlement of the Poor

Bill, for the purpose of postponing it. The order being read, the Hon. Member moved, that the report be taken into further consideration on this day three months.—Ordered.

CUTLERY BILL.

The House went into a Committee on the Cutlery Trade Bill. Lord LASCELLES stated, that the object of the Bill was to enable purchasers to distinguish by proper marks between articles of good manufacture and counterfeits.

Mr. Alderman Wood brought up a clause, that no articles should be marked with the word "London," unless they had been manufactured in that city.—Agreed to.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, May 26.

FORGED NOTES.

On the 2d reading of Bradbury's Invention Bill,

Mr. MANNING made some observations as to the difficulties attending any mode of engraving which could give the public a security against forgeries.

Mr. P. MOORE said, that several Engravers approved of the plan of Mr. Bradbury; but that the Bank threw cold water upon it.

Sir JAMES MACINTOSH observed, that he had received many communications on the subject of forged notes. He thought that the Commissioners who were to inquire into the matter should be appointed as speedily as possible; so that persons desirous of making useful suggestions might know to whom they might address their communications.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he did not intend any unnecessary delay.

The Bill was read a second time.

MR. BUTT.

Sir GILBERT HEATHCOTE presented a petition from Mr. Butt, a prisoner for libel in the King's-Bench Prison.—The Petition prayed to allow petitioner the benefit of Habeas Corpus to come into Court, and for the consideration of his case by the House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that the Petition contained most serious charges, involving that of perjury against an individual, (we believe the Deputy Comptroller of the Pipe-Office.)

The Petition was rejected.

Mr. M. A. TAYLOR brought forward a motion respecting the administration of the Law in the Northern Counties; but he withdrew it on the representation of Lord Castlereagh, that Government would devote its attention to the subject.

LOTTERY BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. LYTTELTON said he was really surprised, when he considered the acts in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was often engaged, that he should not only give his support to, but insist on the adoption of a system so base and disgraceful. But if the Right Hon. Gentleman was disposed to sacrifice public morals for the paltry gain of 200,000*l.*, he (Mr. Lyttelton) was not inclined to agree with him. He abhorred and detested such dishonourable and fraudulent practices, and he would continue to oppose them as long as he had a seat in that House. With that view, he should now move, that the Bill be read a third time on this day three months.

Mr. PARNELL said, that nothing had given him so much pain during the short time he had sat in that House, as to see how much great questions of morality and policy had been sacrificed to profit. (Hear.) Future ages would place such actions in a proper light. When the Right Hon. Gentleman should sink into the silent tomb, this epitaph, if not engraven on his monument, would form a most appropriate inscription for it:—

"Here lies

The Right Honourable Nicholas Vanstittart,

Once Chancellor of the Exchequer;

The Patron of Bible Societies;

The Builder of Churches;

A friend to the Education of the Poor;

An Encourager of Savings' Banks;

And a Supporter of Lotteries!!!"

(Loud and continued laughter.)

Several other Members spoke against the measure; but Ministers said not a word.—On a division, there were 40 for the Bill, and 14 against it.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, May 27.

The Negotiable Securities Bill was read a third time, and passed.

FINANCE.

Mr. MABERLY observed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was reported to have said in the House, that he should neither be obliged to raise money by loan or funding next year; was he not correct in stating that there would be 44 millions of Exchequer Bills in circulation at the end of the year?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that he had not given a pledge that no money would be raised by funding next year; for, in his situation, that would be improper; but he said he had funded so largely this year, as to render his resorting again to this mode of raising money for next year highly improbable. He was convinced that his conclusions were right, from the abundance of money and the general prosperity of the country, and more than those, from the increasing amount of the revenue, which was going on at this moment at the rate of 100,000*l.* per month, which it must be most highly gratifying for the country to know.

BANKRUPT LAWS.

Mr. J. SMITH said, a Petition, received last Session from a number of commercial people, had represented the grievances existing on this subject. The information produced before the Committee tended to show the inefficiency of the present system. He felt that it was the bounden duty of the House to set about reforming the system. Gentlemen of good information and high character had given information to the Committee. Mr. Montague said, that in the city, persons made a trade in the way of proving false debts. Mr. Cullen thought that, in the majority of commissions, there was a sort of conspiracy between the bankrupt and the petitioning creditor, to defraud all the rest of the creditors. He might refer to the highest authority, the Lord High Chancellor, as far back as 1801, when he said something like this—that unless the Court held a strong hand in cases of bankruptcies, they would be found as great a nuisance as any existing in the land. The Committee wished to extend the laws impartially; but not so as to affect directly persons not in any trade, for merely occasionally buying and selling. It appeared to them proper to make a man a bankrupt by a mode different from the present. A man might now be forced to bankruptcy, by arrest and two months' imprisonment, and by other modes. The Committee thought it advisable, that a man in a state of insolvency might make himself a bankrupt, and recommended certain measures on this subject. A statement from a man believing himself insolvent might be given to the Secretary of Bankrupts. The Committee recommended other points, respecting traders staying abroad to keep away from their creditors. If a man went abroad to see his wife, or children, or friends, he was not, he said, to be committing an act of bankruptcy in doing so; but if it appeared by his writing home, that he stayed away from his creditors; then the case was very different. There was a great grievance respecting the means of providing for the security of the bankrupts' property according to the existing system. One of the chief grievances existed in the facility of proving debts before the Commissioners. Mr. Montague had observed that it was only walking down to Guildhall, and taking an oath. It appeared that the readiness of getting a certificate was more frequently in the power of a dishonest than of an honest debtor. It was quite common at Guildhall to set up pretended debts. There was a case in which a man had been asked what he had done with about 17,000*l.* He said he had spent it. Being asked how, he said he had had a house to keep, and this, that, and other expenditure; but it turned out that he had spent the money profligately. But he got his certificate, as according to law he was entitled to have it. The Committee wished for strong measures on these subjects. Another subject which had engaged the attention of the Committee was the state of the Bankrupt Law, as it related to capital punishments. After what had been so ably urged against that part of the system, he should only say that the case was fully made out, that no good effects could result from such severity, and that its only operation was to prevent the punishment of fraud altogether.—(Hear.)—With regard to the allowance which ought to be made to bankrupts, the Committee were of opinion that it ought to be liberal. It was suggested in the report, that the ordinary measure should be 5 per cent. on the amount of the dividend, subject however to the discretion of the Commissioners. Another object of the Committee had been to provide for the better regulation of the proceedings of the Commissioners in bankruptcy. The mode by which they were appointed in the country was one of much mismanagement, as they were, in fact, frequently selected by the solicitor to the commission. The Committee had sat two Sessions, during which they had applied their utmost industry to the investigation of this subject—a subject which they had found surrounded with difficulties of every kind. He begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the Bankrupt Law.—(Hear, hear!)

Sir JOHN NEWPORT observed, that the effects of the Bankrupt Law in Ireland were so mischievous, that if not materially altered, it would soon become necessary to abandon them, as it would be a less evil to live under no law at all than under a system which in practice was so injurious to the honest trader.

Mr. LOCKHART expressed the satisfaction he felt at the appearance of this report on a subject to which he had long looked with the most serious apprehensions. The present state of the Bankrupt Law led to practices which were dangerous both to the morals and property of the country.

Leave was then granted to prepare and bring in the Bill.

LAND-TAX.

Mr. BROUGHAM stated, that he had seen the copy of a letter, signed John Thompson, and dated at Kendal, purporting to be a circular notice to the Assessors of the Land-tax, to make no further assessments till they should receive further instructions. He was sure that he did not over-state the qualities of this letter, when he described it as a wilful disfranchisement of persons legally entitled to vote at the election of Representatives in Parliament. Under these circumstances he felt it right to move, that John Thompson be immediately required to produce a copy of any circular or other letter addressed by him to the Assessors of the Land-tax in the county of Westmoreland, within the last two months, together with the names of the Commissioners or others by whose authority he had proceeded.

Mr. LUSHINGTON had no objection to the production of the paper. The subject had never been before the Treasury, but it appeared, on inquiry at the Tax-office, that a reference had been made by Thompson, with regard to some freehold properties of the value of 40s. in certain parishes in Westmoreland, for the purpose of knowing whether they were assessable or not to the Land-tax. The reply of Mr. Lowndes was, that this liability did not depend alone on the value, but on the title and other qualities of the estate. This was all that was known upon the subject.

Lord LOWTHER believed the letter had been copied from a provincial paper, and that it contained many false and scandalous statements.

Mr. WYNN observed, that the officers of the revenue were the last persons who should express an opinion on subjects of election.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPE BRETON.

Mr. BENNET said he had several motions to make relative to transactions in Cape Breton, which he conceived to be of considerable importance. Some transactions had taken place which in his opinion tended to show that the invasion of property had been suffered, and the security of property risked. The matter altogether was of great importance, and, in another Parliament, in all probability he should call the attention of the House to it for the purpose of answering the allegations that had been made. The Hon. Member concluded by moving for copies of the minutes of council of the 24th June, and 27th July, 1812, relative to a tax on spirits at Cape Breton; also the copy of a regulation of Governor Ainslie, on the subject of plaster of Paris, and several other papers connected with Cape Breton.

Mr. GOULBURN said that a dispute, which was materially connected with one subject of the Hon. Gentleman's motions, had been settled by the mutual concurrence of both parties, and it would, in his opinion, be improper to renew a transaction which had been the occasion of so much trouble already. He hoped, therefore, under all circumstances, the Hon. Member would withdraw that part of his motion which alluded to the Colonial Secretary's Office.

The part of the Hon. Gentleman's motions relative to the Colonial Department were withdrawn, the remainder were agreed to.

FEES OF ENGLISH COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Sir J. NEWPORT said, it was of the utmost importance that the duties of the commission for examining into the fees of English Courts of Justice should be carefully fulfilled. No great quickness had been shown in producing the reports of that commission, for they had only made one, one not printed, and a supplementary report which had been printed. It was notorious that 11s. had been paid in some instances, and 12s. in others, where only 1s. was really due and necessary. The Right Hon. Baronet concluded by moving, that the House do agree with the Committee of Finance, in their 10th report, in the opinion there expressed, that no unnecessary delay should take place in the transaction of the business, and that frequent returns, and extensive and diligent examinations of such important questions, could hardly be supposed to take place, when any of the Commissioners had other important duties to perform.

Mr. BRAGGE BATHURST did not conceive that sufficient grounds had been established for the motion, and therefore he should move the previous question.

The previous question, after some debate, was agreed to, without a division, and of course the original motion negatived.

The Clandestine Marriage Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Lords' amendments to the Churches' Building Bill were taken into consideration, and agreed to.

Mr. Alderman ATKINS obtained leave to withdraw the Mock-Auctions Bill, in progress through the House, and moved for leave to bring in another Bill on the same subject, the object of which he explained to be to impose a duty on every lot sold at auctions.

On the suggestion of the SPEAKER, that it was not probable such a Bill could pass this Session, the Hon. Alderman did not persevere in his motion.—Adjourned.

Thursday, May 28.

Serjeant ONSTOW gave notice of a motion early next Session for repealing the Usury Laws.

The Scotch Churches Bill was read a third time.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL brought in a Bill to amend an Act (the Slave Trade Felony Act) for the more effectual abolition of the Slave Trade.

The Portugal Slave Trade Treaty Bill, was read a third time and passed.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

Mr. S. BOURNE having given notice of a motion on the subject of the Poor Laws,

Mr. BROUGHAM took that opportunity of alluding to his Bill for appointing a Commission of Inquiry into Charitable Institutions. He said, if he thought that the Bill was likely to pass in the form which had received the approbation of that House, he should see no reason for the production of any further report; but he was sorry to say objections had been raised in a quarter whence they were not expected,—objections which could not be ascribed to any fellow-feeling with the authors of the abuses in question, any participation in an interest in their continuance, any unfounded or shameful alarm at the corrections and remedies which the Bill provided, but to the extraordinary subtlety of some men's minds. It was hardly credible that these objections should have been made by him (the Lord Chancellor, we believe), in whose hand-writing, and at whose suggestion, all the material alterations and provisos had been introduced, and adopted for the express purpose, if any thing less than a miracle could effect it, of removing and settling his doubts.—(Hear, hear!)—The Bill, however, it now appeared, was to be cut down and emasculated, and its whole virtue withdrawn, and was then to be called a Bill for promoting effectual Inquiry! If such a Bill was to be sent back to them, filled with modifications which had been triumphantly rejected when brought forward in that House, he trusted the House would know how to consult its own dignity, and he, instead of taking any steps respecting it, should direct his attention to the preparation of some other measure.—He trusted that a Committee of that House would fearlessly pursue its object, in spite of all the difficulties with which the timid sceptical legislator, the weak and panic-struck alarmist, the mere—but he would refrain from giving full expression to his thoughts—might attempt to impede its course. Communications poured in upon him from every part of the country, expressive of one common sentiment, that the proceedings of Parliament on this subject involved the most important interests of the people.—(Hear, hear!)

Mr. BENNET gave notice of a motion for producing the correspondence between his Majesty's Government, and Count Claydon, of Cephalonia, respecting the conduct of General Campbell. Adjourned till Saturday.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, MAY 31.

AN article dated Rome, April 26, says that the Princess of WALES lies dangerously ill at her seat near Pesaro. It is supposed that her health, which was much impaired by the loss of her Daughter, has experienced an additional blow from some late pecuniary vexations. We should doubt whether the latter would have so great an effect on her ROYAL HIGHNESS, who is a woman of a lively temperament, and inclined to make the best of things; but previous malady may render them more formidable than they would otherwise have been; and princely persons are so much in the habit of having their will and convenience indulged, that any unexpected thwarting may hurt them more than others. An article on the same subject from Vienna says, that two eminent physicians have been sent for from Milan, and couriers dispatched to England.

The temporary quiet that has ensued in French politics since the understanding that the foreign troops are to go away, still continues; but a little ominous symptom breaks out every now and then. The other day the Police seized the sixth number of La Sentinelle de l'Honneur.

The Emperor of AUSTRIA has issued a decree, conferring the title of Highness and Duke of REICHSTADT on young NAPOLEON, and giving him a considerable estate of that name in Bohemia. This seems to put an end to the story, that the little sturdy interloper, the possible propagator of new dynasties, was to have his future destinies neutralized by being put into the Church. If there was any such intention, the speculators have doubtless since found out, that to put a son of NAPOLEON into the Church was a very different thing from keeping him there.

While the "old Lion" is in his dungeon at St. Helena, his former servant the fox has been getting on in Sweden. BERNADOTTE was crowned on the 11th in the great church of St. Nicholas at Stockholm. The procession, a very numerous and splendid one, passed through a double line of troops consisting of 11,000 men. His Republican, French, Italian, Military, master-leaving, illegitimate, semi-Allied and Sacred Majesty has taken the title of CHARLES the 14th,—one of his usual pieces of quiet cunning. He thus contrives to look as Swedish and regular as possible, whenever his title is mentioned, and avoids reminding his subjects that he is a mere foreigner. His situation is certainly a remarkable thing in history; and not the least curious feature in it is, that he fairly bought his throne, almost as much as DIDIUS JULIANUS did during the decline of the Roman Empire;—though we are far, of course, from meaning to compare the two purchasers.

There are some pieces of news from other quarters. PETION is dead in Hayti; and General BOYER, whose character we are yet to learn, has quietly succeeded to the Presidency. The late head of the Black Republic was acknowledged, we believe on all hands, to be a very worthy man, and seems to have taken the American Presidents for his model,—a model likely to be much imitated.

Great interest continues to be excited at Baltimore respecting the ultimate destination of the French Expedition under General LALLEMAND.—LALLEMAND is a well-known French Officer, one of the many refugees who have found an asylum in North America, and are very rich and enterprising. The equipment, it seems, is more extensive than was at first reported, and its object is said to be the Revolutionizing a Spanish province. It will make a noise, we suspect, in Europe, wherever it goes.

We are happy to announce that intelligence has been received of a favourable nature from Bombay, communicating the conclusion of a Treaty with HOLKAR, and the successful prosecution of the operations against the Pindarries.—Courier—Saturday.

J. P. BOYER has succeeded PETION as President of the Haytian Republic.

The Treaty concluded between this country and the King of the NETHERLANDS, for the abolition of the Slave Trade, which was signed on the 4th inst., has been since duly ratified and exchanged. By the first article, the King of the NETHERLANDS engages, within eight months from the present time, or sooner if possible, to prohibit all his subjects from taking any part in the trade of Slaves: and, in the event of the measures hereafter to be adopted being found insufficient for that purpose, his MAJESTY further engages to adopt such other ones as may appear best calculated to secure it. The second article provides for the right of mutual search, on the part of both the Contracting Powers; and the third explains the mode in which that right shall be exercised.

We understand that next Tuesday week is the day finally fixed for dissolving Parliament, supposing nothing to intervene which may render it necessary to alter that arrangement. The business in both Houses is expected to be gone through by the latter end of next week, so that they may be prorogued on the Saturday.—Courier.

"Frequent Parliaments are of the essence of the English Constitution, and are sanctioned by the practice of ages: the Members of the Lower House were delegated by the body of the nation for a certain term of years, at the expiration of which they are no longer the Representatives of the people; by lengthening at their own pleasure the duration of their authority, they deprive the people of the only remedy which the wisdom of our ancestors has provided against the ignorance and corruption of those who might be tempted to betray their trust. Long Parliaments will encourage every species of corruption in every class of the community."—Lord Nottingham's Speech on the Septennial Bill.

PITT CLUB.—The anniversary meeting of this society—or rather this remnant of a society—which is indeed opposed to Mr. Pitt's favourite measure of Catholic Emancipation, was very thinly attended on Thursday. Instead of the Great Room at the City of London Tavern being crowded, not more than one hundred persons were present.—Times.

The QUEEN was so much better on Friday, that the Bulletins were discontinued. To the inquiries the answer was, "The QUEEN has had a comfortable night, and is much better."

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of CAMBRIDGE was so much affected by the cordial reception she met on her arrival in this country, not only at Dover, and all along the whole line of road to town, but also in front of her own house in South Audley-street, that, on alighting from her carriage, she threw herself on a couch, and burst into a flood of tears.—Daily paper.

The Journal des Debats of Tuesday last, in allusion to the intended visit of the two celebrated French comedians, Mademoiselles MARS and BOURGOIS, says, pleasantly, that though John Bull hates France, he has no objection to a French actress, especially if she is pretty and piquante; and that the two ladies in question will increase not a little the pecuniary burdens of Great Britain.

A Gentleman speaking of the Sheriffs of London, humourously called them the 21st and 22d of June. On being asked to explain, he said they were the two shortest Knights.

The Judges met on Thursday morning in the King's Bench Treasury Chamber, and chose their respective Summer Circuits as follow:—

HOME—Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Abbott.

NORFOLK—Lord Chief Justice Gibbs and Mr. Baron Graham.

MIDLAND—Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Dallas.

NORTHERN—Mr. Baron Wood and Mr. Justice Bayley.

WESTERN—Mr. Justice Parke and Mr. Justice Burrough.

SCOTLAND—Mr. Justice Holroyd and Mr. Baron Garrow.

Mr. PROTHEROE, Member for Bristol, having given offence to his constituents by some of his votes in Parliament, Colonel HUGH BAILLIE has been invited to succeed him, and Mr. PROTHEROE has given notice of his intention to resign.

Sir G. COCKBURN, who conveyed NAPOLEON to St. Helena, and has just been made an Admiralty Lord, means, as it is said, to offer himself as a Candidate for Westminster.

CANOVA is at present employed by the American Government in executing a statue of Washington, which is to form the ornament of the capitol.

In the Consistory Court of the diocese of Norwich, on Tuesday last, sentence of suspension for two years was passed on the Rev. EDWARD LEATHES, Rector of Reedham with Freethorpe, for neglecting to perform his ministerial duty in those churches for about eight months in the years 1816 and 1817.

MARQUIS OF EXETER v. DRAKARD.—"It is perhaps necessary to state, for the satisfaction of his friends, that Mr. DRAKARD has prepared his affidavit; and, possessing a firm conviction of the justness of his cause and the truth of his statements, ventures to anticipate a successful result before the publication of his next paper."—Stamford News.

According to one Dr. IRVINE, a new sect, denominated Freemen, has recently risen in the Highlands of Perthshire, who profess open hostility to all existing denominations of Christians.—Dr. STODDART, in his furious paper, asserts that in France "there are millions of the population who neither baptize, nor marry, nor bury, with any kind of religious ceremony, nor join in prayer, nor hear the word of God, nor read it, nor confess his existence, but live as without God in the world." The Doctor also asserts, that "almost all the writers (in this country) who address themselves to the passions of the mob, are professed atheists;"—meaning, we suppose, all those writers who do not agree with him in maintaining a particular set of dogmas, which, according to one of the ablest men in Europe, produces "a rooted and habitual depravation of the mental faculties, intellectual and moral."—See Bentham's Church of Englandism and its Catechism examined.

Mr. WHEATER, whose premises were destroyed in the Strand some few months back, accompanied by such dreadful circumstances, was among the first to raise the alarm at the late fire in Somers Town. He has lately opened a house opposite to where the accident happened. Being roused by a smell of something burning, he snatched his baby from bed, and hurried out into the street, although still exceeding lame, and, with all his might rang the bells and knocked with the greatest violence at the adjoining doors; nor would he desist till he was assured of the safety of all those who were placed in the most perilous situation.

RECORDER'S REPORT.—On Wednesday the Recorder made his Report to the REGENT of the prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, convicted in April Session, when Joseph Davey and George Chapman, alias Claxton, for forgery, were ordered for execution on Tuesday next. The others were respited during pleasure.

On Monday last, at Brighton, a brutal fellow, drunk with liquor and passion, after a dispute with his wife at the wholesale fishmarket, suddenly seized his own child, about two years old, from her arms, rushed into the sea with it, breast high, and then, horrible to relate, cast the innocent babe from him. The shrieks of the mother were answered by an assault upon her person, and an attempt to force her into the water by the object of her terror. The timely interposition of the crowd there, principally fishermen, however preserved both mother and child from perishing.

The Glasgow Chronicle contains a long article, in which the Editor contends that the "Tales of My Landlady" are written by Mrs. GRANT, of Laggan, author of "Superstitions of the Highlanders," &c. He gives many Extracts from Mrs. GRANT's writings in corroboration of his opinion, and finally says, "Mr. SCOTT emphatically disowned them; in the hearing of an eminent Freeholder in this county, to the PRINCE REGENT at the Levee, and has since published the same disavowal in the Edinburgh Annual Register. It is understood that Mr. SCOTT, in order to keep more secure the Author's secret, conducted the negotiations with the booksellers."—The Editor, however, adds, that Mrs. GRANT has authorized a friend "to refute the very absurd and unfounded assertion of her being the author."

FURIOUS DRIVING.

A reader of the Examiner trusts that the Editor of that paper will not fail to notice, in his next publication, the very melancholy accident which occurred in the King's Road on Wednesday in the last week, occasioned by the furious and careless driving of a certain young Nobleman (Lord Charles Spencer Churchill), by which two persons were much hurt, and a female hurried suddenly into eternity.

The evidence given before the Coroner having fully proved that this accident was caused entirely by the misconduct of this Nobleman, (a son of the Duke of Marlborough), it was with the utmost disgust that the writer read a paragraph in the Morning Post of yesterday, which, with reference to some observations on this case, which have appeared in the Morning Chronicle and Times, states; that they are desired from authority to say, that those observations are infamous and calumnious falsehoods, and that steps are taken to punish the author, &c. &c. Now, as the evidence taken on oath bears out the remarks made in these papers, it cannot but be considered as an impudent attempt of the authority to stifle inquiry in this melancholy case.

The writer begs to call the Editor's attention to the subject, feeling assured that the conduct of those patri- cians, who, to attract the attention of pedestrians, exercise their talent as coachmen, to the imminent peril of the more prudent but humble part of the community, deserves public reprobation.

WORKHOUSE DISCIPLINE.

MR. EXAMINER.—An aged man and his wife, who had passed upwards of forty years in each other's society, and, by honest industry, had brought up a family, and who had lived 35 years in the Parish of St. Mary-le-bone, without ever having been a burthen on it, were reduced to the necessity of applying for assistance from the Board, and were received into the house,—not as into an asylum for the support of worn-out nature in the struggle of 50 years labour, but as into a Penitentiary, where crime was to be expiated by discipline and penance, and the last moments of existence embittered by unavailing complaint. Will it be credited, that this aged pair cannot hold a moment's conversation together, from month to month? That they are not permitted to share with each other the little bounty a friend might give to lessen the hardship of a Parish-house allowance? That the hand of death might be on the one, and the other a stranger to the visitation? The last comfort of expiring life, the proof of a pure affection in the sympathy of so dear a connection, is denied to them! Surely it would be no unreasonable indulgence, if such persons were permitted, once or twice a week, to exchange a few friendly sentences, and to be assured of each other's health;—such a communion would hazard little injury to any, and offer no powerful temptation to the poor to be idle or extravagant. Wretched policy! but economy is the pretended motive, and Workhouses must have no temptations. No; it is not economy; it cannot be to lighten the burthen of taxation on the Parishioners, to deny the poor the opportunity of seeking for employ by occasional liberty to go out. The poor man, identified in this case, is not entirely past labour; in the spring and summer months he is capable of working at his business, and could find employ; but the penalty of the log, or three months exclusion, awaits the criminal who shall offend against the regulation, and stay beyond his hour, whatever the motive, or however powerful the inducement.

These harsh regulations have nothing to do with the burthen of maintaining the poor; they emanate from hearts incapable of sympathy for distress; they are the offspring of a bad education, the union of ignorance and power; sudden elevation to worldly importance, frequently the effects of low cunning and an entire forgetfulness of the past. Men of this description will be haughty, unfeeling, and oppressive; and such men are too frequently entrusted with the concerns of a parish.

We ask these rulers, why they search the poor when they are about to quit the house, and if they have a bit of the parish bread, they are sent back, and punished with loss of the liberty of going out for a month? Is it from fear that those who pay to support the poor shall know and complain of its quality, and say their dogs are better fed? Why do you deny their weakened bodies the comfort of taking in with them a better loaf, which a friend might give? Do you fear they will become dainty, and complain of your flinty cheese, rare food for toothless gums and palsied jaws? Never fear: a winter's seasoning under your management will root out pride, and quiet the turbulent spirit, if ever they had one. "They shall forget in excess of sorrow" they ever looked on better days, or been where bells had knolled to church, or ever sat at any good man's feast, or felt the power of gentle pity. You can mar the better feelings of our nature; and our wonder ceases that the streets should find a sweeper at every corner, and that the last refuge of misery should be the Workhouse.

A PARISHIONER.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

The Royal yacht arrived on Monday evening at Dover, from Calais, with the Duke of CAMBRIDGE and his bride, the Princess of HESSE. Their Royal Highnesses reached London on Tuesday. They had a rough passage, and the Duchess was much indisposed. They arrived at Cambridge-house a little before six, and were received with acclamations by a large assemblage of spectators. The Landgrave of HESSE-CASSEL (the father of the Duchess) arrived at the same time, and was accommodated with a neighbouring house in South Audley-street. The Duchess (according to the papers) appears to be about 22 or 23 years of age, five feet six or seven inches in height, and of a most elegant figure; her countenance rather pale, but prepossessing, with dark eyes and hair. She was dressed in white, with a purple pelisse and scarf, and a small straw bonnet with white ostrich feathers. Her tout ensemble was highly interesting. The father of the Duchess is a venerable old gentleman, about 70, with a countenance the very picture of good nature, and resembles much our late visitor, PLATOFF: he was heard to say at Dover, "This is the proudest day of my life."

A little before two o'clock, on Wednesday, the Duke and Duchess arrived at the Queen's Palace, and the Duke introduced his Bride to her MAJESTY, who received her daughter-in-law with great affection. The Duke and Duchess remained with the QUEEN till near five o'clock, when they went to Carlton-house, where they remained about half an hour. On their return through Piccadilly, their carriage had nearly broken down, by the dropping out of a screw belonging to one of the wheels. The Duke and Duchess got out, and accepted the offer of a gentleman's carriage which was passing, in which they were conveyed to Cambridge-house.

REVIEW.—Tuesday being the day appointed for the Grand Military Review to take place upon Hounslow-heath, the PRINCE REGENT,—"the best Cavalry-Officer in Europe,"—arrived at Hounslow shortly after eleven, by which time the troops were in complete arrangement for the inspection of the Prince of HESSE-HOMBOURG, and the Duke of YORK. The line extended nearly a mile. The REGENT mounted a charger, and proceeded to the ground, attended by an immense number of Officers. About 30,000 persons had assembled. The carriages were three and four deep for nearly a mile. A little before twelve o'clock the troops were ordered into the line, and the bands struck up "God save the King." The PRINCE REGENT, Prince Hombourg, and the Commander-in-Chief, with their retinue, then rode down the line, and having gone all through, returned up the middle, the bands playing martial airs. On their return, the troops went through a variety of evolutions, with much precision, till half past two. A little before three o'clock the whole marched off the ground, and shortly afterwards the REGENT and his party also left. The road to town was completely choked with carriages, and the dust was at intervals so dense, that, had not the greatest caution been observed, much mischief must have arisen. No accident of any serious description occurred.

TRIAL OF MR. WAKEFIELD FOR MURDER.

[The Chester paper, by some accident, did not reach us, which contained the Trial of Mr. Wakefield at the late Assizes there; we have had since an account put into our hands, and as the case is a singular one, and has caused much talk, we give from it the following particulars:—]

CHESTER, APRIL 3.—John Wakefield, gentleman, of Winnington, was put to the bar, charged with the wilful murder of Richard Maddock, by stabbing him with a dagger.—It appeared that Mr. Wakefield resided at Winnington, near Northwich, with two female servants, Elizabeth Woodward and Martha Bradbury. Elizabeth Woodward was courted by the deceased, which displeased Mr. Wakefield, who remonstrated with the girl. He told her, that if he saw the deceased about the house, he would shoot him; and he wished her to go with him to London, where, he said, he would keep her like a lady. The girl however continued her connexion with Maddock, and having gone to the wake, she was returning home at 11 at night, escorted by him, when Mr. Wakefield rushed out of the plantation near the house with a dagger in his hand, and collared the deceased, when a struggle took place, and Maddock fell down. When he got up, Mr. Wakefield insisted on his going with him to the house, which Maddock refused, but at length consented to go with him to the town. He had then the dagger in his hand, which he held to the deceased's breast, saying, "If you molest, I'll stab you." Maddock said, "don't trouble me, Mr. Wakefield." The girl said, that after this, Maddock got loose and ran away, followed by Mr. Wakefield, when she ran home as fast as she could. In about five minutes her master came home, and said to her, "what should you have thought, if I had stabbed him?"—She replied, "you durst not do it; he was not come to do you any harm."—The family then went to bed; but they were roused at half-past one, by a mob, who surrounded the house, making a great clamour for the appearance of Mr. Wakefield, who would not for some time surrender himself, but knocked two men off the ladder, who had mounted to his bed-chamber window. The body of Maddock had been found about 120 yards from the house, cold and lifeless; and medical men proved that he had been stabbed to the heart with a three-cornered instrument.—Mr. Wakefield, in his defence, said, that on the evening in question (the 8th of September), hearing voices and footsteps on the grounds, he took a sword-stick and sallied out, imagining that thieves were on the premises. The night was dark. Getting to the gate as the persons were coming up, he seized the man by the collar, insisting that he should go with him to the house, to see who he was. He resisted, struck him several times, and twisted his neckcloth about his throat almost to suffocation, so that he cried out for help. The man then disengaged himself and disappeared. Mr. Wakefield concluded by solemnly declaring, that he never went beyond the gate, and that he returned home to bed utterly unconscious that the man had suffered more than himself.—A witness declared, that the deceased had been seen at the wake in the afternoon intoxicated, and offering to fight any body.—Several of the clergy and gentry gave Mr. Wakefield a high character for humanity, and an instance was stated of his having rescued a poor boy from a brine pit at the hazard of his own life.—The CHIEF-JUSTICE (Mr. Serjeant Best), in his charge to the Jury, after laying down the law in such cases, noticed the proposal of the prisoner to Elizabeth Woodward—his apparent jealousy—his illegally attempting to force the deceased into his house—and particularly the prisoner's previous threat and subsequent question when he returned home, "What should you have thought, if I had stabbed him?"—He alluded, on the other hand, to the prisoner's calling out for the Constable during the scuffle, which, he said, was certainly not the act of a man about to commit a murder. There was no evidence, he observed, to show that the deceased had struck the Prisoner, as the latter alleged; he returned home without any marks of violence, and made no complaint of the kind. If the Prisoner, under the influence of jealousy, gave the wound which caused the deceased's death, it was clearly murder. There could not be a question, that the deceased received his death in the struggle near the gate. If, however, no jealousy existed at the time, the crime was manslaughter. It was remarkable that the dagger had never been found, and the Prisoner and deceased had not met on equal terms, as the former was armed. The Chief Justice concluded his charge by recommending the Jury to be cautious in their decision.—The Jury retired for twelve minutes, and then returned their verdict, “we find him Guilty—of Manslaughter.”—The Foreman, in returning their verdict, made such a pause after the word Guilty, that it was immediately buzzed about that Mr. Wakefield had been found guilty of Murder, and the false intelligence rapidly spread over the country.—He was sentenced to six months imprisonment.—After the sentence, Mr. Wakefield again solemnly asserted, that he had not the least knowledge of the deceased's death!—He was much agitated, and wept.—The trial excited great interest, and is still, it seems, much talked of.—Elizabeth Woodward is described in the account before us, as a good-looking, smart girl, about 20. Martha Bradbury, her fellow-servant, is also said to be a remarkably handsome woman, with a delicately fair complexion. They both gave their evidence with great propriety. The deceased was a flatman on board the Northwich flats, about 21 years of age, of low stature, but active and powerful.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

NONE of our Portrait Painters are yet, we think, on a par with Messrs. PHILLIPS and JACKSON in the tinting of the skin. For this, with their look of life, we admire Mr. PHILLIPS's Earl Spencer, Mrs. W. Russel, Mrs. Colonel Grant, &c. and Mr. JACKSON's Mr. Carter, 400, &c.; and would have made a bow of respect to Lord Grosvenor, 20, for his parliamentary wisdom and integrity, were we not admonished by the frames that they were but painted resemblances. Mr. SNEY never before painted such good portraits as 10, Mr. Sharpe—55, Bishop of Norwich—96, Earl of Albemarle, &c. though there still sticks by him a degree of his prettiness of surface. His Mrs. General Reynolds, though in some respects good, looks like a lady who indulges an appetite for chalk. They are, in the main, admirable likenesses. Mr. OWEN paints elderly persons capitably, as is plain from 147. The Hon. H. Bagot, 170, is painted with a fervor of pencil and bold, boyish character, sitting on a dog. The grey colours prevail in beautiful harmony. We like his fleshy tints much better than formerly, though they are still somewhat too cold. Mr. OWEN's style is better for men than women; and Sir W. BEECHER's, for the lovelier sex. The mild and luxuriantly melting rainbow is one of the favourite standards of Sir WILLIAM's style of colour.—and what a rich and fascinating one it is! His Portraits always tell us, with Lord Chesterfield, of “the Graces, the Graces;” as in 62, Duchess of Gloucester, &c., and 153, Mrs. Coultts, where beams a gold and silver radiance of colour, and the brighter radiance of that Lady's beneficent feelings. The Lord Montgomerie, by Mr. RAEBURN, has a charming infantine grace, and, like all his Portraits, a highly agreeable style, with colouring peculiar to himself. But as we have never yet seen or heard of green skies, we confess that we should still more admire the harmony of his colour without those very and rather too original appendages. Mrs. Barker, by Mr. DAVIS, has much grace, and a soft and bright power of colour. A Boy's Head, W. DAVISON, has good tinting. Mr. HOWARD's Portraits of The Misses Carlisle are playful and pleasing, and without his former chalky colour. Mr. DAVIS's are no very usual personages in portraiture, for they are strictly in look with the objects they imitate. What he intends to be soldiers are, like his Blucher, really soldiers; what gentlemen, really gentlemen,—not fine gentlemen, that is, not merely empty-headed, senseless loungers in carriages and at the Opera, but thinking beings, unassuming, inartificial, interesting. Such is his Sir J. Heard, which has neatness and at the same time plenitude of pencil. It has an extraordinary richness of colour and fullness of effect, and is one of the best Portraits in the Exhibition.

The Mouth of the Tyne is Mr. CALLCOTT's masterpiece. Wind, water, ships, are here in motion. A floating mass, formed by two contiguous vessels, with their involved tight cordage and broad sails, moves majestically towards us, rippling the dividing water; the sun shines joyously; the brawny sailors make the long-boat skim airily; the clouds broken into a silver lacing, on a blue ground, shew a rich livery of Nature; the long line of ships, boats, distant buildings, and cliffs, stretch grandly across the canvas, and our lungs almost feel as with an expansion from fresh sea air and a bright marine scene just opened upon us. This indeed is one of those pictures, of which, when we have got to the door thinking to leave the room, we say,—“We must have another look at that.” So it is with those golden works from the Goleconda of Painting, TURNER's Dart and COLLINS's Rouen Diligence, setting off at night. They excite,—and it is the truest test of their high merit,—the same kind of sensations that their real prototypes do in a hot sunshine at mid-day, and a calm moon-light at midnight; during the preparatory bustle of a stage-coach departing from the brightly lamp-lighted door of an inn. We never saw a picture in more genuine costume; it is essentially French. The heavy diligence, the Gentleman hastening with his lap-dog, with one boot on, and followed by his wife carrying the other; the Coachman pulling out an interloper from the inside, the pretty Girl in a handkerchief head-dress taking a letter, &c. &c. and all in their native eagerness of manner, place us at once before a French inn and among French people. Our imaginations are deliciously excited by the warmth, the red and yellow intensity before us, and our heart-strings are felicitously touched by the hand of genius with a kindly effect, with home and travel-induced feelings, with amatory and friendly impressions.

PUBLICATIONS OF ART.

Professing and feeling a sincere admiration of the elegant Arts, an apology, arising from the influx of temporary and other subjects, is due from us for the arrears we are in of notices of several very beautiful print-adorned publications, and of additional Medals, which Mr. MURRE has added since our former notice, making 26 of the 40 up to which the Series will be carried. The following are the additional ones:—1. Bust of Lord Wellington, by DONNADIO. Reverse—Battle of Talavera; a figure of Victory between the British Lion and French Eagle.—2. Head of Wellington. Reverse—Passage of the Douro; a rich Reverse, and engraved with finished and full relief by DEBOIS.—3. Bust of Wellington. Reverse—The Goddess of Victorious War, armed with British lightning, and in a chariot, riding over the prostrated power of Napoleon. Though the design is here on the whole good, the execution is coarse.—4. Head of the Regent, by MILLS. Reverse—England giving Peace to the World, well engraved by DUROIS.—5. The English Army on the Scheldt, boldly and beautifully sculptured as a River God, with Troops in a Ship behind. The Obverse to this, by DECAUNIS, is certainly one of the most masterly in Europe. It is a representation of the Netherlands. A Bull, their emblem, occupies the greater part of the face of the Medal, drawn with a strength, solidity, and exactness, unsurpassed, while the British standard and Flemish town behind have a surprisingly minute neatness.—6. Napoleon at St. Helena. He is in a pensive position—

“Revolving in his altered mind the various turns of fate.”

History, in a sympathetic attitude, is soliciting him to record his actions, already emblazoned by fame, who is also introduced. A ship and the rock he sits on shew his solitary situation, and the nautical power that confines him in it. This is feebly executed; but Mr. MILLS has redeemed his credit in that Reverse, where a young warrior, in a Roman habit, having just mounted the wall of St.

Sebastian, is exultingly holding up a mural crown. The waves are indifferently executed, but the figure, in its minute precision and elegance, approximates nearer to French and Italian talent than any Reverse yet executed in England since Simon's time. The Obverse to it, a head of Lord Lyndoch, is one of the finest in this noble Series, and enhances the celebrity of Mr. WEBB. It is from a most beautiful wax model by the inimitable ROUW.—7. Head of Britannia, finely engraved by GERRARD, has for its Reverse The Repose of Hercules, sculptured with anatomical beauty by DROZ. He is quietly standing on an eagle, in allusion to the peaceful condition of Europe, now that Napoleon is fallen. Is there no unintentional double meaning here, for he firmly grasps his club, notwithstanding his peace and repose? Were the Series carried no further than this circumstance, for it would make a good finishing-place, it would still be a grand Series, such as never yet has appeared in England, and what ought to have reflected honour on the Government, rather than on an individual. But it is an historical fact, that almost every species of good,—moral, intellectual, and political, for centuries past, has originated, not with the governing power, but with individuals.

Our readers may recollect that some time since we recommended to their patronage the classical Outlines, engraved by Mr. MOSES from Antique Vases, Paterns, &c. As an accompanying work to this, we recommend still more a volume of Outlines engraved by the same able hand on 36 plates, and on a better, because on a larger scale, with forceful fidelity, from Select Greek and Roman Antiquities, from Vases, Gems, and other subjects of the choicest workmanship, and superior we think to any thing of the sort yet executed in England.

The First part of the Peak Scenery, or Excursions in Derbyshire, made chiefly for the purpose of picturesque Observations, illustrated with Engravings by Messrs. W. B. and G. COOKE, from Drawings by F. L. CHANTREY, Esq. R.A.—With what painter-like effects our admirable Sculptor must have handled his pencil, and we scarcely need add, with what a painter-like, yet finished style, the popular Engravers have used their etching tools and gravers; how every nice touch tells, and recalls the pleasing impressions made on our memories by lovely Nature, as she looks in her leafy or sunny or mountainous or valley-enclosed retirements and village aspects. With what a crumblingly stony texture they have touched off the old Crosses,—and with what umbrageous exactness the trees! The description of the Excursions is printed with an elegance worthy of these Engravings, and of the descriptions by Mr. RHODES. His motto is suitable to the feelings with which he describes the Excursions:—

"Ah! who can look on Nature's face
And feel unholy passions move?—
Her forms of Majesty and Grace
I cannot chuse but love."

MONTGOMERY.

He has indeed given such reality to the scenes he describes,—his feelings are so kindled at the glorious lamp of day, and the objects it shines upon, that the imagination must be inert indeed that does not in consequence warm. An Artist might make beautiful pictures from his descriptions. We hope that the impediments which he seems to anticipate may not arise, to prevent his proceeding as he intends with the publication of successive parts of his Excursions.

Sketches of Characters, consisting of whole-length Portraits, with Picturesque or Topographical Back-grounds; to which are added, Biographical and Historical Notices; and dedicated to D. Turner, Esq. by W. J. WHITE, is a work of great originality. The characters are those of the lowest life, in morals as well as condition. To each topographical narrative and didactic sketch is annexed a Portrait, engraved much in the manner of DUPLESSI BER-TEAUX and CALLOT, and morally useful, inasmuch as they hold up vice to merited execration, not only in the meanest classes of society, but, by a strong analogy, the vulgar in morals and intellect, from the cruel cockfighter, up to that climax of public evil, that traitor to the Constitution, the Parliamentary seat-seller among Ministers. They are both in a style worthy of each other, closely characteristic from the life, and additionally recommended by the modest introduction and dedication of the Artist, who is also the Author. We shall not fail duly to notice this and the forementioned beautiful works as they advance.

New Edition of Puckle's Club.—This work consists of ethical dialogues between a father and son, respecting twenty-four different characters in a Club, whose members are examples of as many vices. It is a quaint, sententious, and not uninteresting though coarse condensation of all the common place arguments against every species of vice, mixed with something of satirical humour, and with short biographical incidents and sayings, and some slavish political sentiments. We mention it for the purpose of introducing to the reader's patronage the Designs of the Characters, from Mr. THURSTON's well known pencil, engraved in the most finished style, we think, that the Art of Wood-Cut Engraving can reach; in fifty Head and Tail-pieces, by those admirable Artists, Messrs. BRANSTON, HUGHES, HARVEY, NESBIT, THOMPSON, THURSTON, and Miss BYFIELD. They render the publication as great a curiosity in this branch of Engraving, as the printing of it, from the careful hand of Mr. J. JOHNSON, does every page of it, in neat, clear, full, and elegant Typo graphy.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

ON THE CARTOON OF THE BEAUTIFUL GATE.

What a Cartoon this is! How full of loveliness and gentleness, and compassion and Christian virtues! The first figures which arrest every body in it are St. Peter, St. John, and the beggar.—"Gold and silver have I none," said St. Peter, but what I have I give thee, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk; and he took him by the right hand and lifted him up, and immediately his feet and ancles received strength, and he, leaping up,* stood, and entered the temple, leaping and walking and praising God."

The poor eager beggar looks up to St. Peter with an expression of affecting and intense anxiety, and St. Peter regards the beggar in return, as if wishing to do all he can for him, and trusting that what he can do will be effectual. St. John, the mild and heavenly St. John, his head a little on one side, has an air of compassionate sympathy quite touching: his hand is badly drawn, and too big, not at all in character with his divine head. The style of drapery and composition of lines in these three figures are as fine as possible, now straight, then concave, then crossing hands, arms, head, and feet, which are all brought behind and before each other in that inextricable intricacy so difficult to manage, and so exquisite in effect when well managed. Any man may learn the whole principles of composition by studying deeply this group. The bare-poled short haired head of St. Peter, the sleek, tender, soft head of St. John, and the bald shaggy deformity of the beggar, are fine contrasts. Opposite to St. Peter is a man leaning on a crutch, looking earnestly at him, and seeming to wait the result: the next head, with a bandage round the forehead, is regarding the poor eager beggar with compassion: The difference with which RAFFAELLE has expressed the same feeling of sympathy in St. John, and this man with a bandage round his head, is a proof of his intense power in discriminating character. The part of a face of another figure, immediately behind, who is too far to see any thing, expresses rapturous joy, as if he heard what St. Peter said. To the right is another poor cripple crawling over in hopes of assistance. Small foreheads and large features give an unintellectual look to both. It has been asked if this beggar was at all requisite. As a bit of human nature it is so. May there not have been more cripples than one? In composition he breaks the perpendicularity of the upright figures, and by his rough animal coarseness, he contrasts and sets off finely the beautiful and tender mother with her infant. The figure in the corner with a cap lifts his hands as if in pitying astonishment; another behind seems envious or doubtfully watching with his finger in his mouth; some in the distance are talking; on the left are two heads with sympathetic feeling; and a naked boy, who is also essential to the composition, and repeats the line of the beggar, who is crawling in. A man and woman in the distance are going solemnly in, and a tender beautiful creature, holding a lovely boy in one hand and a basket in the other, finish the composition of figures. The columns, with their variety of boys darting about among vine branches in all the actions of infancy, now catching a butterfly, now standing on tiptoe for a bird, now pulling a branch, now shewing backs, then heads, in all their playful windings, complete the whole arrangement of this lovely Cartoon. It affects one like a pathetic air of music, or a delightful dream.

Never was such a creature painted as that on the left, carrying on her head fruit, flowers, and doves, for an offering, in a white wicker basket over-brimm'd With April's tender younglings, and holding a beautiful boy, who suspends two doves over his shoulder, which undulate their little heads to suit his motion. She glides on with a lightness, as if she could tread without bending the head of a cowslip: her head is turned over her shoulder, her lustrous eyes looking out, and her delicate breathing mouth half open, she seems as if she had dropped from heaven on a May morning! The refinement of RAFFAELLE's women is not the result of education or rank, but the inherent attendant of modesty, sweetness, and beauty united. They have never characteristic marks of being at the head of any class; they are not Gonerils, Beatrices, or Cordelias; they are lovely women generally, and exhibit the combined points of attraction as a sex; they are tender, gentle, sweet, innocent, inclined to love, and they are intellectual; they possess what we all sympathize with, because their qualities are those which render a woman delightful. But he never seems to distinguish them as nature often distinguishes them; they never look as if they could be daring or vicious, artfully frank or insidiously timid; wittily trifling or coquettishly fond. RAFFAELLE never condescended to represent vice; his mind was too much the mind of an angel to bear the sting attendant on its conception. RAFFAELLE's women have general qualities, but not particular distinctive marks of character, the result of habit or organization. All his women look, even if evil should come into their minds, (which is a question) as it would pass out, unimproved and unsanctioned from the very artlessness of their simplicity.

If there be any relation of an event that bears truth on the face of it, it is the relation of this miracle: the Apostles were not what are called men of genius; they did not picture to themselves, like SHAKESPEARE and HOMER, and

RAFFAELLE, scenes to call forth human passions, and then by their powers of imagination, put themselves into every character affected, and make each do, or say, or feel, as such characters in such situations would do; and say, and feel, excited by such situations:—no,—they were simple men, inspired for a great purpose: they simply relate what they simply saw; and when any deep feelings of Nature appear in their relation, it is because such feelings were developed before their eyes, and they relate them, as it were, unconscious of their identity. Let us suppose new limbs, with all their muscles, and veins, and nerves, and bones, and arteries, given at once to a being whose will had never before directed them,—who had never tottered with them in infancy, put them out with smiling awkwardness,—used them by degrees to bear the body,—to carry it forwards or backwards,—to leap with it, or kneel with it, or to all those various uses to which limbs are gradually brought in obeying the will. (Children are often six weeks learning to see. What we do in maturity with such intuitive rapidity and ease, was at first laborious and painful.) Let us suppose limbs given all at once to a mature being, whose will had never directed their muscles—what would naturally be the physical effect?—Why, that muscles not being used to be controuled by the will, would instantly contract violently; and the man must leap:—“and he leaped out and stood,” “and he entered the temple leaping and walking, and praising God!” And then, in the fulness of his soul, he praised God! And knowing how long he had sat for years at the gate, a burden,—a heavy, impotent burden,—how natural that, after the first ebullition of joy, consciousness of what he had been, should make his heart sink; and that fearing his recovery was but a sudden blaze of happiness to be again obscured, his strength should become affected by his nervous apprehension,—and fearing that his powers would fail as his benefactors left him, “the lame man held* Peter and John,” dreading to part with them, in horror at being left alone. Oh ye, who have ever lost the use for a time of any faculty or sense, and know the agonizing joy at the first recovery of its powers, and the mistrusting doubt that its sensation of recovery must be a dream!—ye who have been blind, and remember when ye first saw light glimmer through the dreary darkness, and then feared to open your eyes again, lest your rapturous anticipation should prove delusive;—ye who recall the slow, cautious, trembling terror, with which you tried your powers of vision before you burst forth in fullness of gratitude to God, bear testimony to the truth, the intense truth of nature, here simply told. Shakspeare could not have felt more truly how a human being in such a situation would have felt and acted, than the Apostles have told how he did feel and act. He who refuses to believe this relation, must shut his heart and his conviction to all human testimony, and take nothing from the relation of others that exists on the face of the earth.

“Gaunt, wither'd, sapless, feeble, cramp'd, and lame,”

Upon the whole, this Cartoon always gives one greater delight than all the rest; it is truly the emanation of a divine mind.

SIR F. BURDETT'S ELECTION.

The eleventh Anniversary of the Friends to the Purity of Election was celebrated at the Crown and Anchor on the 23d. Sir F. Burdett, Bart. in the Chair. At half-past five o'clock the Chairman, accompanied by Lord Cochrane, the Hon. Douglas Kinnaird, Sir R. Wilson, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Walker, Mr. Wooler, Mr. Storch, Mr. Wishart, &c. entered the room, amidst loud and continued plaudits. After the cloth had been removed, the Hon.

Chairman gave "The people, the only source of legitimate power."—(Loud applause.)—The next toast was, "The King and Constitution, and a speedy recovery of both." Tune, "Rule Britannia." Toast, "May a Reform in Parliament enable the people of England to follow the example of the citizens of Westminster, by electing their own representative."

Mr. STURCH observed, this was the eleventh anniversary of the triumph of Westminster, and the purity of election.—(Applause.)—They elected the noble and honourable representative at no expense to himself, in 1807, because they believed he would be a faithful representative of their rights, and from that day down to the present moment they had had no occasion to repent of what they had done.—(Loud applause.)—The electors of Westminster never could be deprived of one gratifying recollection—of having set an example, eleven years ago, which, if it had been followed by the constituents of other counties, would have averted all the evils under which the people laboured, and have saved the country.—(Continued applause.)—The worthy gentleman concluded by proposing "Westminster's pride and England's glory, Sir Francis Burdett."—(The room resounded for several minutes with acclamations.)

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT attempted to address the meeting, but was overwhelmed with the most vociferous plaudits. After a lapse of several minutes, silence was obtained. It was, he observed, a matter of great satisfaction to a person standing in his situation to feel conscious that he had done all in his power for the welfare of his fellow-citizens; and if any thing could enhance that satisfaction, it was the continued approbation he had received from them. He had not, however, the vanity to aspire to all that his friend Mr. Sturch had attributed to him; but he felt a pride in the honour he experienced by representing so independent a set of men—the only set of electors who had given proper effect to their independence, by returning their members in that constitutional manner they had done; for he believed that, with the exception of the seats held by his noble colleague and himself, there were none held constitutionally in the Commons' House.—(Loud applause.)—He regretted that he had not the honour of being surrounded by those distinguished gentlemen who had on former occasions been present. For the absence of one of them, who had at heart the great cause of Reform—Mr. Fawkes of Yorkshire (applause)—he could account. For reasons highly obvious, he had declined coming forward to serve as a member in Parliament, because he knew that the system of representation was so corrupt, that nothing but mischief, immorality, and wickedness, emanated from it; and that nothing but mischief could arise from an honest man holding so bad an office. Hence he considered his attendance, either in the House or there, calculated only to mislead the public; and it was for that reason only, that his friend had declined being present. He (Sir Francis) confessed that it was impossible he could do any good for his constituents, and he had no hesitation in saying he should be happy never to set his foot in the House again, unless a radical reform was to take place; for the wickedness and corruption practised against the people were sufficient to overwhelm them, and to have one or two members who would act constitutionally, out of 658, was like pouring one drop of fresh water into the sea with a view of diminishing its saltiness. The Hon. Baronet then took a review of the ancient constitution, and compared it with the present, and also called the attention of the meeting to the measure which had passed in that House, called the Alien Act. All their efforts in Parliament would be useless, unless the people could have that share in the legislation which they ought to have; for that as much belonged to the people as the Crown did to the King.—(Applause.)—The people's rights were inalienable. It had been said that the last year of the Parliament would be the best; and he begged the meeting to look to its character. He quoted Junius, who had observed, that "one year of repentance made but poor atonement for six years of iniquity."—(Applause.)—The interest of prince and people was the same; it was adverse to that principle of proprietorship which destroyed the authority of prince and people. He had been called a Jacobin. He had no objection to the name if they wished to give it him, for he had rather see the whole power in the Crown than in an abandoned oligarchy above the Crown. He spoke from deliberate consideration; for it was the interest of a monarch to act in conformity with the wishes of his people. A King might be a good, a wise, a great man; but a borough-monger faction must be odious, possessing all the qualities of a bloodsucker, except in this respect—that a bloodsucker would in time fall off; a borough-monger never would.—(Loud applause.)—The mind of the country was so convinced of the error of its Parliament, that a continuance of the abandoned plan could no longer be expected. The character of a true Englishman was what he most prized; and he trusted, while he made exertion to support the character, he should never want friends to support him.—(Great applause followed this speech.)

Mr. M'LAURIN proposed the health of Lord Cochrane, (three times three.)

Lord COCHRANE said, it was delightful, after the vain experiments of every year in Parliament, to meet his fellow-citizens once annually. His Lordship here stated, that he intended to endeavour to obliterate from his mind many painful objects by absenting himself, and he trusted that, on his return, a more favourable prospect would present itself. His Lordship alluded to certain machinations against himself, and stated that they were of the vilest kind, and that the public, when they heard them, would be horror struck. This would probably be the last time, for 18 months, he should have the honour of addressing the meeting. Nothing, he believed, but fear could influence Ministers to do as they ought.—(Applause.)

Song, "Adieu my native land." Toasts, "The cause of freedom all over the world, and may the exertions for freedom now making in South America be ultimately crowned with success."—"Major Cartwright, the venerable father of Parliamentary Reform."

The Major wished the company what was better than health, or life itself—liberty.—(Applause.)—He trusted that the time of the establishment of liberty was near at hand. Last year a million of persons had petitioned for Reform. Petitions innumerable were now flowing in, and Sir F. Burdett had, the other night, presented no less than two hundred and seventy-three. It was strange that a few despicable fellows should trample upon millions; but the time was coming when borough-mongers would tremble and be compelled to feel like human creatures. The Major then ridiculed the conduct of what were called moderate reformers, and declared that if a dozen such persons as the present representatives of Westminster were in the House of Commons, the country might expect a thorough reform in Parliament.—(Applause.)

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT read a letter from Lord Sefton, excusing himself from attending, in consequence of ill health; and declaring that nothing but ill health would have prevented him from doing so.—(Applause.)—Lord Sefton's health was drunk with enthusiasm.—The worthy Baronet also read an apology from Sir Gilbert Heathcote.

Sir F. BURDETT then gave, "Ireland, and destruction to all religious intolerance." He said thus much to do justice to them, and to promote the principle of generating good will amongst the inhabitants in every part of the United Kingdom.—Continued applause.—"Erin go brach."

"The Hon. Douglas Kinnaird, and success to the rising spirit of Reform in Scotland."

Mr. KINNAIRD returned his acknowledgments.

The health of Mr. Alderman Goodbehere was next given; after which the worthy Alderman expressed his gratitude for the honour done him in drinking his health; coupled with the prosperity of the city of London.

Previously to any other health being given, Mr. Bristol Hunt appeared on the table, and was received with violent clamour from all parts of the room. This continued for some time, when Mr. Hunt retired, accompanied by clamours from every part of the meeting.

Sir F. BURDETT said, that Mr. Hunt had retired, in order not to interrupt the regular series of toasts, and would address the meeting afterwards, when the attention of the meeting would, no doubt, be given to him. The Hon. Baronet then gave the health of Sir Robert Wilson.—(Great applause.)

In returning thanks, Sir ROBERT WILSON said he had received such assurances of support, that he considered his success in standing for the representation of the Borough no longer problematical.

Mr. HUNT again came forward. He was hissed from the table; but Sir Francis Burdett having requested in the most urgent manner that he should be heard, he again got upon the table; he was obliged to retire a third time, amidst groanings and hissings.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT stated to the meeting, that if the ordinary course of proceeding was not adhered to, he should feel it his duty to leave the chair.

Mr. HUNT, after a most powerful opposition, was permitted to say, that, in the absence of Lord Cochrane, he should offer himself a candidate to represent the electors of Westminster in Parliament.

The meeting did not break up till a late hour.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Monday, May 25.

THE KING v. THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

Last Term, Mr. BROUGHAM obtained a rule nisi calling upon the Bank to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to proceed to divide among all the members of the corporation for the time being, such profits as have arisen to the said Corporation, and have not been so divided up to the 19th of March last, excepting the sums paid for the charges of managing the business of the said Corporation.

Sir ARTHUR PIGGOTT this day showed cause against the rule, and after Mr. BROUGHAM had been heard in reply,

Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, there are several objections to granting the mandamus at present: first, notice should be given in due time before a dividend is to be made—no such notice has been given; next, what is now wished ought to have been required at a general court, and refused—it has not been required. There are a great many other objections arising on the case, and this Court would certainly not construe the words too strictly, since the Governor and Directors must retain in their hands no small sum for the management of the very extensive concerns of the company.—Rule discharged.

Thursday, May 28.

THE KING v. ARTHUR THURLEWOOD.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the judgment of the Court upon the defendant.

Being called upon by the Court, the Defendant said—

"My Lords,—After the trial I have had, replete with the most extraordinary circumstances—a trial without evidence, and no time or opportunity allowed me to obtain witnesses, I cannot but consider it a duty I owe to the Public, as well as myself, to protest against any sentence being passed upon me. Further, my Lords, I have been incarcerated nearly 17 weeks, and most of that time in a bad state of health. I must observe that Lord Sidmouth declared he had no wish to pursue me vindictively, that he only sought his own personal safety. He is perfectly safe from me. I never entertained a secret malice against him; and I assure you, I should have left him to himself on his declining the proposal made to him."

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then addressed a few observations to the Court. The object of Lord Sidmouth was not merely personal but official, for the protection not of himself only, but of all future Secretaries of State.

Their Lordships consulted for some minutes, after which Mr. Justice BAYLEY passed sentence, which was that the defendant should be imprisoned in Horsham-gaol for 12 months, and at the end of his confinement, should give security to keep the peace, himself in 300*l.*, and two sureties in 150*l.* each.

BOARD OF EXCISE.

Wednesday, May 27.

REX v. SAMUEL HALLT.

The defendant Hallt, a grocer in New Compton-street, St. Giles's, was charged with having seven pounds of the imitation of coffee in his possession, &c.—Charles Henry Lord, an officer of the Excise, stated, that he and Spencer, an officer, went to the shop, and asked for an ounce of coffee. He examined the same, and found it was part coffee and part the imitation coffee, or what the defendant called vegetable powder, which is nothing more nor less than burnt beans and peas ground in a mill.

The Defendant said, that he did not know he was acting contrary to the excise laws by keeping "vegetable powder" in his possession; that he was obliged to sell the same at a low price, or he should lose his custom.

A Commissioner stated, that he could not be ignorant that he was acting illegally; that by selling such abominable stuff, he was injuring the health of the public; and the Board of Excise was determined to punish those found dealing in the illicit manner described with the utmost severity.

The defendant was convicted in the penalty of 50*l.*

Thursday, May 28.

REX v. FOX.

Mr. Edward Fox, grocer, Gray's-inn-lane, was charged with having a large quantity of sham coffee in his possession, and with selling the same for genuine coffee.

The Commissioners and the examining officer viewed the sham coffee seized, and it was declared to be part genuine coffee, and part beans and peas burnt and ground.

The Defendant said, that poor people wanted a low-priced article, and by mixing the vegetable powder and coffee together, he was able to sell it at three halfpence an ounce; he had sold it for years; he did not think he was committing a fraud; he did not sell it for genuine coffee.

COMMISSIONER.—Then you have been defrauding the public for many years, and injuring the revenue by your illicit practices: the poor have an equal right to be supplied with a genuine article as the rich. In my opinion it is a greater crime to serve the former than the latter with this infamous stuff.

REX v. BRADY.

The Defendant, Mr. Alexander Brady, grocer, Gray's-inn-lane, was charged with having in his possession 18 pounds of sham coffee, called vegetable powder, and with selling the same for genuine coffee.

One of the Commissioners tasted some of the 18 pounds produced by the officers, and declared that it was most infamous stuff, hot to the mouth, and unfit for human food.

Defendant.—Why, I have sold it for twenty years.

COMMISSIONER.—Then you have been for twenty years acting most dishonestly, defrauding the revenue, and the health of the poor must have suffered very much by taking such an unwholesome article. Your having dealt in the article so long aggravates your case; you have been for twenty years selling burnt beans, peas, and I know not what other articles, for genuine coffee. You are convicted in the penalty of 50*l.*

Charles Bowser, of Oxford-street, tea and coffee-dealer, was charged with a like offence, and upon the same evidence.

The defendant was convicted in the same penalty as the last.

[Stronuous efforts were made, privately, to prevent publicity being given to the above cases, especially on the part of the last-named defendant.]

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

IMITATION TEA.—On Monday, a tradesman, residing at the west-end of the town, sought advice how to proceed under the following circumstances:—For some time past, although he had tried teas of various qualities and prices, he found them all affected with an unpleasant smell and taste, and very injurious to his health. His family were always complaining of illness, and at one time his own bowels were severely contracted. Seeing a report of the proceedings in the case of Palmer and others, he was induced to examine the contents of his tea-pot, which he laid out to dry. When they were perfectly dry he could see that they were sloe or thorn leaves. He took them to three different chymists, who gave it as their decided opinion, that they were not genuine tea, and that an improper (probably poisonous) substance had been used in colouring them. The gentleman said, the object of his application was to lay a regular information against the grocer. Here he produced the leaves, and also a tin canister full of the tea. The magistrate and some other gentlemen present examined them, and were of opinion that they were sloe leaves.—The Magistrate said, that great praise was due to every individual who exposed, as far as they could, every circumstance connected with the adulteration of human food, but it was necessary information should be laid at the Excise Office, and they would search the premises. This the gentleman promised to do.

On Thursday, John Dennett was re-examined on a charge of attempting to murder Jane Rogers. The prisoner, who appears to be at least 70, trembled all over, and repeatedly asked after his daughter. Additional evidence was adduced.

The messenger brought down the surgeon's report, which stated that the patient was much better.

MAGISTRATE.—Prisoner, is there any thing you want to say?

Answer.—Nothing, Sir, but what I told you before, except that you will commit me to the same place, (the New Prison), for there is a gentleman comes there to pray to me, and may do my unfortunate soul some good. Do, Sir, commit me there, and I shall be much obliged to you.

MAGISTRATE.—You shall be committed there.

The prisoner thanked the magistrate, and was taken away, and ordered to be brought up next Thursday.

GUILDHALL.

On Friday, Robert Rigleyford, Proprietor of a large mercantile concern in Wood-street, Cheap-side, was charged with being a receiver of stolen property to the amount of 400*l.* and upwards.—Mr. Gatfield, dealer in Loughorns, chips, &c. in St. Paul's Church-yard, deposed, that for several months past he had been plundered of property to an enormous extent; and he had at length discovered that a man named Clayton, in his employ, was the depredator. This person had made a full confession of his guilt; and the witness had determined to admit him as an evidence against the receiver.—John Clayton said, he had for the last four months been in the habit of conveying large quantities of Leghorn, chip, and other articles, the property of his employer, to the warehouse of the prisoner, from whom he received about one-fourth of the value. The prisoner had in that time paid him upwards of 100*l*. He was perfectly aware that witness was in the service of Mr. Gatfield, and that the goods in question were brought from the premises of the latter.—The Magistrate ordered the prisoner to give bail, himself in 400*l*. and two sureties in 200*l*. each, and in default thereof committed him.

BATTON-GARDEN.

On Friday an information was heard at the suit of the Board of Excise, against Charles Willis, of Hornsey, charging him with having a large private soap manufactory at Hornsey, and unlawfully manufacturing of soap, without making an entry to the Board. It appeared, on the deposition of an officer of the Excise, that he and some fellow officers entered the premises, where there was not a living soul to be found; but, on searching, they found 21 cwt. of mottled soap; they also found all the necessary utensils for carrying on soap-making. Witness and his assistants seized upon the whole, and brought them away. The defendant not appearing to answer the charge, he was convicted in the mitigated penalty of 100*l*., and the forfeiture of the soap and utensils found on his premises.

LAMBETH-STREET-OFFICE.

On Thursday, Elizabeth Walkin, a young woman, was charged by Edward Walkin, her husband, with stabbing him. It appeared in evidence that the parties had only been married about a month, and were in the daily habit of quarrelling. On Tuesday evening words arose, which terminated in a quarrel, on which the prisoner seized a knife which lay on the table, rushed over towards him, and made a cut at his throat; and on lifting his hand up to ward off the instrument, he received a stab in his arm about two inches deep, from which he bled profusely; he wrested the knife from the prisoner, and went and had the wound dressed at the London Hospital.—She was committed.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Friday an inquest was held at Bethnal-green, on the body of Edward Rowley, aged 27, who on Tuesday evening went out to take a walk as far as Oldford, and, to please his child, climbed on the gate of a gentleman's house uninhabited, to get some flowers which were hanging over the wall, but on laying hold of a large ball, which ornamented a pier, to support himself, it gave way, and he fell on the ground on his back; the ball, which weighed upwards of 500 weight, fell on his abdomen, and crushed him; he lay in a state of insensibility, and shortly afterwards died. Verdict—Accidental Death.

It was Miss Sherwin, of Southampton-row, who lost her life from the impetuous driving of a young nobleman, on the King's road, Chelsea. Mr. Tooke, a wine-merchant, of Southampton-row, was driving Miss S. and his aunt, at the usual gentle pace, in his one-horse chaise, when overtaken by the tilbury of Lord Spencer Churchill, attempting too impatiently to pass before there was sufficient room, between the chaise and a coach which was coming towards him, whereby the ladies and gentleman were thrown out with great violence, and the cloaths of Miss S. catching in the wreck of the chaise, she was dragged 200 yards, and mangled in a manner too terrible to relate. At the Inquest, on Thursday week, the witnesses in attendance were unanimous in declaring, that the accident was occasioned solely by the furious driving of his Lordship.

On Thursday night, about 9 o'clock, as a man was driving furiously along the Borough (supposed to be from Epsom), in a one-horse chaise, the horse ran violently against a man and woman who were crossing the road, and dashed them with such force to the ground, that they were unable to rise, and were conveyed in a senseless and dangerous state to St. Thomas's hospital: the ruffian continued to drive on, and his name and address remain unknown.

Tuesday morning, at No. 2, Latham's-place, Somers Town, Susan Beaton, a child scarcely two years old, fell from a one pair of stairs window, and fractured her skull. She lingered till twelve on Wednesday night, when she expired in great agony.

As Mr. Joseph Seymour, of King-street, Westminster, was proceeding at two o'clock, on Friday morning, from the Horse Guards towards Parliament-street; on passing the Treasury passage a soldier in regimentals sprung upon him, and snatched his watch and ran away. Mr. Seymour followed with the cry of "stop thief," and succeeded in apprehending him near Whitehall Chapel. He was taken to the watch-house, and when searched the watch was found in his pocket. He was taken to Queen-square, and fully committed.

About four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, a butcher, residing in Fox and Knot-court, Snowhill, after having some angry words with his wife, whilst she was in the act of leaning out of the window talking to a person outside, cut his throat with a large slaughter-knife, and immediately expired.

On Saturday week, about eleven in the forenoon, as the widow of an Officer was going to pay a morning visit, in Duke-street, in Bath, a fellow ran after her down the North Parade—on her turning round, he immediately drew a dagger, and, horrid to relate, stabbed her, which cut through her clothes; but providentially coming in contact with the whalebone of her stays (which it cut off) very slightly wounded her in the side. The villain directly ran off towards the South Parade.

On the 14 inst. a horrid murder was committed at Bere Regis, Dorset, on the body of Priscilla Brown, who was called out of her house at ten o'clock, and at eleven was found suffocated in a back lane near the house. The deceased has left two children, a boy seven years old, and a girl four; and it is supposed that she was in a state of pregnancy by a man named John Gallop, who is on strong suspicion committed for trial.

A youth, aged 18, the son of a plumber at Lisle, and the daughter of a tavern-keeper, aged 19, being thwarted in their intended marriage, lately killed themselves by firing mutually, and at the same instant, two pistols. They fell dead in each other's arms.

MARRIAGES.

On the 14th inst., at Streatham, Christ. Feron, Esq. of the Hon. East India Service, to Elizabeth Node, of the above place.

On the 20th inst. at Mary-le-bone New Church, Mr. R. H. Legge, to Jane Hunter, youngest daughter of the late T. Hunter, Esq. of King-street, Portman-square.

On Monday, at Mary-le-bone Church, John Clayton Freeling, Esq. second son of Francis Freeling, Esq. of the General Post-Office, to Mary, third daughter of the late Edward Cox, Esq. of Hampstead Heath.

On Tuesday, at Eton, Mr. Wm. Borradaile, of Bernard-street, Brunswick-square, to Jane, only daughter of Mr. March, of Eton.

On Tuesday, George Bishop, Esq. of Finsbury-place, to Rosetta, eldest daughter of Richard Houlditch, Esq. of Hampstead.

On Wednesday, at the Dowager Marchioness of Lansdowne's house, in Albemarle-street, Count Luc, to Miss Maria Giffard, her Ladyship's fourth daughter.

Lately, Mr. J. Bologna, of the Theatre-Royal, Covent-garden, to Miss L. M. Bristow, late of the same.

On the 21st inst., at Brighton, George Royde, Esq. of Newgate-street, to Frances, eldest daughter of the late Wm. Attree, Esq. of Brighton.

On the 26th inst. Ellis John Troughton, Esq. of Kennington-common, to Mary, eldest daughter of the late Thomas Baker, Esq. of the India-house.

DEATHS.

On the 25th inst. in Winkworth-place, City-road, James Cooke, Esq. in the 77th year of his age.

In Nelson-square, in a fit of apoplexy, Mrs. Brooshooff, wife of Bernard Brooshooff, Esq.

On the 23d inst. in Portman-street, Dr. Wm. Ord, late of the Hon. East India Company's Service, Madras Establishment.

At Gortnagolly, near Dungannon, J. Woods, an industrious farmer, at the advanced age of 122 years. He lived a regular and sober life.

Lately, at Walkhampton, John Williams, aged 100. He was the eldest of 18 sons, of Jane Williams, late of Brentor, Devon, (who died in her 114th year) 17 of whom are now alive and in perfect health, and their joint ages amount to 1,379 years. John Williams had strength sufficient to gain his livelihood by hard labour, until within a fortnight of his dissolution.

At Eason's Lodge, near Yaxley, aged 106, Mrs. Ann Eason, who retained her faculties till within a few months of her death.

DISCIPLINE OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

"Arbitrary authority has always been thought to degrade those who are the objects of it, and to corrupt those who possess it, and thereby to lead to tyrannical maxims and practices incompatible with the safety of a free people."—See the excellent Protest made against the Alien Bill in the House of Lords.

We now proceed to shew how few of the eminent men, that have made the glory of this country, have been brought up under the system we have been opposing. And here we may observe,—what indeed it is not necessary to observe to the liberal,—that in writing against a system, we do not deny that some individuals have not been perverted by it. We have expressly said the reverse. We know more than one instance; but this we know also, that they are of two classes, who both agree in lamenting it,—the first, opposers of it from first to last,—the second, final opposers of it, either from outward conviction or internal regret.

And first, of our great intellects. SHAKESPEARE and BACON, the former the greatest genius perhaps that ever lived, the latter the overthrower of the tyranny of the school-men, were not educated under such a system. The great poet of humanity was for a short time at a free-school in his native town under the eyes of his parents;—the father of experimental philosophy was educated privately. The state of education indeed in those illustrious times, which produced the noblest crowd of human beings that England has witnessed, was very different from what it is now*. The sons of people of rank were in general privately educated, and sent very young to the university. Schools appear to have been even more numerous in the country; but they were proportionately humbler than the second or third rate order of schools at present, not so humble as the rest, and better taught than most. The masters were in general very severe, as we suppose they have been at all times; but they seem to have had no notion of suffering a tyranny within a tyranny; and it is to be observed, that those who act otherwise now, get nothing by it but a kind of threatening submission, or at best an outward shew of deference for obvious reasons, liable to come to nothing at a dispute or a barring-out. Nor is this apparent limit of servility any real one, for as one of our Correspondents justly called it, the system is a tyrannical “oligarchy,” and tends to create and continue a similar one out in the world, such as we all have the misfortune to witness. The principle of it is to trample upon the democracy, to serve and become a part of the oligarchy, and to treat the master or the king with respect or not, just as it happens. The tyranny downwards always exists; the servility upwards is limited by hope and fear. The worst species of induced selfishness is the secret of both.

* It is a common thing in our great public schools to give as a subject for a theme,—“Which is the greater age,—that of ELIZABETH or that of ANNE?”—meaning, which are the greater set of men, SHAKESPEARE, BACON, SPENSER, SYDNEY, BEN JONSON, RALEIGH, &c. or POPE, ADDISON, SWIFT, and others. The very question is a lamentable proof of ignorance of all true greatness and humanity. The latter set of men have undoubtedly great merit, such as it becomes us to respect and admire; but compared with the former, they are as mere authors compared with the wise, or the town with the whole earth.

To return. The three remaining masters of English poetry, CHAUCER, SPENSER, and MILTON, were not educated under this system; at least there is nothing to shew that SPENSER was, and CHAUCER and MILTON certainly were not. Sir PHILIP SYDNEY was not; BEAUMONT and FLETCHER were not; CAMDEN received the rudiments of his learning partly from Christ's Hospital and partly from St. Paul's; BEN JOHNSON, the most overbearing of the great men of his time, was educated at Westminster School, but whether the system prevailed or not in his time, is unknown.

The majority of the greatest men of the age of ANNE and the succeeding times were bred up at small country schools or at home. Sir ISAAC NEWTON was at Grantham school before he went to Cambridge; SWIFT at Kilkenny school; JOHNSON at the free-school of Litchfield; POPE was taught privately by a Catholic priest, and GOLDSMITH by his own father.

In short, the greatest Englishmen in the greatest kinds of talent had their boyhood nurtured under a different system; and if it be asked us to add instances of military and political characters, such as eminently succeeded in the world and have had their reputation sanctioned by time, we have only to mention the names of BURLEIGH, BLAKE, CROMWELL, and MARLBOROUGH. It was not necessary for the successes of ELIZABETH's Ministers that they should have gone through a series of disasters at school from their school-fellows; BLAKE did not learn to sweep the Channel of our foes by having his face rubbed in the dust, when a boy; nor does our boast respecting MARLBOROUGH, that he never was beaten, at all originate in his having been beaten and kicked till the age of puberty.

The most celebrated men educated at the great schools, to the best of our recollection, are LOCKE, DRYDEN, BOLINGBROKE, ADDISON, STEELE, CHURCHILL, and COWPER. Some of these names are very excellent ones undoubtedly. LOCKE is a weighty one, and STEELE a delightful. If the name of BENTHAM is to be added, as we believe it is, the addition is a great one;—but unluckily the fagging system gets nothing by it, for of all the philosophers that have adorned the country, this illustrious person is the most specifically opposed to every such inculcation of slavishness and insincerity, great and small. And it is to be particularly observed, that while the greatest names in our past history have had nothing to do with such a system, so it remains for its advocates to shew how far it exists or whether it existed at all. The only periods, at which we are certain of its flourishing, are later ones; and the only persons brought up in it, the survival of whose names appears no longer to depend upon matters of party, are two Westminster men, CHURCHILL and COWPER.—the one, a spirit of whom no school will be very eager to boast,—and the other, a lamentable victim partly to constitutional weakness, partly to religious bigotry which maddened it when old, and partly to this very system before us, which shook and frightened it when young. COWPER's is no doubt an excessive case; yet he tells us that he excelled at foot-ball and cricket when a boy, so that he could not have been wholly without ability to participate in the rougher pleasures of his school-fellows; but it was his mental timidity and gentleness they trampled on. It is awful matter for reflection to think how many other gentle spirits may have been more or less spoiled in their future faculties and comfort, by this violent and absurd mistake about fitting boys for the world. We have shewn that the strong do not want such a system, and that the common-place are only still more liable to be turned into slaves and tyrants by it. We here see that the weak are liable to be driven mad.

The only persons of any distinction now flourishing in the political world, of whose education at the great fagging schools we are aware, are LORD ELLENBOROUGH and MR. CANNING. This is a short paragraph; but it will do.

In what we have said on this very important subject, we do not mean to insinuate that public schools are bad things in the abstract: neither do we at all mean to recommend a system of undue restraint and humility. Schools in which a false importance and a slavish humility are inculcated in the minds of the children, are almost equally pernicious, the former by creating wrong power and the worship of it, and the latter by taking away from society the spirit to resist. But the fagging system unites both. The first principle of all power founded on error is, not—Prove me—or Behold my justice—but—Take me for granted—Obey me. But we shall only be repeating our arguments. We dislike then, not public schools, but this vice in public schools. We think that private education has, upon the whole, the superiority; especially under a cheerful as well as steady master; but it is in the power of comparatively few persons; and besides the consequent desirableness of public schools, there are advantages in them, which with proper management might dispute the palm with the other,—such as the tendency to bring together generous friendships, the early teaching of a distrust of one's own superiority, the rubbing off of other vanities and pedantries including those of manner, the awakening of a social cheerfulness natural to an early time of life, and even the rougher collisions which are incidental to the little world as well as the great, and which, with fair play, would no doubt forward that manly object which the system of alternate slavery and tyranny so ridiculously pretends to.

To suggest an inquiry into that system, at least on the part of parents and those interested in it, is the only object of the paper we have written upon it. In other matters, generally speaking, we are advocates for public as well as private education. We have reason to be so; and we here take another opportunity of expressing our affection for the comparatively humble and placid, though far from vulgar or unmanly school in which we were brought up, and which if we do not proceed to praise as much as we intended, it is only from one of the impulses which it taught us to respect,—the fear of turning a just pride into over-seasonable comparison.

(The additional Letters on Fagging are postponed till next week, owing to the pressure of parliamentary matter.)

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, May 30.—The Ex-conventionalist, Noel Leconte, banished from the kingdom for having voted the death of Louis XVI., having secretly returned, has been discovered, and sentenced to transportation.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, June 1.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to various public and private Bills.

WESTMINSTER PETITION.

LORD KING presented a Petition from certain householders of Westminster, voted at the last Westminster meeting. It referred to an opinion stated to have been given from high authority, that Parliament could alter the Constitution; and asked, if that were the case, might not it be altered to the despotic constitution of Ferdinand VII. or of the Dey of Algiers? It described lawyers as men of narrow minds, prayed for Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments, and called upon their Lordships to define what was the Constitution. It was signed by Major Cartwright, Messrs. Walker, Maclaren, Place, &c. (The contents of the Petition seemed to excite the risibility of some of their Lordships.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that as the Petition stated great lawyers to be men of narrow minds, it was singular enough that the Petitioners should have chosen the son of one of those narrow-minded persons to present their remonstrance to their Lordships. The ancestor of the Noble Lord who had presented the Petition was a warm advocate of the liberties of his country; and he hoped that a descendant of a Lord Chancellor would always be found ready to bring under their Lordships' consideration the just complaints of the people; but when the absurdity of this Petition, and the language in which it was couched, were considered, he trusted that a descendant of Lord Chancellor King would not consider it one which their Lordships ought to receive.

LORD HOLLAND did not see why the absurdity of a Petition should form an argument for not laying it on the table. That it was unintelligible might be a very good reason for not reading it; but as it had been presented, and read, he thought it should be received.

The Petition was rejected.

ALIEN BILL.

LORD SIDMOUTH moved that this Bill be committed. He made various observations on the necessity, stating that while it was part of the policy of all the governments of Europe to expel from their territories, or place under particular regulations, obnoxious foreigners, this country ought not to form an exception to that policy. Were we to cherish the revolutionary spirit, and to allow all factious individuals to find an asylum in this country?

EARL FITZWILLIAM, the Duke of SUSSEX, the Marquis of LANSDOWN, and LORD HOLLAND, opposed the measure as arbitrary and unequalled for.—LORD HOLLAND stated several acts of oppression done under former Alien Bills, observing that he never voted against any Bill with more determined hostility than he did against this one.

On a division, there were 34 for the committal, and 51 against it.—In the committal various clauses were proposed by the Opposition, and negatived, while those suggested by Ministers were adopted.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.

Their Lordships proceeded to take into consideration the report on this Bill, when several amendments were made. On the question that the Bill be read a third time.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that this Bill had been very much improved since it came up here. With respect to the part which he had taken in it, he felt very strong objections, to make any allusion, because, in the first place, it was the duty of every member there, and particularly of the person who held the situation which he filled, not to observe on any thing that passed in another place; and, secondly, because it was extremely difficult to ascertain what really had passed; but if what he had read as having passed was correct, he felt himself bound to observe, that his conduct had not been treated with justice or propriety. He left it to the judgment of those who had known him long, both as a judge and as a member of that House, whether he ought to have been treated in that manner—(Hear, hear!)—He would now merely add, that whatever effect might have been intended to be produced, it should never operate as a check on his mind to diminish the respect, civility, and attention, with which he had always treated every member of Parliament, every gentleman, and particularly every gentleman of his own profession.—(Hear, hear, hear!)—Adjourned.

Tuesday, June 2.

After a conversation, the Hainault Forest Bill was ordered to be read a second time this day three months.

The Education of the Poor Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Game Laws' Amendment Bill, after some conversation, was read a second time, the object of it being, according to the Earl of CARNARVON, to place the buyer and the seller of game upon the same footing. As the law at present stood, the latter was subject to penalties, while the former was safe from all punishment.

Lord ERSKINE's Bill for preventing arbitrary arrests in cases of libel was thrown out on the second reading, there being 31 against, and only 13 for the measure.

The Alien Bill, after some debate, was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, June 3.

The Privately Stealing Bill, being again opposed by the LORD CHANCELLOR, was thrown out on the 2d reading.

An Address was voted to the Regent on the Marriage of the Duke of Cambridge.

The Game Laws' Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

PRISONS.

On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWN, an Address was voted to the Regent, praying that early in next session he would order an account of the State of all the Prisons, &c. in the Kingdom.—The Noble Marquis introduced his motion by a speech of some length on the great increase of crimes, and the deplorable condition of many of the jails—which was admitted by Lord STAMFORD—and the motion was agreed to nem. con.—Adjourned till Friday.

Friday, June 5.

Further proceedings in the Cotton Manufactories Bill were postponed till next Session.

Bradbury's Patent Bill was rejected, on account of an error in the proceedings.

Earl GROSVENOR moved several Resolutions respecting the abolishment of Sinecures and Offices in Reversion, and a General Plan of Economy. They were all rejected without any debate.—Adjourned.

PROTESTS AGAINST THE ALIEN BILL, ENTERED ON THE JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1st. Because the Bill is cruel, for even when not perverted to any improper purposes, it may deter the victims of civil or religious persecution abroad from seeking refuge under the laws of a free country.

2dly. Because the Bill is unjust.

It exposes all resident Aliens (such even as may have settled here in consequence of no such law existing at the time) to actual punishment without trial, and it condemns even the most unsuspected among them to an evil greater than most punishments—a dependence on the arbitrary will of one man.

3dly. Because the Bill is unnecessary, there being no unusual resort of strangers to this kingdom; and no apprehension, real or pretended, that individual foreigners either possess the means or harbour the design of disturbing our internal tranquillity.

4thly. Because the Bill is unconstitutional. It creates a power liable to abuse, and unknown to our laws; and arbitrary authority has always been thought to degrade those who are the objects of it, and to corrupt those who possess it, and thereby to lead to tyrannical maxims and practices incompatible with the safety of a free people.

5thly. Because the Bill is impolitic.

It discourages the employment of foreign capital, and the exercise of foreign ingenuity, in our country, and obviously tends to embroil us with other Courts of Europe, by rendering the residence of any obnoxious individuals among us, an act of the state, and no longer a consequence of the hospitable spirit of our municipal laws.

VASSALL HOLLAND, AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, LEINSTER, KING, ROSSLYN, PONSONBY, GREY, LANCHESTER.

For the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 5th reasons. LANSDOWN.

For the 1st and 2d reasons. GAGE.

Because, by this Bill, the Secretary of State is authorised to convey an Alien to any foreign port, and thus to deliver such Alien into the hands of his mortal enemies—to subject him to perpetual imprisonment—to corporal punishment—to torture—or to death.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, GAGE, VASSALL HOLLAND, ROSSLYN, LEINSTER, GREY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, June 1.

Alderman WOOD presented a Petition from persons in Westminster, praying for Annual Parliaments, &c.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SPANISH PATRIOTS, &c.

Lord MORPETH said he had a Petition to present, concerning the case of certain Spaniards, one of whom was M. Correia. The matter had been noticed in Parliament, and it had been stated that there was no doubt that Ministers would then use proper means for the liberation of the individuals who had been imprisoned. The Petitioners did not make any particular complaint against the existing Government of Spain for injuries received, but appealed to the liberality and justice of this country.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, it was not in the power of this Government to restrain the conduct of Spain with respect to its own subjects.

Sir JAMES MACINTOSH conceived, that there was a grievance stated in this Petition which was extremely worthy of attention. The British Government thought itself obliged, in point of honour and duty, to obtain the release of these persons. In consequence of this, Capt. Correia came here; and now he is told that, on account of the interference of the British Government, he is divested of his national character.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that this was not a fair construction of what had been done to Correia. The inconvenience he now suffered was the result of the views which his own Government took of his conduct.

Mr. BROUGHAM said he should be glad to be informed, whether any remonstrance had been made by this Government to the Court of Madrid, in behalf of these unhappy persons—those gallant persons, he should say—who, after having fought the battles of Ferdinand, were consigned to a loathsome dungeon, nearly opposite our own garrison at Gibraltar. If any remonstrance had been made, as the Noble Lord had formerly promised the House that there should, he wished to know in what manner it had been received by the liberal and enlightened policy of the grateful Ferdinand. (Hear, hear!)

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that some communications had taken place with the Spanish Government, but it was a most delicate subject, and there was no particular intelligence which he could lay before the House. He must observe, however, that he greatly apprehended that the observations which had been made on the other side of the House, relative to the Spanish Monarch, had tended rather to retard than promote the interests of the individuals in question.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, it was obvious, that nothing had been done; that all our remonstrances to Ferdinand (if any had been made) were ineffectual; and therefore it was a bitter satire to talk of the policy of that Prince. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. BENNET was fully convinced, that if those observations had not been made, not the smallest interference would have taken place on behalf of those unhappy individuals. (Hear, hear!)

Lord COCHRANE contended, that the Petition ought to lie upon the table. He observed, that that ungrateful Monarch, Ferdinand, being unable to persecute Correia in his own country, had handed him over to his Majesty's Ministers. It was quite certain, that those Ministers would never give any relief to those who differed from them.

The Petition was withdrawn.

Some conversation took place respecting certain proceedings in Westmoreland, connected with the Land Tax Assessments and the electioneering proceedings in that county. Mr. Brougham, however, did not make any motion.

Sir RONALD FERGUSON said, he had a Petition in his hand from the guild brethren of the borough of Cupar, who prayed for relief from the grievances under which they suffered, and that they might be allowed the proper exercise of their votes.—Ordered to be printed.

Sir S. ROMILLY presented Petitions from Messrs. Frost, Cooper, Easton, Stephens, Rose, Clark, &c. praying for relief: they were all labouring under Exacts at the suit of the Crown.—Ordered to lie on the table.

REGENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On the second reading of this Bill, Mr. TIERNEY said, that the measure had been constructed to enable his Majesty's Ministers to dissolve Parliament without inconvenience. It was not impossible that his Majesty's demise might take place. Suppose then the new Parliament to be within a single day of meeting. Suppose then the King should die; all the writs would have to be annulled, all proceedings stopped, and that monstrous circumstance occur, that the old Parliament would have to assemble, which it could not do so soon as the new would have done.

(Hear, hear!)—He wished the Noble Lord would consider whether some remedy could not be devised for that. When they were viewing the inconveniences likely to arise from the death of her Majesty, he thought they ought to have considered what was to be done in case of the death of the Regent, when we should have neither King, Queen, nor Executive Government at all.—(Hear, hear!)

IONIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. BENNET's motion for papers respecting the alleged scandalous conduct of Lieut.-Colonel Campbell, as well as a particular individual, Count Cladan, as to the inhabitants at large, was negatived by 46 to 8.—It appeared from Mr. Bennett's statement, that Governor Campbell had flogged, banished, and fined the inhabitants at his will and pleasure, for which they sought redress.—Mr. GOULBURN opposed the motion, on the ground that he did not believe the charges, and that redress could be had in the English Courts for any wrongs done.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, June 2.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved various items for compensations, &c. to the Officers of the House, by way of address to the Throne. He then moved an Address for such compensations to the Clerks, &c. as might appear proper; and another, praying the Prince Regent to confer some dignity in the church on the Rev. Robert Stevens, the Chaplain of the House, which was carried.

The Bankrupt Laws Amendment Bill went through a Committee; the report was read, and the Bill ordered to be printed, and to be further considered that day three months.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, he had a number of Petitions to present in favour of Parliamentary Reform:—1 from Loughborough, 25 from Westminster, 12 from Lancashire, 11 from Exeter, 20 from Birmingham, 3 from Warrington, and several from Middlessex, Dundee, Edinburgh, and other places.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord COCHRANE presented a Petition from Westminster, praying that the House would never again suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, without better evidence than had been given for the last suspension: also for a Parliamentary Reform on the principles of general suffrage. Besides this Petition, his Lordship presented 39 similar ones from Leeds, 9 from Portsmouth, and above 40 from other places.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, he hoped that what he had to propose would appear consistent with good sense and liberty, and with the Constitution of this country. He had embodied the principles he entertained on this subject in a resolution, which he should suppose no man of any party could find reason to object to. They were not founded on the opinions of any popular political writers of modern times, nor on those works of more ancient writers. He had endeavoured to confine himself to one source, and that of the highest authority, being no other than that of speeches from the throne. For his own part, he had always been led to consider that the interests of the King and the people were one and the same. If these were properly considered, there would be no cause for the frequent recurrence of such warm jealousies, however properly felt, of the prerogatives of the Crown, which would be justly balanced by a fair representation of the people in Parliament. Prerogatives would thereby be placed within due bounds, and held, as they ought to be, for the benefit of the public. There had been a cry set up about unheard-of principles subversive of the Constitution. Yet these were the principles on which our forefathers had acted; they had annual Parliaments, and oftener even than annually, and an extended degree of suffrage amounting to what had commonly been called Universal Suffrage. He had, on a former occasion, proposed to limit the right of suffrage to those who paid directly to the King, the church, and the poor. Had that been agreed to, we should have had a fair general representation of all the various interests and denominations of the people. But then it was said, that those who proposed such a limitation did not act up to the principles they professed. Since that period the question of Reform had been greatly agitated, and the public mind had advanced. The system of Universal Suffrage had made a much stronger general impression. He had found occasion to trace back the ancient practice of the Constitution to a remote period. The farther we went back to records, we should find that elections were free throughout the land. By ancient laws, elections were to occur at three different periods of the year—at the three great festivals of Easter, Midsummer, and Christmas. The principles of Liberty and the Constitution always prevailed in the country. He thought nobody could now contend that annual Parliaments were not the ancient practice. What was the object of Parliaments, and what had always been its object? What was the reason of any such body being convened at all? It was for the purpose of making the King acquainted with the wishes, the views, and the feelings of his subjects. With respect to the expediency of adopting such practice as had been adopted by our ancestors, that it was proper to have recourse exactly to their forms was another question, and might be matter of investigation and discussion; but he believed that the conviction that had been established upon that subject formed a complete bar to its being denominated unheard-of, wild, and visionary. With respect to the other great principle, which indeed was most important of all—the election of Members—the first question was, who were the persons who used to appoint Representatives? How far did the elective franchise extend? Although he did not say that what used to be ought to be, except so far as was consistent with the state of the country, if claims of the people had been maintained by rights which they possessed, and no ill consequences had been proved to follow from their enjoyment, but great mischief to have resulted from their having been infringed and trampled on, the claim was considerably strengthened to have suffrage extended so far as would comprehend the interests of the whole bulk of the community. That claim would stand even better upon the ground of expediency and necessity than upon the ancient practice of our ancestors, from which he had adduced it. What was the difference to us whether we had standing armies, juries not impartially empanelled, or packed Parliaments; whether we had excessive fines or cruel and unusual punishments without trial, and all the most detestable acts of the most arbitrary power? What was it to the people whether that was done by the King's extending his prerogative, or by corruption in the hands of the Crown operating on the venality of the House of Commons? There was no difference between one kind of tyranny and another, except that they were worse off when they trusted themselves to others as guardians and fell victims to their villainy. It was like watchmen that had been hired to guard the house becoming partakers with the thieves, and thus what was intended for a protection became their mischief. Had there been no such body as a Parliament, had there been but some landmarks without a Parliament, there might never have been so much injury as had now been effected. The evil was so great, indeed, that he had much rather there had been no House of Commons at all, than, as that was, a House of Commons in plan and appearance, but in reality no check upon the Ministers of the Crown, but merely under the public authority, and under the sanction of being representatives of the people at large, possessing the means of putting their liberties into the hands of Ministers, whenever it pleased them to require their surrender. The way to prevent all these evils was to restore to the people that weight in the legislature to which they were entitled more than any other part of the Government. He said that, because every other part was a trust for them, and if abused might be taken out of their hands who had abused it. But the rights of the people were inalienable rights, and could not be destroyed. The old coronation-oath was entirely in favour of the people. It asked "si leges et consuetudines," &c. if the monarch would preserve the laws and customs of their ancestors, to which he replied in the affirmative. In the time of Henry IV., who had his power by usurpation from his predecessor, a statute had been passed on the representation, which said, that all persons duly summoned to the county court, and others, should proceed to the election of knights of the shire. What could be more universal than these words? An Act of Henry VI. stated, that a great concourse of people having attended at elections, and that persons of no property had pretended to have a voice, and that thereupon tumults, disturbances, manslaughter, riots, and batteries, might very likely rise and be; therefore it disfranchised all who had not freehold property to the amount of forty shillings, which at that time was a very considerable sum. The pretences for that restrictive statute were evidently false: it did not state that disturbances had arisen, but prophesied that such might arise, and, upon that prophesy, took away from the people what was their indisputable right. There never were any riots; but if there had been, what was the state of elections at present? The system now was all riot, all confusion and disturbance. Elections were now one complete scene of trick, drunkenness, perjury, and every species of rascality. The very proceedings, which did not exist at the time when that Act was passed, were witnessed now at every election. There was, indeed, one great exception from such a state of things; he happened himself to be a member elected upon the scale of universal suffrage. The election was managed by the people without any of those riots or disturbances, or any of those perjuries. It was the most remarkable thing that the city of Westminster should be able to conduct itself so peaceably and quietly as a parish vestry in the election of a parish officer. There was something, therefore, to show how little danger there was in trusting a people with that to which they were fairly entitled, and without which all their privileges were of little avail. These things he was not advocating alone on his own grounds, but on high and indisputable authority. A Committee had been held at Westminster to examine into the state of the representation, of which Mr. Fox was chairman. A petition had been presented in consequence. That petition was lying unanswer'd, though it was founded, he believed, on the report of that Committee. They had stated, that 6,000 votes returned 257 Members, which was the majority of the then House of Commons; and they declared that the representation was more inadequate in point of property than population. A resolution had been signed by Mr. Fox, as chairman, declaring that Annual Parliaments were the Constitution of England. He had signed that as chairman of the Committee. The Duke of Richmond, in his letter to Colonel Sharrman, had supported the same principles. On a motion for reform, in 1797, Mr. Fox had said that the great bulk of the people ought to be included amongst the electors, and he said that that was the best system of reform that included the greatest number of individual votes. Mr. Pitt had declared, that, under the present system, no honest man could be Minister, and no man could do much good to the country.—Mr. Burke, also,—but, indeed, there was hardly any man who had ever sat in that House who had not, at one time or other, exposed its corruption. Mr. Burke, he said, had depicted its character in the truest colours: he had declared, that "it would (among public misfortunes) be an evil more natural and tolerable, that the House of Commons should be infected with every epidemic phrenzy of the nation, as this would indicate some consanguinity, some sympathy of nature with their constituents, than that they should in all cases be wholly untouched by the opinions and feelings of the people out of doors." "The virtue, spirit, and essence of a House of Commons consists in its being the express image of the feelings of the nation. It was not instituted to be a controul upon the people, as of late it has been taught, by a doctrine of the most pernicious tendency, but as a controul for the people." Such were the sentiments of Mr. Burke. Then, again, Sir William Jones, whom Dr. Johnson had called "the most enlightened of men," he had declared, that "if the present system of representation be justly compared to a tree rotten at the heart, he wished to see removed every particle of its rottenness that a microscopic eye could discern. He derided many of the fashionable doctrines: that of virtual representation he held to be actual folly; as childish, as if they were to talk of negative representation, and to contend that it involved any positive idea." One word he (Sir F. Burdett) would now say to those gentlemen who might think that he did not act with prudence; for he knew that there were many who agreed with him in the necessity of Reform, though they might not concur with him with respect to the extent. Having tried all possible modes of compromise, and having seen the result of that motion which was made the other night for the repeal of the Septennial Act—an Act which was certainly the greatest violation of the Constitution, and compared with which, as Dr. Johnson had observed, the nomination, at one time, of twelve persons to the peerage, in the reign of Queen Anne, was nothing equal or approaching to the contempt of all human right, and of all human means of asserting it—he saw no prudence in withholding that which would bear the test of reason. That elections ought to be free was declared by the Bill of Rights, that no great man should disturb free elections was also declared by statute, and was one of the standing orders of the House: the business now was, that those laws and those maxims should not remain merely in principle, but be brought into practice. It was said, if you give Universal Suffrage, the result will be, that you will have persons of no education, of no rank, of no moral or political integrity, elected into this House; on the contrary, he ventured to say, that persons of the best education, of the first rank, and of good character would be elected. Machiavel had argued the whole matter, and he said, that the safest mode of election to all offices was by the people. He (Sir Francis Burdett) had no doubt that an election by the people would be the greatest security to the country, and that persons who had the advantages of birth, education, and otherwise, would be the choice of the people. But the strongest proof of this case was, that every person ought to have a share in those laws by which he is to be bound. Mr. Justice Blackstone justifies putting men to death on this principle. He says, "the lawfulness of punishing criminals is founded upon this—that the law by which they suffer was made by their own consent." Upon the same principle he justifies the promulgation of laws, declaring, "that every man is, in judgment of law, a party to making an Act of Parliament, being present thereat by his representatives." It seemed extraordinary, when we considered this subject in another and in a more important view, that a country which took men by force from their families, to serve in the militia, or on board of ship, to shed their blood for the community, should have no share in the making of laws. All that was asked for was, that a man should have an opportunity of saying who was the person with whom he would intrust his property, and his liberty. In every government, in proportion as the people have had a share in the government, in that proportion has the country been prosperous; but wherever aristocracy, and more especially oligarchy, have prevailed, in an equal degree has the country degenerated, the people have become corrupt, and despotism has been established. Having thus, he hoped proved that Annual Parliaments were the old Constitution of the country, and that they had been practised for many ages without any inconvenience, and that every man was entitled to vote in the election of the person who was to assist in making those laws which may affect his property, his freedom, and his life, he trusted that the House would not reject the resolutions with which he intended to conclude his arguments. We were told that, in the worst times of the Roman empire, when a general corruption and degeneracy prevailed, the people, who by their votes had disposed of kingdoms and provinces, fell to desiring nothing but to live and see plays.

Qui dabat olim
Imperium, fasces, legiones, omnia, nunc se
Continet, atque duas tantum res anxius optat, Panem, et Circenses."

He hoped that the people of England were not yet so degenerate, that they were not yet reduced to this melancholy situation. He believed that they were still an honest, a laborious, and a virtuous people; and that they asked only for that check and controul over the State, which should secure to them and to their children the fruits of their own industry. Sir Francis then read his Resolutions, which set forth the principles he had maintained in his speech, and concluded thus:—That therefore this House, proceeding on the principles above declared, is resolved to make one great sacrifice of all separate and particular interests, and to proceed to establish a comprehensive and consistent plan of Reform; in virtue whereof, the whole people of the United Kingdom may be fairly and truly represented in this House; and, in order to that end, this House does hereby declare:—

1. That it is expedient and necessary to admit to a participation in the election suffrage all such persons as being of the male sex, of mature age, and of sound mind, shall, during a determinate time, antecedent to the day of election, have been resident either as householders or inmates, within the district or place in which they are called upon to vote.

2. That the territory of Great Britain and Ireland, taken together, ought to be divided into 658 election districts, as nearly equal to each other in population as consistently with local convenience they may be; and that each such election district ought to return one representative, and no more.

3. That for the prevention of unnecessary delay, vexation, and expense, as well as of fraud, violence, disorder, and void elections, the election in each district ought to be begun and ended on the same day, and that day ought to be the same for all the districts; and that for this purpose, not only the proof of title, but also every operation requiring more time than is necessary for the delivery of the vote, ought to be accomplished on some day or days antecedent to the day of election, and that the title to a vote should be the same for every elector, and so simple as not to be subject to dispute.

4. That for the more effectually securing the attainment of the above objects, the election districts ought to be subdivided into sub-districts, for the reception of votes, in such number and situations as local convenience may require.

5. That for securing the freedom of election, the mode of voting ought to be by ballot.

6. That for more effectually securing the unity of will and opinion, as between the people and their representatives, a fresh election of the Members of this House ought to take place once in every year at the least; saving to the Crown its prerogative of dissolving Parliaments at any time, and thereupon, after the necessary interval, summoning a fresh Parliament.

Lord COCHRANE seconded the motion: "This was perhaps the last time he should address that house. He had sat there as a Member for 11 years, and few indeed were the acts of that House in which he had agreed with them. The effects of their acts were already seen; they would soon be but too clearly demonstrated. One of the greatest men who had ever sat in that House, Lord Chatham, father of the late Mr. Pitt, had said, that if that House were not reformed from within, it would be reformed with a vengeance from without. It had not been reformed from within, and he now gave it as his decided opinion that it never would be reformed from within. He solemnly declared it was his firm persuasion, that unless some measures were adopted to soften the angry feelings which prevailed—unless some means were taken to restore security and tranquillity to the people—Gentlemen opposite, who would be quite triumphant in resisting the present motion, would hereafter rue their temerity. The House of Commons would one day deeply regret their perseverance in measures which would shake the whole fabric and constitution of the country. He was grateful to the Westminster electors for having rescued him—(here the Noble Lord wept, and the House cheered)—from a wicked and desperate conspiracy, which was calculated to effect his irrecoverable ruin. All his services to his country, and his perfect innocence, would have availed him not, but for the liberal and uniform support of his constituents. Those who had plotted his ruin, he forgave; and he hoped, ere they should fall into their graves, they would repent of their base and foul machinations. These observations were foreign to the question, and he begged pardon for obtruding them. (Hear.) To Ministers he begged to say, that he bore no hostility, but that he deplored the effects of their conduct, and hoped they would yet reflect and reform."

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that he felt no manner of disrespect to those in that House, who were very few indeed, or to the great number of persons out of doors, who entertained the opinions as to universal suffrage which he was to controvert. He considered them as misled, partly by not having duly weighed and examined the subject, and partly by the writings and speeches of persons who themselves had not duly weighed it. But to neither the one nor the other did he ascribe any bad motive, and he claimed the same charity for himself from them. He claimed this charity confidently from his Hon. Friend, the worthy Baronet. Indeed, it would be a great imputation upon his character and recollection, if he did not extend this charity to him, as his own opinion upon this question was of a very recent date. (No, no; from Sir F. B. B. B.) He found he was mistaken, but a Noble Lord who sat near him had thought that he had heard him protest against universal suffrage in that House, and, certainly, his own recollection rather favoured the same opinion. He rose then, first, to protest against any such principle as, that who reformed innovated. To those who objected to Reform innovation, and merely as such, he would reply, that they were the greatest Reformers. He therefore protested against all Reform as a dangerous innovation, in the sense of a revolution, which put in jeopardy the best interests of the country. His Hon. Friend had confined himself in his resolutions to one kind of authority. He had not referred to Magna Charta, he had not appealed to history, to acts, speeches, or resolutions of Parliament; but he had confined himself to what, in his opinion, ranked lowest of all kinds of authority—the speeches delivered from the throne.—(Hear, hear!)—If what was expressed in those speeches recommended short Parliaments, how happened it that the same expressions were repeated at the end of every seven years, without any effort to shorten Parliaments? His Hon. Friend had referred to the ancient laws of Parliament as undeniably in favour of his arguments, although he should hold that to be a matter still to be proved. But they had been now appealed to in order to show that at least the Reform proposed was not new, visionary, or wild. If, however, it had been proved that Annual Parliaments and Universal Suffrage had once been the Constitution of this country, still the return to them now might be the most visionary measure which could enter into the most visionary brain; and as wild as any other vagary which had never existence in society.—Suppose he should move that they should return to the savage state. There could be no doubt that men had been once in this state, if it was not as old as the creation of man. This would have no novelty in it, although it would be contrary both to sense and to justice. But it would be as much sanctioned by ancient authorities as what some visionaries (he could not change the names) now contended for. His Hon. Friend had always been fond of quoting Magna Charta. The first word was much to his purpose, but his triumph could be but very short lived, for the second word was decidedly against his theory. Nullus liber homo—it was not nullus homo that would have been to his purpose; but the second word, liber, proved that the rights there obtained were limited to a class of men who held the rest of the people in domestic slavery. If they went back to that period, to those of freedom, when no doubt the government was respected at home and abroad; at that period the government had just emerged from a sevenfold division; there were no rotten boroughs, no corrupt elections, no long parliaments, and no circumscribed suffrage; in this golden age the first charter of rights had only secured liberty for those who were rich enough to have property in man, by holding their fellow-creatures as their absolute property.—(Hear, hear!)—He had mentioned this only to show that it was no reason for agreeing to an absurd and detestable measure, that it was not an innovation. He was an advocate for short Parliaments, and he saw no danger in the shortest period, although he was not anxious for that; but the authority thus derived was more in name than in reality. Elections were then widely different. To be a member of Parliament was then a burden; persons were compelled to attend. To what purpose, then, was all the useless lumber of learning, connected with the subject brought forward? Parliament sat only a few days; no regular Session had ever been held. Upon a careful investigation of the subject, he was satisfied that although the practice was to elect annually, that it was not the law, and that there was nothing to prevent the same Parliament from sitting more than one year, if they had been so disposed. But Universal Suffrage was different. Vague, flimsy, and sterile, as were the Royal speeches with which his Hon. Friend had garnished his resolutions, they were not less to his purpose than the ancient laws he had quoted in support of Universal Suffrage. Another authority had been attempted, an authority which he should value more than all royal authorities; it was the great and venerable authority of Mr. Fox. He grieved that his revered authority had been brought forward as having once sanctioned what they knew he had not acted upon. He was said to have agreed to what he had signed as a chairman. In the name of all chairmen he protested against this doctrine. Every chairman authenticated the resolutions of a meeting over which he presided, and by so doing only said, "I attest this to have been the sense of the meeting." The Speaker in the chair was an instance. Could it be supposed that he had considered and approved all the votes and resolutions, to which he had to sign his name? The Hon. Baronet appeared to assume as a fact, that in Westminster the principle of universal suffrage was established, and that no other place enjoyed the same advantage. Now he must deny that there was any thing like universal suffrage in Westminster, for that Westminster enjoyed any advantages which were not equally enjoyed by many other populous constituent bodies. The elective franchise was confined in Westminster to inhabitant-householders, an extension of suffrage certainly producing 10,000 voters, a number which some might think erred as much in excess as that in Old Sarum did by its poverty, but to which he had no objection, and in which he saw no danger. For what reason, he would ask, did the Hon. Baronet exclude from the right of voting all persons under 21 years of age? He thought himself entitled to complain of the cruel injustice with which the Hon. Baronet had treated the infants of the nation: If they did not contribute their property, they contributed their abilities and their blood to the service of the State; and as he could not conceive that they ought to be deprived of the most sacred of all rights, under such circumstances, he must recommend these interesting and interested persons to the Hon. Baronet's candid consideration.—(A laugh.)—Another class whose interests he found it necessary also to plead, as being unjustly passed over, was a very amiable part of the community, usually gifted with much liveliness of fancy, and if not always making the best use of that knowledge, which it now happily became the practice for them to acquire, certainly could not misapply it more than many of the learned advocates of Reform. In favour, then, of the political rights of the other sex, and against the Hon. Baronet, he had to quote the authority of Mr. Bentham:—When he mentioned that name, however, it was with the most sincere respect for his long, useful, laborious, and disinterested life. Without, however, suspecting him of defective judgment or information, he might be allowed to say, that his mind was extremely speculative, and that his knowledge was rather of books than of men. But, Mr. Bentham, whether right or wrong, was at least a more sturdy and consistent reformer than the Hon. Baronet, for he was at once for letting in all women to the elective franchise; he tossed away every scale, overstepped every limit, and fairly proclaimed, "let in all men; let in all women."—(A laugh.)—He did not even sanction the exception which the Hon. Baronet seemed inclined to admit with respect to persons of an unsound mind. He agreed, indeed, that idiots and lunatics might not be of much use on such occasions, but he had such an invincible objection to lines of every description, that he could not admit of one, although drawn at the gates of Bedlam. "Let them all vote, therefore," said he, "or they will do no harm."—(A laugh.)—It was not necessary for him to controvert doctrines of this nature, but they were certainly consistent with each other, and he did not think himself uncharitable in saying, that some of the principles promulgated in that House were as visionary though less consistent. It was necessary to make a stand against such wild and chimerical notions; it was the duty of Parliament to expose and reprobate them, to try them by its own better judgment, and to exercise with regard to them its own honest and enlightened conscience. If his own opinions had at all changed on this important subject, it was at least to be ascribed to no personal interest, for the differences which prevailed between him and the dispensers of power were too wide and too radical to permit his approach to it to be at all advanced by this partial surrender of an opinion which he once entertained. To moderate Reform he still was a sincere and zealous adherent, because he thought it founded in moderation and justice.

Mr. PARVILL said a few words in favour of the motion. Mr. CANNING wished to know when it was that Parliament was differently constructed, or acted more effectually for the benefit of the whole community? If there was such a time, it was when the whole face of society was extremely different, and when Parliament operated comparatively but little on the affairs and interests of the public. What order of men was there now which was not virtually represented, and whose interests were not defended when brought in question, with as much skill and ability in that House, as could be collected by any form of election? If the Hon. Baronet meant that the will of the people had not a sufficiently direct operation on the measures of Government, he answered, that Government was not a matter of will, and that it was made for the purpose of restraining that will, in whatever member of the state it might inhere. It was said, the people were not fully represented; and if this only meant that the whole force and authority of the nation was not vested or exercised in that House, he admitted the fact, and trusted he could justify it. Our Constitution was essentially monarchical, and he should be glad to know if every 4,000 men had a delegate or minister acting under their immediate controul in the House of Commons, what room would there be for any other interest in the Constitution? Against the national will thus exercised all resistance by the Crown or the Lords would be vain. These were not the deductions of mere theory, but were proved to demonstration by that portion of our own eventful history, the year 1649, by the abolition of the House of Lords as a separate branch of the legislature, and the conducting the monarch to the scaffold. For his own part, he (Mr. Canning) was willing to rest satisfied under the shelter of the Constitution as established at the Revolution, which had been found hitherto sufficient to secure internal tranquillity and external glory. The Hon. Baronet had acted quite openly and fairly by the House, and in courtesy he (Mr. Canning) would not move that a direct negative be put upon the resolutions, but that the House should proceed to the other orders of the day.

Mr. LAMB supported the amendment, ridiculing Major Cartwright, who had stood forward as the prime mover of Reform, and yet had not been able to understand that the words Brevia Parliamentaria did not mean short Parliaments.—(Hear)

Mr. W. SMITH was glad that this subject had been again brought forward, because every new discussion was one more step to the attainment of Reform; not indeed the Reform proposed by the Hon. Baronet, but rational and discreet Reform.

Sir F. BURDETT, in reply, remarked that had Parliaments been annual, the Long Parliaments would never have existed, nor perhaps would any of the unhappy consequences have resulted which the Right Hon. Gentleman had so deeply deplored. The ground taken by the Right Hon. Gentleman was fair and open—that no evil prevailed, and that no remedy was necessary; but this was a matter of fact, upon which he was at issue with the majority of the subjects of the country. He (Sir Francis Burdett) thought the attack upon the worthy Major uncandid and uncalled for: the ridicule of his ignorance of Latin only showed that his arguments could not be controverted, though his scholarship might be disputed. An Hon. and Learned Gentleman whose eloquence and talents no man would dispute, had not behaved with the same fairness. His speech had been certainly very amusing, but it was far from convincing, and though a sort of salmagundi of sarcasm, argument, verbose jest, and panegyric—(Hear, hear, hear)—the words appeared to be more abundant than the ideas, and the irony than the argument. As to the Hon. Gentleman below (Mr. Lamb), he seemed only alarmed at dangers of his own creation, like children who screamed at hobgoblins which none saw but themselves. He was rejoiced that this great question had been once more discussed, and that the distinctness with which the propositions had been brought forward had been so gratifying to the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Canning): of him it was not, however, to be expected that a convert would be made: he was too well satisfied with the present state of things under which he flourished so luxuriantly: he could see no defect to be remedied, exclaiming in his warm admiration of the perfections of the existing House of Commons—

"I look at thee but with a lover's eye,

"Thou hast no faults, or I no faults can spy;

"Thou art all beauty, or all blindness I."

The gallery was then cleared, and the House divided—For the amendment, 106—Against it, 0—Majority, 106.—Sir F. Burdett and Lord Cochrane were tellers.

The Regency Amendment Bill was committed, read a third time, and passed.

LORD COCHRANE presented a Petition from Mr. W. Cobbeit, in favour of Parliamentary Reform; it was of great length, and when the Clerk had proceeded some way through it, Mr. FAZAKERLEY moved that the House be counted, and as only 16 Members were present, an adjournment took place.

Wednesday, June 3.

BREWERIES.

Mr. LOCKHART brought up the Report of the Committee on the state of Breweries; which stated the opinions of the Committee on various points connected with the brewing trade. The Committee had endeavoured to consider what was the fit price of beer, and they could not find that the prices charged by the 11 great brewers were unfair, or their profits unreasonable. They could not speak in favour of prices at places where the sale of beer was compelled by the proprietors. The Committee had not found that any of the 11 great breweries had mixed any deleterious or unlawful ingredients in the composition of beer. The only instance of that kind which was traced was in the case of Mr. Thomas Menz's house, where salt of tartar, &c. had been found. Malt and hops were the articles used, except what was legal colouring. But though eleven great brewers were innocent, it did not follow that many lesser brewers and publicans were not guilty of the practices complained of. It was thought very difficult to provide an adequate remedy; but it was suggested, that where convictions took place, they should be posted up in the district wherein the offenders dwelt. Under all the circumstances, they had not had means for inquiring sufficiently into the state of country breweries; but they thought that the absorption of more houses by brewers, would tend to destroy competition. Much difficulty arose as to the licensing of free houses; but this was not to be got over so easily as might be desirable, without interfering with the rights of property. They had, therefore, proposed a kind of prospective remedy, suggesting that the Magistracy should be directed to withhold permission for a public-house hereafter found to be property of the description alluded to. They had concluded their report nearly in the words of the Police Committee—that it was fit to break down the spirit of any injurious confederacy.—The Report was ordered to be printed.

WEST INDIA ATROCITIES.

Sir S. ROMILLY moved for papers respecting the Inquest held on the body of a Slave on Hutchinson's Estate, in St. Christopher's.—From Sir Samuel's statement, it appeared that a Slave belonging to the Reverend Henry Rawlins, of Nevis, had ran away, but was taken and flogged. He was afterwards brought out chained to another man, and ordered to work; but was too weak, and fell down. Upon this Rawlins ordered him to be flogged again by two drivers—the consequence was, that the poor creature, being thus flogged in the morning, was found dead in the evening! An Inquest was held, and though the medical man deposed to his various wounds, and that his teeth were beaten out, the verdict was, "Died by the Visitation of God!"—The Driver was afterwards tried, and acquitted; and the Reverend Gentleman was subsequently tried, when he was found Guilty of Manslaughter, and sentenced to a fine of 200*l.* and three months imprisonment.—From all the circumstances, Sir Samuel said, Rawlins was either guilty of murder or he was innocent, and this Lord Bathurst had also observed in a letter to Governor Proby.

Some conversation ensued, in which Mr. WILBERFORCE said, that another case,—that of a female negro, who had been chained to another and flogged in a most inhuman manner while in a state of pregnancy,—would be brought before Parliament.

Sir Samuel's motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

Mr. BROUGHAM brought up the Report of the Committee on this subject, which was ordered to be printed.—He then noticed the amendments which had been made in the Bill in the other House, which, he said, though far from being that wholesome measure which had been sent up by the Commons, he was still disposed to recommend to their adoption. By some of the alterations made, though the Commissioners might call the Trustees of Education Charities before them, they could not compel their attendance. (Hear, hear!) This was the way in which the Bill had been defaced.—Mr. B. then mentioned other alterations the Bill had undergone, all in the same hostile spirit; but he entreated the House not to be disappointed, but to go on and appoint another Committee next year, and much good would result in spite of all such proceedings.—(Cheering.)—Mr. B., in the course of his speech, alluded to proceedings in the Chancery Court, and to the learning, the subtilty, and the delicacy of conscience,—a delicacy without example in any other lawyer,—possessed by the Lord Chancellor! And yet, notwithstanding all these high qualities, he might be allowed to say that there was something in the Court of Chancery that set all calculation of cost and time at defiance; and the irony of Dean Swift was far from being exaggerated, in which he made Gulliver inform his master Houyhynms that his father had been wholly ruined by having gained a Chancery suit with the full costs. With such a mode of proceeding, the small charities would be destroyed, and it would be easily seen what would be the effect upon the larger ones. The time had at length arrived when the unequivocal sense of the people was to be listened to, and their anxious wishes to be fulfilled by a full, unsparing, and unqualified investigation of these notorious and scandalous abuses. But if that House sat still and trusted to that measure alone, they would only send forth the mockery of an inquisition.—After many other observations, Mr. B. moved that an Address be presented to the Prince Regent, praying that he would be pleased to issue a commission to inquire into the state of the Education of the Poor in England and Wales, and to report to his Royal Highness and the House thereupon.

Lord CASTLEREAGH concurred entirely in the propriety of the education of the poor occupying the attention of Parliament after the happy restoration of peace. He, however, reprobated strongly the manner in which the Learned Gentleman had alluded to the Court of Chancery, as a most unfair attempt to run down the legislative character of the country, and he trusted the Learned Gentleman (Sir S. Romilly) would resent the attack. He thought that going to the foot of the throne with such an Address, was calculated to deprive the other branch of the legislature of the fair exercise of its functions. If the motion should be agreed to, there would be in fact three commissions—the royal commission, the legislative one, and the Committee of that House. He thought the motion was one which, on these grounds, should by no means be agreed to, and he should therefore move the previous question.

Sir S. ROMILLY felt himself called upon to speak to this question, in consequence of the direct reference of the Noble Lord. He had been called upon to say, what authority the Court of Chancery possessed. He had no hesitation in saying, that he was convinced it was quite impossible to obtain a remedy in the Court of Chancery for the abuses of charitable institutions. There were expedients of delay which, in such cases, would prove fatal to the object.

After some further debate, Mr. B.'s motion was negatived by 54 to 29.

Mr. BROUGHAM then gave notice, that early in the next Session he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to appoint, if possible, the same Commissioners to inquire into all abuses of charities, by which the property of the poor had been dilapidated and plundered by those who met with the sanction of some, the fellow-feeling of others, and the protection of many, as was obvious from the vote of this night. That vote would no doubt give great satisfaction to persons high in the State, and to many Members of both Houses who were unwilling that these abuses should be investigated.

A conversation now ensued; after which the Lords' Amendments were agreed to.

PANTHEON THEATRE.

Sir F. BURDETT moved that the Petition of Mr. Cundee, complaining that after being put to most heavy expences, and indeed totally ruined, he had been deprived of his licence for this theatre, should be referred to a Committee.

The motion was opposed by Lord YARMOUTH, on the ground that the licence granted had only been a temporary one, and that Italian Operas had been performed at the theatre, for which the licence was not granted.—Mr. B. BATHURST too briefly remarked, that the Lord Chamberlain was not bound to grant a licence for a longer term than he deemed proper.

Sir F. BURDETT made a few remarks in reply, in which he alluded to the situation and size of the Pantheon. He had very frequently lamented, he said, that in the large theatres the powers of the actors were completely lost, the spectators being unable either to hear or see. In the smaller theatres, on the contrary, the performers acted in a simple and natural manner, and it was not, as in the other theatres, an overstrained pantomime.

The motion was withdrawn.—Adjourned till Friday.

Friday, June 5.

Mr. BENNET presented three Petitions from New South Wales, complaining of the conduct of the Governor.—Ordered to be printed.

POLICE, &c.

Mr. BENNET brought up another Report from the Police Committee. It related to Tothill Fields Prison, and the House of Correction in Cold Bath Fields, the Keeper of which (Mr. Adkins) the Hon. Member described as a sensible, honest, and most praiseworthy person.—After some judicious remarks on the erroneous system at present adopted, he moved that the Report be printed.—Ordered.

Sir S. ROMILLY presented a Petition from Roger Cole, complaining of illegal conduct in the Judge of the Insolvent Court, &c. &c.

Mr. BROUGHAM spoke of the situations held by Lord Stewart (Lord Castlereagh's brother) as a Lord of the Bedchamber and Ambassador at Vienna, and asked if their duties could be discharged by the same person?

Lord CASTLEREAGH in reply said, that he did not know an instance wherein an individual had retired from the honour of personal service to the Crown merely in consequence of an appointment to an Embassy.

ALIEN BILL, PICTURE OF PARLIAMENT, &c.

Sir J. MACINTOSH presented a Petition from certain persons in Edinburgh, against the clause added by the House of Lords to the Alien Bill, taking away the right of naturalization which Foreigners had by the possession of 80*l.* stock in the Bank of Scotland, by a Scotch Act of 1695.—The Petition was laid on the table.

On the motion that it be referred to a Committee, a conversation took place, in the course of which Sir S. ROMILLY drew the following picture of the late proceedings in Parliament.—"Let us reflect," he said, "what has been done by the Parliament which must so shortly appear before their Constituents. Let us remember that they are the Parliament which twice suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, in a period of profound peace—that they are the confiding Parliament that allowed Ministers to keep the authority given under the Suspension, expecting that they would be assembled for its discontinuance, till after the period when they themselves supposed it to be necessary—that they are the same Parliament that afterwards consented to indemnify the Noble Lord and his Colleagues for all that they had done—the same that refused to inquire into the cases of those unfortunate men who crowded our table with their Petitions, detailing the wrongs they had endured—the same that sanctioned the system of spies and informers, in destruction of all good faith and honour, and brought us a degree lower in character than ancient France with her Police—the same that sanctioned the Circular of the Secretary of State, and gave to the opinions of Solicitor and Attorney-Generals the effect of the law of the country; that concurred in the practice of fettering before trial persons charged only with political offences, and that shut our ports against distressed foreigners, who might wish to seek an asylum on our shores. We have done all this, and we are about to crown the whole with an act of the most flagrant injustice that ever was committed. I know not who may be our successors; but God grant that we may never again see a Parliament as regardless of the liberties of the people, and as careless of the Constitution, as this Parliament has been." (Loud cheering.)

After much talk, it was at length determined, that, as the clauses in the Alien Bill, added by the Lords, were of the nature of money clauses, and therefore affected the privileges of the Commons, that the amendments should be rejected, and a conference be requested with the Lords to explain.—A Committee was then appointed to act accordingly.

The Poor Laws Amendment Bill was postponed till next Session.—Adjourned.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JUNE 7.

A CURIOUS circumstance has occurred in France. The loan to the Government has not only succeeded, but succeeded so well, that the causes of such overflowing measure naturally excite one's speculation. "It has succeeded," say the papers, "beyond all hope or calculation." The subscription of annuities was opened on the 9th of the month, and were closed on the 27th, when it was found, according to one statement, that they amounted to 2,210,800,000 francs; according to another to 180,000,000 francs; the lower of which sums is twelve times more than the Minister of Finance required. This indeed may well be quoted by the Paris newspapers, and by the private letters, as a manifestation of public confidence, altogether unparalleled in the history of France. The Council of Ministers assembled to deliberate what proportion of the annuities for which he contributed should be granted to each subscriber. On the 30th, the determination of Ministers on this point and on the price at which the new stock should be delivered, was likely to be made known to the public. The house of LAFITTE is said to have offered a contribution of 20 millions of rentes, and that of DE LESSERT 15 millions, either of which subscriptions would have been greater than the national exigency had been estimated to demand.

Now that this is an extraordinary manifestation of confidence is certain; but the question is,—confidence in what? Confidence, it may be answered, in the King's Ministers. But who, it may be asked in reply, are those King's Ministers? To us it appears either the very best or the very worst symptom for his Majesty, that has occurred since the year of the Hegira 1815. The question is, whether this zealous and superabundant loan is made to the Ministers, as Bourboisists or as Bonapartists,—to the Ministers of a dynasty forced back on the country; or to the revolutionary administrators of a people about to have the force taken away.—The loan is undoubtedly to pay off arrears, and to leave more than enough for protection. If we were the King, we should be inclined to compare ourselves to the Sabine who was stifled with gifts of shields.

The Parliament is now on the eve of dissolution; and we shall take our usual advantage of the interval to renew our Literary Notices, and pay greater attention to our valuable Correspondents. In one respect, however, we shall be still more Parliamentary than before, inasmuch as we shall attend to the approaching elections, particularly to those of Westminster, Westmoreland, and other great contested places; for it will now be much more worth our while to discuss questions connected with Parliament, when the old, deaf, perch-losing, grasping Phoenix has expired, and there is a possibility that the new one may set out with better senses. The knowledge of first principles has not been spread abroad in the mean time for nothing. The Borough-mongers made some little shew of consulting the popular will, just before their servants were to return to their constituents; but Mr. BROUGHAM's motion respecting enquiry into the abuses of charities touched the common nature of corruption to the quick, and they felt that the question was connected with too many healthy things to be borne by their Constitution. Enough then of the old Parliament.

As to the cause of Reform, and especially as connected with the representation of Westminster, we have only two opinions to give at present; first, that no candidate professing a zeal for Reform ought to be listened to without pledging himself to endeavour to procure, at least, triennial Parliaments; and second, that with all our respect for his talents, Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, whom there is a rumour of proposing for Westminster, is not the requisite person for that seat;—and we think so, for this, if for no other reason,—that he can still sit in the House as he has done: while so fine an opportunity of making a strong addition both to the number and spirit of the Reformers within doors, ought by no means in the world to be let slip.

The present Parliament was to have closed its career yesterday, but the unhappy culprit's existence has been prolonged for a day or two, on account of the clause introduced into the Alien Bill by the Lords, which having been rejected by the Commons on Friday, a conference has been rendered necessary with the conflicting parties. The preparations for the procession of the PRINCE REGENT to the House of Lords yesterday had been actually begun, when about noon the order arrived for their discontinuance. "The disappointment (says the Courier) to a great number of beautiful, elegantly dressed females, was very great. They knew not of the putting off the prorogation till after they had reached the House of Lords."—A great variety of reports (adds the same paper) were in circulation this morning—one, that the QUEEN had been taken suddenly ill; another, that an alteration for the worse had been discovered in the King's health. Neither of these reports is true. The only cause for the delay is the one we have stated above."

On the state of the QUEEN, the Sun of last night says—"We feel deep regret in stating that our amiable and revered QUEEN had a relapse yesterday, and the most alarming accounts of the event of this relapse, we are assured, were whispered in the higher circles this day.—From our own inquiries, however, we have the pleasure to state, that we have reason to believe they are without foundation."

Major MOODIE arrived this morning early from St. Helena, with despatches; but, we understand, brought no intelligence of any importance.—Courier—Saturday.

The Morning Chronicle contains an extract of a letter from St. Helena, which relates, that two prints of young NAPOLEON had arrived there, but "as the sight of his beautiful son might afford too much satisfaction to NAPOLEON in his misfortunes, that slender consolation was denied to a father, and they have been detained at Plantation House."

The Hon. D. KINNAIRD, a friend of Sir F. BURDITT, it is said, has been invited to offer himself for Westminster.

We understand that Sir S. ROMILLY has been applied to by several gentlemen and the most respectable tradesmen and inhabitants of Westminster, to represent that city in the ensuing Parliament.—Times.

A "Constant Reader" is desirous of knowing if any Correspondent can inform him whether there is a reasonable prospect of the Commission being appointed and put into action, which the motion of Sir JAMES MACINTOSH made some weeks ago in the House of Commons, for enquiry and examination into the proposals for improvement of the Bank-note and the prevention of forgery, all of which the Bank for these last 20 years have been graciously rejecting! or whether the whole affair is likely still to end in smoke, through some juggle of the Bank Directors? His reason for asking the question is, knowing that several persons, with views of considerable promise, are intending to offer them to the Commission, who will not to the Bank Directors.

We lately noticed the dreadful death of Miss SHEETWIN, who was thrown from a chaise, owing to the hard driving of Lord S. CHURCHILL. We are informed, but can hardly believe the relation, that though this young Nobleman was fully aware of the shocking death of the lady, he, on the very evening of the catastrophe, attended a public ball!

SAMUEL WESLEY THE MUSICIAN.—A Concert is to take place, we understand, in a week or two, for the benefit of the celebrated SAMUEL WESLEY, who for some time past has been totally prevented from attending to his profession by a most painful illness.—Luckily, music begins to be so well appreciated nowadays, and the lovers of it are so likely to feel the other finer impulses of their nature, that it is only necessary to mention such a circumstance in order to excite the requisite attention to it. We shall, however, indulge ourselves with another notice of this subject, in order to express our sense of the particular merits of this profound musician, and of the kindness of such of his brother Professors as mean to come forward in his behalf.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

About five o'clock on Sunday afternoon the Prince of Hesse Homboërg, the Duke and Duchess of CAMBRIDGE, followed by the venerable Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and a Lady in waiting, entered at Hyde Park Corner. The illustrious party were on foot, and entirely unattended. The Duchess, who appeared in excellent health, was dressed in white sprigged muslin, with deep flounces of very elegant point lace, over which was thrown a scarlet Cachemire shawl. The bonnet was of lilac satin, adorned with flowers. His Royal Highness was instantly recognised, and for some time, both himself and the Duchess seemed highly delighted with the gay scene, and returned the innumerable salutations which were made them, with the utmost courtesy. The scene, however, soon took a different turn, for they had scarcely gone over the road, and entered upon the Wellington Promenade, when they were "hemmed in like an Olympian wrestling," and her Royal Highness received a practical illustration of that vulgarly intense curiosity which is but too characteristic of our English populace. Arrived in the street, their persecutions were by no means diminished; an immense crowd of pedestrians, flanked by innumerable horsemen and a number of carriages, still closely invested them, all the way down Park-lane, to their house in South Audley-street, raising a cloud of dust, which made it impossible to see to a distance of ten yards. At the door of the house, upwards of two hundred women were collected on the steps and railing; and, as the illustrious party entered, a loud shout was raised by the mob. Doubtless his Royal Highness repented the adventure; and will not speedily recommend another Sunday promenade in the Park. The Duchess several times appeared not only astonished, but absolutely terrified.—Daily paper.

The re-marriage of the Duke and Duchess of CAMBRIDGE, according to the rites of the English Church, took place on Monday. The hour appointed was five o'clock, but this was afterwards changed to two o'clock, as the Lord Chancellor had signified his inability of attending. At two, therefore, the Queen's blue drawing-room was filled with the marriage guests, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of LIVERPOOL, Viscount SIDMOUTH, Viscount CASTLEREAGH, the Bishop of London, the Ladies of the Bedchamber, with a long list of attendant Ladies and Gentlemen not worth enumerating. The Duke and Duchess of CAMBRIDGE, accompanied by the father of the latter, arrived three minutes before two o'clock, in state. The Duke wore a Field-Marshal's uniform. The dress of the Duchess was of silver tissue; her petticoat, says the Court Circular, had two deep flounces of rich white lace. The Duke of CLARENCE arrived next, in the same carriage with the Duke and Duchess of YORK. Then came the Duke and Duchess of GLOUCESTER, and afterwards the Princess SOPHIA of GLOUCESTER. The PRINCE REGENT came last: his Royal Highness wore a Field-Marshal's uniform and five orders. The Princess AUGUSTA and the Princess and Prince of HESSE-HOMBURG were also present. Just after the arrival of his Royal Highness, Mr. NICHOLS, the King's Preceptor, announced that the marriage ceremony could not proceed: first, because the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had not been apprized of the change of the hour from five to two, could not be present; and, secondly, because the Royal license would not be ready till five o'clock. The ceremony was postponed till five. Meeting the Archbishop of Canterbury was quite ignorant of what had passed: he had been attending an examination of a school for orphans, from which he was returning about four o'clock, when he was met by Lord SIDMOUTH, who informed him of the unpleasant delay that had occurred. His Grace made all due haste, and at half-past four was at the Queen's Palace, where the marriage ceremony was at last performed. Himself and the Bishop of London, officiating.—As soon as the ceremony was concluded, at a signal given from the Palace, a double salute of cannon was fired from the Parade. In the evening the Prince REGENT gave a grand dinner on the occasion.

The Princess and Prince of HESSE-HOMBURG were to have left town on Tuesday, but the REGENT prevailed on them to stay till after his dress party. Wednesday morning every preparation had been made for the departure of the Prince and his Bride.—The Duchesses of GLOUCESTER and CAMBRIDGE had been some hours at the Queen's Palace, endeavouring to anticipate the poignancy of the separation; but nevertheless, her MAJESTY and the Princesses were deeply affected. Their tears were excessive; and when at length, after prolonged distressing fits of sobs, the Princess tore herself away from her beloved parent, and descended to the carriage, leaning on the arm of Lady ELIZABETH MONTAGUE, she wept audibly. The Duchesses remained with her MAJESTY, whose grief was so intense, as to require all their attention and consolation.—(This is the account given in the Courier—while the Times says, that the Princess did not see the Queen on Wednesday, it being judged better to avoid the distress of a formal parting).—The royal pair entered their carriage at half-past one o'clock, and proceeded on their way to Brighton. The arrangement is, for the Princess and Prince to remain there about a week, when they proceed to Dover, in order to embark in the Royal Sovereign yacht.

Thursday was the birth-day of the King, when his MAJESTY completed his 80th year. The usual marks of congratulation were observed, such as the ringing of bells, the displaying of flags, and the illumination of the public buildings. Among the other ceremonies, one of the most striking is the procession of the Mail-coaches, which start on this day, all new, and the best horses. They were very splendid, and took their usual route through the principal streets, to the great admiration of the populace. On passing Carlton-house, they were seen by the PRINCE REGENT, who had just arrived in his buggy. His Royal Highness acknowledged their salute by taking off his hat.

ITALIAN OPERA.

Our expectations were very much raised in going to hear CIMAROSA's Opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto, last Saturday week; but we regret to say, they were equally disappointed. Our brother critics, we perceive, have as little to say for it. We dislike to find fault with an Italian composer, because we think the taste of his country unrivalled in one great respect, which is sentiment;—and because it appears to us much undervalued at present, owing to the tempting riches of German harmony. But we missed in the Opera before us what in an Italian composer of celebrity we had a right to look for,—sentiment in general, and beautiful melodies in particular. The Opera itself is a wretched abridgment of our play of the Clandestine Marriage, openly taking the materials, and yet mangleing them down into shapelessness and want of character like stolen plate. Thus the best thing in the original, the tendering old lover and fine gentleman, is turned into a middle-aged non-entity, neither tottering, nor fine, nor any thing else. The music seems to have been subdued to the melody of the dialogue. It is marked with nothing at all. There is neither German richness nor Italian sentiment in it, neither harmony nor air.—no original melodies like Figaro, nor voluptuous ones like Sacchini, nor plagiarisms carried off with a spirit that almost makes them new again, like Rossini. The most admired air in the piece, Pria che spunti in ciel l'Aurora, is to us, we must confess, a great deal too literal as well as important. We cannot hear of post-coaches being got ready so pompously, and horses galloping to such very illustrative notes, with any of the grave admiration desired of us. Yet this opera, they say, is a favourite with the Italians. Not very lately, we hope,—since their tastes have been shaken up in common with the rest of the world; and till very lately, we know that their tastes were remarkable for nothing but their exceeding kindness and toleration, taking POMPEO BATTONI for a great painter, BETTINELLI for a fine poet, and METASTASIO for an absolute periwigged Apollo.

The performance pleased us, upon the whole, as little as the thing performed,—one of the natural consequences of having had elements to work upon. None of the Singers produced an effect; not even Madame FONDA. Signor GARCIA went running about in vain with his gratuitous notes, like a dog that scampers about ten miles to his master's one; and in this respect indeed, it must be allowed that we heard CIMAROSA to disadvantage; for the progress of the melody was rendered scarcely perceivable through the dust of Signor GARCIA's gambols. A Signora GARCIA appeared for the first time in a subordinate character, probably as a substitute for Miss HUGHES, whom she appears to excel as much in looks as she is inferior to in music. NALDI was little better than a sort of old mask; and as to poor AMBROGETTI, we never saw him at such a loss before as in that hitherto unknown Englishman, Count Robinson,—the non-entity above mentioned. In default of it's affording him any thing to do, he dressed it up in a large square-cut coat, a prodigious powdered head of hair brushed forward, and a neckcloth "voluminous and vast." He looked more like an excessive footman than any thing else, an effervescent suit of clothes, a sort of wardrobe personified, a full-dressed surfeit, an absolute Nethora of haberdashery.

The "revived grand ballet of Tamerlane and Bajazet" is like most of the other saltatory productions of late days,—prodigiously grand, heavy, gratuitous, and obscure. There is first a little bit of an appearance of a story, then a great deal of dancing or rather twirling that has nothing to do with it,—then a little glimpse again of a story, by the favour of a stalking and threatening tyrant and a drooping but active lady,—then the twirls again,—then the tyrant,—and then again and again the twirls. But the subscribers, we see, are enquiring into the falling off of the entertainments this year; and we leave the manager for the present to settle the matter with them. He has no doubt a difficult task; but does he not make the fatal mistake of supposing, that the audience in reality care little about the goodness of the entertainment, and come there only to see and be seen? We think it likely, because others make the same mistake; and a manager, who finds economy a desirable thing, is likely on many accounts to fall into it. But that it is a mistake, we are certain. The taste for music has been reviving for some time past; a great deal of good music has been brought into the country, and made popular; and even if the whole audience at the opera does not relish good entertainments as it might, it likes to have the consciousness that such productions are awaiting its attention; and moreover, it can find itself very much tired and displeased with bad ones, as well as its liberality offended by having bad performances and performers pained upon it for good.

We find by the Papers that there was a new female performer in the Divertissement; but not being aware of this beforehand, we are sorry we did not attend to the young lady, who is said to be a very promising dancer. In default however of being able to do justice to one person, we take this opportunity of observing, that there is a youth who takes a prominent part among the under dancers, that appears to us to be extremely worthy of encouragement. We do not know his name; nor have we any means of pointing him out, except by mentioning that he has a lively handsome face, a darker head of hair than most of the others, and we think, generally dresses in lighter colours;—but the attentive observer will easily discover him by the superior grace of his movements, and by an air of greater readiness and cheerfulness, as if he took delight in his task,—which is always an accompaniment of real ability.

DRURY-LANE.

Mr. KEAN has appeared in a new character this week,—that of King John. It is not one of his happiest performances; but the disclosure of his murderous wishes to Hubert, and his satisfaction at seeing his hints adopted, were very fine and true, and mingled with those touches of familiarity which he gives in a more real manner than any other tragedian. They were not contradicted by an over-appearance of stage royalty,—an appearance unsuitable to the character of this prince in particular, whose low stature is also suited by Mr. KEAN. The worst part of the performance was one in which our striking actor is accustomed to excel,—the dying scene. He went off somewhat too unapparently, so that persons at a distance, and unacquainted with the particular passage, might have supposed him not dead; and the speech of Falconbridge seemed to conclude the piece abruptly. This is one of the bad consequences of overgrown theatres.

COVENT-GARDEN.

A serious piece in two acts has been produced here, called the Castle of Paluzzi or the Extorted Oath, the leading incidents of which were suggested by the late extraordinary business of FUALDES in France. The scene however is transferred to Italy; and the author, besides writing a little more ambitiously than is usual in after-pieces, has the merit of having turned the unaccountable origin of the real tragedy into a clear and not uninteresting story. Count Salviati (MACREADY), perverted from his better principles by a passion for the object of another man's affections, had contrived with the assistance of a desperate character to get the latter out of the way,—to disgrace and exile him. He has just married the lady, (Mrs. FAUCETT) when it is discovered that the first lover (ANNOT) has returned, and has had interviews with the lady, to whom indeed he has entrusted papers which clear his character, but which he proposes to leave unpublished for her sake. Salviati however, ignorant of this intention, roused to alarm by his confederate, and above all, maddened by jealousy, consents to join in murdering him. The deed is accordingly perpetrated at Paluzzi, where their object had tried to conceal himself, and whither the Countess had gone just before to have an interview with him. She sees the murder by chance, as Madame Manson did, and being discovered also, is made to take an oath in a similar manner not to reveal it. Her maid-servant however, who came with her, and is not discovered, sees the murder also in a great looking-glass which is opposite to the room in which it is being perpetrated; and this is one of the best as well as worst managed incidents in the piece, for the spectator concludes that while the wife keeps her husband's secret, the maid-servant is ultimately induced to give it up; yet at the trial which speedily ensues, a dagger with the Count's name on it (an old incident) is made the means of the discovery, and the piece is terminated by his plunging it in his breast. The object seems to have been to make the girl keep her mistress's secret, as well as the wife her husband's; and this is all very well, though somewhat over-wrought when we consider the lives of both are at stake; but the best way, we think, would have been, to let the secret unwittingly escape somehow or other from the girl's mouth.—There is some very pretty dancing in the course of the piece by Mr. NOBLE and Miss LUPINO, and the three Miss DESHAYES. The latter, whose performances it was natural to over-rate, both from their youth, and their equality of age, manner, and appearance, danced on this occasion with more real feeling of their art than we have yet witnessed. The two former are always alive to it. They are worthy of the poetical times of DESHAYES.

MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE AND PERFORMERS OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

On Saturday week a meeting, consisting of most of the Committee and performers of Drury-lane Theatre, took place in the Saloon. There were present Lord Yarmouth, Mr. P. Moore, &c.

Mr. PETER MOORE stated, that the circumstances of the theatre were such as to render it impossible to go on without a very material change in the receipts; and as that could not be contemplated, it became necessary to make an application to those who had large salaries, with the view of continuing the existence of the concern. He took this opportunity of bearing testimony to the talents of the performers, whose abilities were universally acknowledged, and of admitting that they were fully entitled to the salaries they were paid. The proposition was, that each performer who had upwards of 4*l.* a week should allow a reduction to take place. The graduation should take place according to the extent of the salary. In that of some one-fourth, of others one-third, and in others, where the salaries were very great, one-half.

A conversation took place.

It was then intimated to the Committee, that the performers wished to be left to themselves, in order to come to a regular decision.—The Committee withdrew, and the proposition was negatived, there being about five hands for it, and 30 against it.

Immediately after the decision, all the lower orders about the theatre, rushed into the saloon, and seemed willing to promote the views of the Committee by their votes; but it was too late.

A large body of the proprietors of Drury-lane Theatre met on Tuesday, to hear the reports of their General and Sub-committee. The two reports were equally decided in their description of the ruined state of the finances of the concern: the debts were calculated at 80,000*l.*, and the loss per night was averaged at 100*l.* To close or let the theatre seemed the only alternative, and as a purchaser could scarcely be expected to come forward under present circumstances, it seemed to be considered as the most advisable step to keep the theatre closed, after the present season, till the incumbrances upon it were removed or alleviated. Meanwhile, the Bill now before Parliament was recommended, with certain modifications, as the only mode of raising money, and, consequently, the only means of saving the theatre from instant ruin.—Mr. KEAN, in the course of the discussion, stated that though as an actor he must repel the degrading proposal of reducing the salaries of the performers, yet he and his brotherhood felt so much for the impoverished state of the theatre, that they had offered to play three weeks gratuitously. This offer, however, had been rejected. As a proof that he did not despair of the theatre, if properly managed, he had just purchased another 500*l.* share.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

It has ever been the practice of the great masters to analyse and to build upon the works of preceding genius; in order that, from the experience of others in the study of nature, they might shorten their labours and invigorate their performances in the same noble study, by the infusion of a reflected and kindred feeling. Thus RAFAEL, in his best works, shews that he painted not only in Nature's own divine light, in the luminousness of genius, which is the extraordinary power of exhibiting with energy what is felt within and seen without, but also in the light of knowledge reflected from the vivid minds and practice of others. By this means they perfected those wonders in picture which surpass all besides. By MASSACCIO he was assisted to look inquisitively into the actual physiognomies and expressions of life; by BARTOLOMEO, to draw perspective, and the graces of drapery; by MICHAEL ANGELO, to draw with accuracy, and to display enthusiastic action; and by the ANTIQUE, to design with select grace and beautiful proportion. The same principle of deriving assistance from the powers and discoveries of others, actuated MICHAEL ANGELO, TITIAN, and all distinguished painters; and is, indeed, one of the prime sources of that progressive excellence which human genius has reached in every Art and Science. It is a principle which is acted upon by our Artists at this time; in most, if not all of whom, we think we can trace the favourite objects of their study and regard. In looking, for instance, at Mr. HOFFLAND's pictures, we cannot avoid seeing, that while he paints our English Landscape, he is enamoured of CLAUDE and POUSSIN; and that under the primary impressions he derives from the peculiarities of English scenery, and the assistance one of those celebrated Artists, he has been every year growing in the graces of landscape-painting. Thus the large touch and masses in the building, trees, sky, &c. and vigorous effect of 182, Goodrich Castle, Evening, shew a mind impressed by the genius of POUSSIN and the greater power of Nature; while the melting tones and elegant composition of 221, Patterdale, Morning; 234, A Landscape, Evening; and 226, The Head of Windermere, shew a taste refined by the standard of the unequalled

Italian. Mr. HOFFLAND, too, like those painters, delights in the clearest atmospheres and objects of selectest beauty, and in those bright effects which are produced by every degree of shade and light. His skies are as they should be, almost always very light, compared to the brightest masses of light on the earth. So it is in nature. He wants a somewhat greater diversity of touch in his trees, &c.

We must here express our approbation of the light which Mr. PHILLIPS, Mr. OWEN, Mr. SHEP, and indeed nearly all our best painters, have introduced into the back grounds of their full and half-length portraits. To Mr. JACKSON's admirable Lord Grosvenor, it assists in giving decision to the figure, prevents the white ermine, &c. from being too attractive, and the paleness of his Lordship's intellectual face from looking particular. This is a beauty, and more natural than the endless gloom usual in the back-grounds of our painters. If properly managed, a more powerful, and a much more pleasing because more lively effect may be produced by light than dark skies in almost all portraits. This principle of a large portion of light, especially in the skies, Mr. COOPER is now alive to, in his admirable paintings of animals; and it is charmingly exemplified also by Messrs. TURNER, CALCOTT, COLLINS, DEWINT, &c. and by Mr. WILKIE, in his delicious cabinet picture of 110, The Post-boy, to which we refer nearly the whole of our Artists, as to a school of delicate pencilling. It has his usual masterly character and a capital out-door atmosphere, as has his picture of Walter Scott, Esq. and his Family.

There is a delicate pencilling, good colour and drawing, in 121, Portrait of Himself, F. FERRIERE. Mr. CONSTABLE gives, with advanced power, the general effect and proper proportion of light, colour, and form, in his landscapes. Mr. GLOVER has rather a frivolous pencilling and predominance of yellow in some of his landscapes, but they have impressive tones. His Chepstow Castle is justly praised by the tasteful for its sunshine and its exactness.

When we were praising in our last the good flesh tints, we ought to have included in that scarce beauty, Mr. PIERCEGILL's Portraits, which have also as good likenesses and drawing. Mr. LANE's Portraits have a propriety of look that belongs to the respective objects, and a style of execution and colour, that implies much intellectual practice. He has given surprising exactness to the shewy military dress of 352, Major Gurnham, but we prefer the tinsel decorations of dress when more as accessory than principal. Of all the painters that we recollect, REMBRANDT managed these matters best. He almost always kept them in a low key, except when they were conducive to the greater brilliancy of an important light. They never attracted undue notice from the head or chief object.

The Guy Faux Commemoration appears to be gradually and very properly dying away, but Mr. WITHERINGTON seems determined that it shall last on canvas as long as the pictorial materials with which it is described. Solidity of effect, richness of colour, and the pleasure that will always be derived from viewing the eager and simple character of childhood, will give it decided interest when Guy Faux is no longer paraded in effigy.—The Venetian Curiosity Shop, 308, shews that Mrs. ANSTEE has an excellent eye for Venetian colouring.—At the sight of Mr. WARD's animal paintings, we were awakened to a new, sudden, and gratifying stirring up of our picture-loving feelings, by an uncommon portion of that day-light we have been recommending, and by his surprising bravura of hand.

There is a pleasant sedateness of feeling excited by Mr. ALLSTON's Hernia and Helena, 140. Its unassuming colour and cheerful light, its elegant dresses and more elegant females,—elegant in mind as well as person,—its scene of seclusion, the connected position, studious and kindly looks of the young friends as they hold the same book to read from, give us a charming picture of friendship.

SIR J. F. LEICESTER'S GALLERY.

The great importance to the native genius which must arise from the first public opening of a Gallery of British Paintings, by a patron of consideration in rank and influence, has given a new and extraordinary feature of interest to the present state of the Fine Arts in England. One evidence of this, was in the increased influx of visitors to Sir J. Leicester's Gallery on every successive day of exhibition, so that on the closing day, last Monday week, the rooms were almost a compact mass of persons, of high respectability, and many of distinction in the literary, political, and pictorial world. Did we not anticipate, as we do, infinite benefit to the growing genius of our country by the impressive species of encouragement which Sir J. LEICESTER has added to his former extensive patronage, we should be struck with the marked and new honour which he thus confers on merit, binding with his own munificent hand a fresh, conspicuous, and beautiful wreath on the noble brow of British genius. Had not the Exhibitions and Publications of Art necessarily demanded our attention, we should have given more detailed and continued notices of the pictures. The next season, we trust, will afford us an opportunity of doing this, as we shall commence them earlier; for we can scarcely, we think, appropriate a portion of our paper to a more delightful subject, than that which is presented to us by beautiful imitations of glorious Nature, mental and physical, the result of the fine and ardent sensibilities, and educated tastes, and industrious practice of our painters. We shall then, too, have the additional pleasure of describing the new pictures, which Sir JOHN has commissioned from the pencils of HILTON, FUSELI, CALLCOTT, &c. as well as the grand subject which has recently ennobled the Gallery from the hand of the President. As an humble organ of the feelings of the republic of Art, we conclude for the season this interesting subject, with the warmest thanks and best wishes to its highly esteemed patron.

R. H.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

SIR,—Observing a portion of your paper dedicated to articles on the Fine Arts, I am encouraged to hope that you will give a place to the following observations; and I confide them to you with the more confidence, because, while you exercise your judgment in descending on the finest works of the old Masters, you do not endeavour to depreciate the modern School of Art, by instituting a comparison between the rich collection of three centuries, and the annual production of a British Exhibition.—I am, Sir, your constant reader,

PHILOTECHNES.

In surveying the different Exhibitions, which at this season are opened to the public, we cannot behold without admiration the noble collection of pictures which the connoisseurs and patrons of Art have deposited in the British Gallery. One feels, indeed, a degree of national pride and exultation in reflecting on the princely wealth which has been expended in the purchase of these treasures, the fine taste displayed in their selection, and on the noble liberality with which they are offered for the instruction and amusement of the public. And when we find Royalty itself in the list of those who have been thus active in contributing to public gratification, it cannot fail to excite in our minds corresponding sentiments of gratitude and admiration. Amongst the different works which compose this splendid collection, the Cartoons unquestionably hold the highest rank. The contemplation of these sublime performances, is like the perusal of the works of HOMER and MILTON; the mind is lifted above its own sphere, and, by the borrowed aid of genius, is raised to an elevation which, by its own power, it could never have obtained. They are, indeed, inestimable; not only as models of art, but as being calculated to form that severity of taste which can alone lead to a true feeling of the sublime. Of the other great masters whose works adorn this Gallery, GUIDO holds the second place. In his Assumption of the Virgin, the sublime character of the heads, the devout expression of the countenances, and the simple grace of the figure, are unrivalled. The adjoining picture, by MURILLO, on the same subject, is also beautiful; but when compared with that of GUIDO, we feel the difference between beauty human and celestial. It is like comparing the Medicean Venus with the Belvidere Apollo;—the one may be only mortal, but the other must be divine. A corresponding difference may perhaps be felt, on comparing the Magdalen of GUIDO with that of DOMENICHINO, in this collection, although the latter is certainly a picture of transcendent merit. Among other great works of the Italian School, the exquisite picture of the Virgin and Child, by LEO DA VINCI, is painted in the best manner of that extraordinary artist; uniting brilliancy with chastity, and delicacy with grandeur. The execution of this picture shews, that it is possible to be minute without littleness, and delicate without feebleness; and is particularly worthy of the attention of those who fancy, that what is loose is grand, and what is indistinct, sublime. Of RUBENS, there are various specimens, which exhibit in a conspicuous manner the beauties and defects of that great master. The picture of the Lioness is, perhaps, the most perfect delineation of brutal nature which the Art has produced: the canvas lives,—and the spectator trembles at the ferocious wantonness of the savage. His sketch of the "Raising of the Cross," is also a masterly performance; exhibiting that freedom of design, that force of expression, and brilliancy of colouring, for which he is so eminently distinguished; depreciated, however, by that vulgarity of nature, which arises from the want of the beau idéal. On this account, his "Woman taken in Adultery" suffers from a comparison with the rival picture of PORDENONE, in which the subject is touched with all the delicacy, chastity, and dignity of the Italian School. A similar observation applies to CARACCI's picture of Lot and his Daughters, in which the fine taste of the artist redeems the offensiveness of the subject. Of CUYP, there are landscapes which are above all price. That which is marked 85, the property of the Marquis of BUTE, is painted with admirable truth and nature, and has that clear and pellucid atmosphere which we see in the best pictures of this master. The magnificent landscapes of CLAUDE, in this collection, acquire an additional value from the few pictures of his painting that remain in so perfect a state: the mind is employed in contemplating the grandeur of his scenes, while the eye is delighted with the sweetness and variety of his tints. The landscapes of BERGHEM are of the highest order; and if this artist had lived more in Italy, his style would probably have formed a happy medium between the correct taste of GASPARD POUSSIN, and the irregular sublimity of SALVATOR ROSA. The works of the Flemish and Dutch Schools, and in particular of TENIERS, are absolutely chef-d'œuvres. It is superfluous to praise the pictures of this incomparable artist; but what must have been the riches of that pencil, which could afford such a piece as his "Merry-making" for the cover of a harpsichord? Without enumerating, however, all the treasures of these Schools, it is impossible to pass without notice the exquisite fruit-piece and flower-piece of VON HUYSUM, which are perhaps, in their kinds, the perfection of art; and we very much doubt whether the birds of ZEUXIS were ever enticed by such grapes as those of VON HUYSUM.

From the Justiniani Collection,—the Borghese Palace; the Orleans Collection,—the Aldobrandini and Corsini Palaces,—many of the best specimens have been obtained; and we are justified in asserting, that this collection is not only the finest which has been exhibited in this metropolis, but is superior to any other in Europe. It has, indeed, been lamented that we have not a National Gallery; but the British Gallery has more than supplied this defect, because no National Gallery would be likely to contain so many treasures of Art, as have been presented by the successive exhibitions of the British Institution. To the artists of this country they are inestimable; and with regard to the public, we know not how it can sufficiently evince its gratitude towards those distinguished persons, who thus graciously contribute to the improvement of Art, and to the cultivation of national taste.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

On Monday a meeting of the electors of Westminster, in the interest of Mr. Hunt, was held at the Crown and Anchor, for the purpose of adopting the most effectual means to ensure the election of that gentleman for Westminster. One o'clock was the hour fixed on for taking the chair, but at that time the company was not very numerous; and the chair was not taken until about half-past one, when Mr. Hunt, with Messrs. Preston, Sherwin, and Gale Jones, entered amidst applause.

Mr. ELLIOTT was called to the chair, and read the requisition for calling the meeting.

Mr. HARDING proposed Mr. Hunt as a fit and proper person to be returned to Parliament for Westminster, and recommended the formation of parochial committees to secure his election. The motion was favourably received, and a string of resolutions in furtherance of the main object was next put and carried.

The CHAIRMAN then read several letters from different parts of the country, promising pecuniary support in favour of Mr. Hunt, as the firm advocate of annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and election by ballot.

Mr. GALE JONES addressed the meeting, earnestly recommending Mr. Hunt to the support of all the honest electors.

Mr. HUNT rose amidst loud cheering. He felt he was in an assembly of Englishmen, and therefore of friends. There were many persons better qualified in point of rank and talent than himself to make a struggle for the people's rights; but as they did not offer themselves, he felt it his duty to come forth from his rural retirement, and labour in behalf of the people. He would hold out during the whole of the contest for Westminster, for the whole fifteen days that he could stand there. It would be the first time a candidate offered himself on the broad principles of universal freedom, and from those principles nothing should ever induce him to depart; and if he was returned to the House of Commons—not the honourable, but the dishonourable House—he would never be beaten down by the clamour or the sneers of Lord Castlereagh or his party. The first thing he would do, would be to move the standing order, that the members should meet every morning at nine o'clock, instead of doing their dirty work, as thieves did, in the dark. There was not one man there who either read the Petitions of the people or made the clerk read them; but after having been drawn up with the utmost care, they were thrown into a bag and forgotten. If he were in the House of Commons, he would take care that Petitions should be differently dealt with. He was a man of an humble fortune, but humble as it was, it was sufficient for all his wants; and he would never touch one shilling of the people's money so long as he lived. He was willing to be the servant of the public, but he never would be the servant of any body else. If he was returned, he would be always at his post, and the Speaker should never take the chair without seeing him there; and whenever it was not in his power to do his duty, he would resign his place. He had been accused of violence; but he defied any man to prove that he had ever tyrannized over any body, either a servant or any body else. The reason he did not offer himself for Bristol was, because a certain number of virtuous men there, who felt all the corruptions of the place, assured him that it would be impossible to secure his election; and therefore it was recommended to him to offer himself for a place that was really free—that was his reason for offering himself for Westminster. He had it on the authority of Major Cartwright and others, that Sir F. Burrell had declared himself the friend of Universal Suffrage. He had the same authority for saying that Lord F. Leighton, the son of a borough-monger, was the advocate of Universal Suffrage. He heard that Ministers intended to set up Sir George Cockburn, the officer who took out the brave Napoleon to St. Helena. He anxiously hoped they would do so; he should be happy to see Sir George on the hustings; and he would bring a well-armed vessel, bomb-proof, with him, or he should be soon beaten out of the sea.

Mr. HARDING strongly recommended to every elector to subscribe his mite towards defraying the expenses of the election.

Another Meeting of the Electors took place on Thursday, when Mr. STURCH took the Chair. It was for the purpose of receiving Lord Cochrane's declaration of his intention to retire from the representation of the city, and to consider of proper persons to be elected to serve in the ensuing Parliament.—Mr. Sturch, in a short and sensible speech, stated the object of the meeting, remarking, in the course of it, that with regard to the most effectual mode of representation, whether by extending the suffrage to a certain extent, or making it universal, much doubt existed; and his own sentiments differed from those of men who possessed talents far greater than his own. In one point, however, they were probably all agreed—that the state of the representation was at present a misrepresentation of the interests, and a mock representation of the wishes of the people.—(Applause.)—It was not for him to suggest on whom their preference might be bestowed, in supplying the vacancy created by Lord Cochrane's retirement, but he hoped it would be accompanied by a maintenance of those pure principles on which the elections in Westminster had been now so long conducted, namely, by the voluntary exertions of the electors themselves, and without expense to the object of their choice.—(Applause.)

Lord COCHRANE took his leave of the Electors in an Address, in which he told them, that as long as the people of England expected any good from the House of Commons, they never would recover their liberties. He was about to leave his country for some time. (Here he became deeply affected, and was loudly cheered.) They would excuse his feelings; he was grieved—not to leave the builders of churches; they built them with money taken out of other men's pockets—not to leave the propagators of Christianity; for he knew them to be wicked men—not to leave tax-gatherers and tax-eaters; they were the caterpillars of the land, fit only to be destroyed—not the hirers of spies to lead men into traps—not the men who cut off the heads, and tore out the bowels of Englishmen, in order to justify their own oppressive measures (immense applause); but he was grieved to leave the land in which were interred the bones of his ancestors, of those who fought for the liberty of their countrymen; he was grieved to leave his native country oppressed and plundered by men without feeling and without discretion. (Long continued shouts of applause.)—But when he left his country, he left not the cause of freedom.—(Applause.)—He hoped he should be excused for alluding to his own sufferings. (Much cheering.)—The foulest conspiracy had been formed against him; it had been successful by the perjury of witnesses, the corruption of juries, and the baseness of judges; he had thought the whole world had forsaken him. At that moment the electors of Westminster had shown a generosity of feeling which quite overpowered him. (Here his Lordship wept, and the Meeting was much affected.)—He had hoped, to have laid a statement of his case before them ere now, but they should have it soon. When he had been imprisoned at that time, a message had been sent to him, from the highest authority, to assure him that if he would agree to leave the kingdom, he should have his liberty immediately; but sooner would he have lost his life than left the kingdom on such terms. (Applause.)—He now left the kingdom, however, in different circumstances, and for a different cause. He concluded by thanking them for their long and generous support, when persecution and perjury had almost overwhelmed him. He could never forget their kindness; the last feeling of his heart would be a feeling of gratitude to the electors of Westminster.—[The Noble Lord withdrew, and the Meeting continued for some time to express the strongest attachment.]

Mr. WALKER then moved a vote of thanks to the Noble Lord "for his steady conduct in supporting radical Reform, his many services in the cause of human freedom, and his magnanimity in declining the pre-eminent honour of representing that city, when circumstances did not allow him any longer to fulfil the duties of the station."—This resolution was unanimously adopted.

A person now sprung on the table, and proposed Mr. Henry Hunt as a fit Representative of Westminster.

This was followed by the most confused vociferation.

Mr. GALE JONES seconded the motion, declaring, that there was nothing either in the public principles or private conduct of Mr. Hunt to which any rational objection could be raised. Mr. Jones was proceeding to justify Mr. Hunt's political conduct, when he was assailed by a clamour which continued for a long time, more or less vehement. The Chairman interposed his authority in vain, and as a last resource, put it to the vote, whether Mr. Jones should be allowed to proceed or not. This he decided in the affirmative, but the decision was vain. After another ineffectual exertion, aided by three swings of Mr. Hunt's hat over his head, Mr. Jones reluctantly retired.

The CHAIRMAN now declared, that, as he found it impossible to preserve order, he felt it his duty to announce, that as far as he was concerned, the meeting was at an end.

A general movement followed, and all the persons who originally called the meeting quitted the room. During the disorder Mr. Hunt and his friends took possession of the table. Several persons endeavoured to address the few who remained, but the spirit of hissing, laughing, groaning, and exhibiting all the other usual tokens of contempt, was too strong to be subdued. The parties became violent, and scuffling took place, and blows, it is said, were given and received. Mr. Hunt waited till tranquillity was restored, and then thanking his friends for the honour they had done him, withdrew, accompanied by Mr. Jones.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Wednesday, June 3.

THE KING v. JOSEPH MERCERON ESQ.

The defendant was placed upon the floor to receive sentence. Mr. Justice BAYLEY stated the particulars of the two indictments against the defendant, for fraudulently applying to his own use 925*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* of the funds of the parish; and for corruptly concurring in the licensing of certain public-houses. Upon both these charges the Jury had found the defendant guilty. His Lordship then went over the proceedings, and concluded by observing that the propriety of the verdict was undeniable. It was obvious that the misappropriation of so large a sum of the money taken from those who, perhaps, could very ill afford to pay, had long been in the mind of the defendant; he had not been actuated by a sudden and imprudent impulse, but he had accomplished his fraudulent purpose by a train of artifices the most disgraceful, and his object was fully accomplished by the wicked instrumentality of others. The Court had learnt that the defendant had refunded the sum; but still the character of the offence was in no respect changed. The second offence was of still greater magnitude. The defendant, as a Magistrate, had corruptly lent his aid to the licensing of public-houses, which, from the disorders in their conduct, were unfit to enjoy that advantage. The trust reposed in Magistrates in this respect was of the highest kind, and the abandonment of it, from corrupt motives, was a crime of the highest magnitude. What could be expected of any man in future, if a Magistrate were permitted to sell an individual that an oath was a mere matter of form? The Court, in weighing the punishment, had not been inattentive to the affidavits produced on behalf of the defendant, and it had also taken into account the unavoidable degradation which he must suffer in the eye of the public at large. The contrast between the reputation he had once enjoyed, and the disgrace to which he was now exposed, must embitter even the last moments of his life: it would be a permanent punishment, and this consideration had had its effect in alleviating the judgment the Court would otherwise have pronounced. It had also not forgotten, that it would be its bounden duty to communicate to the Lord Chancellor the convictions and sentence, that he might exercise his discretion, whether he ought not to take such steps as would remove the defendant from the important stations he had hitherto filled. All the circumstances having been duly examined, the sentence of the Court was, that for the first offence, the defendant should pay a fine of 200*l.*, and be imprisoned for six months; and that for the second offence, he should be imprisoned for twelve months, to be calculated from the expiration of the first sentence.

The defendant appeared much affected while judgment was pronounced, more especially when the recommendation to the Lord Chancellor was mentioned. He bowed to the Court, and was conveyed by the tipstaff to the King's Bench Prison.

BOARD OF EXCISE.

Four dealers were on Wednesday fined, by the Board, for selling a spurious and pernicious article for genuine coffee. Their names and addresses are as follow:—Mr. George Darwin, Whitecross-street; Mr. Thomas Hammond, Whitechapel-road; Mr. John Smith, Whitecross-street; and Mr. John Smith, Whitechapel-road: the first was fined 70*l.* his case being considered an aggravated one, as he had sold his stuff to the prisoners in Whitecross-street; the three last were fined 50*l.* each.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A riotous mob assembled on Monday and Tuesday in front of a pork-butcher's shop in Clare-market, and could scarcely be restrained by a numerous police from destroying the shop and its tenant. The cause of this disturbance was an atrocious handbill, circulated by one Catnach, a printer, in which it was stated that the pork-butcher cut up human bodies into sausages; Catnach, at Bow-street, confessed that there was no foundation for the rumour, and that he had published it merely in the way of his trade, as a treat to the vulgar. He was ordered to circulate a printed contradiction. Two of the rioters were committed for want of bail, but it does not appear that Catnach was committed, though his libel certainly tended to break the peace.

EXECUTION.—Tuesday being appointed for the execution of Joseph Davey and George Claxton, for forgery, a great number of persons assembled in the Old Bailey. The unfortunate men were young, and had moved in respectable situations in life; both were married, and on Monday night they had the last interview with their relatives: it is almost needless to say it was a most trying scene. Claxton slept for several hours during the night, but Davey (who has been a midshipman) was busily engaged in writing letters to relations. Sir George Alderson arrived at the Court-house a little before eight o'clock, and proceeded to the press-yard, when the unhappy culprits were brought from their cells. Davey was in complete mourning; they maintained an unshaken deportment. They proceeded to the fatal scaffold, and a few minutes after eight o'clock, the signal was given, and thus they forfeited their lives to the laws. When the Sheriffs were proceeding down the subterraneous passages, the executioner came after them, and complained that Mr. Brown had endeavoured to deprive him of one of his perquisites; by requesting him to desist from the practice of admitting women afflicted by wens to be rubbed by the hands of the executed; he added, that he considered the Sheriffs his masters, and not Mr. Brown, and he was at a loss to know what controul he could have over his conduct. Sir George Alderson asked him if there were any persons waiting for the purpose of being rubbed. The executioner answered that there were two. The worthy Sheriff informed him, that he might be permitted to continue the practice; and the executioner having offered the Sheriffs his best thanks, proceeded to perform the disgusting and idle operation.

MARRIAGES.

On the 12th ult. at St. Martin's Church, D. E. Morris, Esq. of Suffolk-street, to Miss Windus, of Lewes, Sussex.

On Monday, Wm. Edward Nightingale, Esq. of Lea, Derbyshire, to Frances, third daughter of William Smith, Esq. M.P. for Norwich.

At St. Pancras, on the 4th instant, Joseph Layton, Esq. of Church-row, Pancras, to Miss Smarty of Warren-street, Fitzroy-square.

On Wednesday, at St. James's-church, Francis Tattersall, Esq., of Hall's-place, near Maidstone, to Harriet, eldest daughter of Henry Martin, Esq., Sackville-street.

On the 2d inst. at Birmingham, Mr. John Matthey, of Hatton-garden, to Miss Elizabeth Green, third daughter of John Green, Esq. of Birmingham.

DEATHS.

On Friday week, Mary Elizabeth, the daughter of Mr. Hill, surgeon, of Cooper's-row, Crouch-Priars.

On Saturday week, in South Audley-street, in the 73d year of his age, Isaac Hawkins Browne, Esq. of Badger-Hall, Salop; nearly thirty years one of the Representatives of Bridgenorth.

On Monday, Wm. Watson, Esq. F.R.S. Barrister at Law. He held the situation of Sergeant at Arms to the House of Lords, Chairman of the County of Middlesex and city of Westminster Sessions, and Senior Pleader to the Corporation of London.

On Friday, the 29th ult. in the 68th year of his age, Henry Frogley, Esq. of Hounslow.

On the 30th ult. William Burdon, Esq. of Welbeck-street, aged 53.

On the 3d inst. Elizabeth, wife of Dr. Ridout, of the Crescent, New Bridge-street.

On Tuesday, at Windsor, in his 63d year, James Cobb, Esq. of Russell-square, the Secretary of the East India Company. He wrote many pieces for the stage, several of which still continue to be performed. He was also the author of some political tracts.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 531.

TO THE ELECTORS OF WESTMINSTER.

FELLOW-REFORMERS,

THE old Parliament is dead (Heaven rest it's want of soul!), and yours is the glorious task of forming the most important members of the new. Keep this word new and your own principles steadily before you, and you will most materially help to realize the great object of Reformers at the present election,—that is, to get as many additional and staunch advocates of their cause into the House as possible. I believe the Ministers will be startled when they meet the fresh faces next session,—fresh in every way, with youth, hope, and public virtue. But more of this by and by.

Gentlemen, you have a Government Candidate among others this time; and out of consideration for his inevitable want of success, we will pay our respects to him first. Very little, I apprehend, need be said of Sir MURRAY MAXWELL. He is emphatically the Government Candidate; that is to say, he is a person set up directly or indirectly by the Government, merely to oppose or give a little trouble to the popular Cause, and it is curious to observe, how fond the Government are of getting a sailor to play their Game, or rather one of the reasons is obvious;—the profession is a gallant one, and naturally respected by us islanders;—it would be as well, by the way, if the Court respected it a little more, when the homage would look less interested. The other reason is, the natural easiness of these gallant persons on shore. They take for granted all that is said to them at the moment: they are inclined, to be sure, in their modesty, to doubt their extreme fitness for the situation, but the Government clap them on the shoulder, and say fine things in their ear, and talk about their doing as much glorious service on land as well as at sea; and instead of ruling at ease on their own element, they become the merest awkward instrument in the world. The only thing they retain of themselves, and that too divested of all its grace and propriety, is that they are “incapable of their own distress.” Sir MURRAY MAXWELL is, I dare say, an excellent person any where else but at Westminster, and might be a good Representative of a sea-port; but he is no more fit for your City and Liberties, Gentlemen, than a marling-spike is fit to write with; and he is put up, as Sir SAMUEL HOOD and Lord GARDNER were, on that very account. He is their successor, Gentlemen, not Lord COCHRANE'S. Lord COCHRANE, in proportion to his rank and opportunities, was as extraordinary a man for a sailor, in point of political and general knowledge, as BONAPARTE was for a soldier. Sir MURRAY himself begins his address to you with insinuating that he is “no scholar,” as the phrase is. “My life,” says he, “having been passed in the service of my country, I am unused to addresses of this nature;” that is to say, he feels that he is no writer or speaker. Now this is very candid and proper for a sailor; but in the name of BURDETT, and TOOKE, and FOX, and SHERIDAN, and all who have thought you a set of men to be intellectually represented, what sort of recommendation is it for the Member for Westminster? Mr. HORNE TOOKE might as well have gone on board a ship, and said to the crew, “Gentlemen, my life having been passed on shore in reading and studying mankind, I am unused to a service of the nature I am now come upon; therefore be good enough to take me for your Captain.”

The Government Candidate, however, will do little harm to your cause. His Address has been welcomed, I see, by two dozen persons, among whom royal tradesmen and time-serving parish-officers are conspicuous; and these interests, and the puny efforts they have formerly made to no purpose, must be too well known to you to be regarded. The great and obvious danger, Fellow-Reformers, is in dividing your opinions respecting Reformers themselves; and the very variety in this respect might have shewn the setters-up of Captain MAXWELL how little they have to hope,—perhaps does shew them; but the stubborn and more than ever promising existence of the love of liberty, after all the late good fortune of the wiseacres who hoped to crush it, seems to worry them into making absolute bites and scratches, where they can do nothing else. Doubtless, however, they see the variety alluded to with great pleasure, for although they gain nothing by it for their Candidate, they perplex and divide your strength for the after-struggle; and yet even this may be turned to your advantage, if you act firmly; it may enable you, in the first place, to shew that even your own divisions shall not turn you aside from the old strait-forward path; and secondly, it may serve as a detestable incitement to your favourite Candidates, conscious of being watched by rivals, to be active, consistent, and complete.

Besides the Government candidate, Gentlemen, you have five others, all more or less advocates of Reform. There is Mr. BRISTOL HUNT, Major CARTWRIGHT, Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, Mr. KINNAIRD, and Sir FRANCIS BURDETT. Only two of these however are perhaps to be considered as real candidates, for Sir FRANCIS may be looked upon as already elected; and I cannot think that Mr. BRISTOL HUNT with all his noisy merits, or even Major CARTWRIGHT with his solid ones, will be able to make any head on the pole,—unless Master Bristol indeed claps a bust of Sir VICARY GIBBS on it.

Mr. HUNT of Bristol, in spite of his occasional way of talking, may have better intentions than are imputed to him; but the question (if question it be) is, whether he is a fit man to represent the greatest reforming city in England. Not a jot of it, in my opinion, except the merest part of the mob. His faculties and acquirements are all of the coarsest description. He has a coarse officiousness, a coarse taste in joking, a knowledge of only the coarsest part of mankind, low or high; and his pretence of saving the Reformers from dictation is very ludicrous, coupled as it is with thrusting himself into every place and question, and attempting to be the Dictator instead. He exhibits this spirit in so mere and vulgar a style of bravado, and evidently has so little sympathy with any thing out of the pale of a mob, that he at once obtains and misses his aim, for he wants no superiors and he disgusts them; and as reform is quite as much wanted by his betters in understanding as by his equals, he can get no co-operation that is worth any thing. COBBETT's attempt to set him up as a rival to Sir FRANCIS turns an old phrase into a literal truth; it is "a desperate bad joke." If Mr. COBBETT himself were in England, and had offered to be your representative in conjunction with Sir FRANCIS, I know not how far, Gentlemen, we should have been tempted to side with him; but as to sending you his friend from Bristol, he might just as well have thrown a brickbat at you, and said, "There—take that."

Major CARTWRIGHT is as different as possible from this person. While he has proved himself one of those most rare and desirable men who are firm to their purpose through life, he has graced it with pleasant and attractive manners, and unites a proper enthusiasm for his cause with the greatest knowledge of it. He is indeed a venerable man, yielding up his long sympathy for his species neither from the physical coldness of age, nor from deferred hope, nor from the taunts of enemies and apostates, nor from the more dangerous despondency of friends. If there were any other honour to be paid him, I should think myself honoured in being among the humblest of the contributors to it; and were the present question confined to himself and another person advanced in years, especially a person of a less decided love of Reform,—Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY for instance,—I should think it incumbent on us all to strain every nerve to get him into Parliament, were it only for the very sentiment's sake. And doubtless such an expression of feeling towards him would not be without its uses; but the venerable Major's talent is in the more silent walk of Reform; he collects votes, as it were, for the cause itself, and circulates a knowledge of it on paper. What you want at present is a parliamentary addition to your advocates, as young or at least as physically able as possible, with not only ability to speak, but a ready activity at all turns of the debate,—in short, one who agrees with Major CARTWRIGHT in all the spirit and letter of the cause, but who can advocate it with younger and pithier effect in an assembly of speakers.

And if these, Gentlemen, are reasons why our venerable leader himself will do best out of that assembly, how much more loudly do some of them cry out against the supercilious and suspicious election of Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY? I mean to insinuate nothing against the conscientious principles of that gentleman; neither do I think he has those common views of personal aggrandizement, which are thought to be the inevitable tendency of all lawyers. He has been bred up in too good a school not to have a less vulgar ambition; and for a lawyer, especially one who is more of a legal politician than a political lawyer, he has done some noble things in Parliament, and proposed more. But as his illustrious master, JEREMY BENTHAM, has said, "the law is a profession which says to every one, more or less, "Commit yourself with me, or forego me;" and there is one part of it's contagion Sir SAMUEL has not escaped, which is timidity. It is this which makes him to a certain degree worldly, not in the worst or in the commonly bad sense of the word, but at least negatively so, and afraid of losing his hold on some common principle of interest with some sort of well-received crowd. It is this which has made him half Reformer and half not, which keeps him, he thinks, in safe company in this world;—it is this which has made his philosophy take delight in the Unitarian borders, which will slide him in, he thinks, genteelly to the next. But above all, Gentlemen, what can Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY possibly want with a seat for Westminster, if he is earnest in the cause of Reform, and would see it afforded additional help? He is in Parliament already; he can do as much as ever he did in his own seat; it is quite sufficient for the part he takes in the cause, especially the legal part, which is the predominant one. Westminster has been unequivocally and entirely the great example afforded to the other cities of the nation, of a love of Reform. Will the people who made it that example, run the risk of at least neutralizing it, by acting on the recommendation of a party who have often left the Members for Westminster without any support but your own,—a support which indeed is quite sufficient, we find, to make these doubtful Reformers come flattering you for their own purposes, and talking of your good opinion as the greatest of honours. Why is it the greatest of honours? Because you have kept it for staunch, ardent, and unequivocal friends; and because you will still keep it so. Ask Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, Gentlemen, when he comes before you, how far he differs with his illustrious friend above mentioned, to whom you gave your thanks the other day for his masterly book on Reform? Ask him this; judge him by it; and it will be sufficient.

I have now then to say, that though I know little of your remaining candidate Mr. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD and his particular talents, yet as he is an addition to the cause of Reform,—as he goes decidedly with you,—as he is young and active,—as I see by the public papers from time to time that he can speak,—as he is by birth one of that aristocracy which it is so desirable to render sensible to the blessings of Reform,—as he is a brother to a spirited Nobleman, who in these times of truckling in the upper circles has not laid his sympathy with mankind at the feet of stupid good-luck,—and as there is reason to believe that his success in your city will leave an opportunity open for another staunch hater of tyranny and lover of the common claims of his species,—my voice, as that of a Reformer who will yield to no one in disinterestedness, and who may be considered perhaps as the representative of no mean or unintellectual portion of the cause, is for Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and the Honourable DOUGLAS KINNAIRD,—your friends and each other's.

I am, Gentlemen,

Your very sincere admirer and servant,

THE EXAMINER.

LETTERS ON THE FAGGING SYSTEM.

The following letters have all been inserted, in order that even any assertions in favour of the Fagging System may have utterance afforded them. One of them, which we are happy to add to the number of those against it, suspects that our brazen young friend, who dates from St. Paul's, and who evidently feels more awkward than he pretends to be (the more, poor fellow, the better for him) is really not of that celebrated school. We hope he may not be, as we always had a neighbourly respect for it, and thought it of a truly manly character than most of the great schools. Very likely the youth pretends to be more of a fagger than he can be, or even would. The new Correspondent, who with more gratuitous confidence denies the claim of Westmonasteriensis, and abuses him in good fagging terms, will lose his effect on that account.

SIR,—It is with particular attention that I have perused your later numbers, on the system of Fagging, adopted, more or less, in every public school. Having been myself brought up at one of these establishments, I felt unusual interest on the subject, and am, I think, fully competent to judge of either the advantage or disadvantage arising from such a system. You have produced many arguments, but I have found none, Mr. Editor, which will bear sufficient weight to abolish the practice in question. I am well assured, that should such an alteration take place, it would serve along to the destruction of long established rights and privileges, without producing an atom (if I may use the expression) of benefit in any point of view whatsoever.

I have not the pleasure of knowing personally your Correspondent Westmonasteriensis, but I may safely affirm that he had not the honour of being educated at the celebrated school, which he professes. I fear that the boys there will be sadly alarmed to find such a signature placed at the close of a letter, tending to abolish, what they most anxiously strive to confirm. But, I suppose, the modest disposition of your Correspondent, (for he complains of the immodest insults he received) rendered him extremely obnoxious to his school-fellows. It was too his modesty, which prompted him to take up "the common cause" and a felicitous name! I think, more likely, Mr. Editor, his immodesty urged him to write against a subject, to which he is inwardly averse, and for the sake of sporting his epistolary talent. My reason for this assertion is, that I am confident no person at Westminster would make a communication similar to that in your last Sunday's paper.

I know not what "Fagging in Public Schools" has to do with "the moral and mental spirit of the nation." Nor do I conceive that its tendency is of such material and general consequence, as to excite "the expressive good wishes of every reflecting, every virtuous soul." I wish Westmonasteriensis would explain himself on these points. Since it is a practice so oppressive and so nearly allied to "political oligarchy," it appears to me very odd, that such a pernicious system has never been taken notice of till the present day. I find from a friend that Mr. Brougham has already visited and examined Christ's Hospital; I suppose he will wait on all the public schools in their turn, but I hope will never abolish an old right so conducive to the prosperity of all scholastic foundations. Perhaps Westmonasteriensis is some great "Baby Boy," who has been peried by his indulgent mother, and then sent immediately to a public school, where he expects to be served as at home, and for want of physical powers is unable to return the insults he receives.

You may wonder, perhaps, that I so violently attack Westmonasteriensis, and not touch upon your Correspondents, Homo and C.; but consider, Sir, the vehement mode in which he writes against "the common cause," that so injudiciously feigns a name, which (to use the technical term) a Westmonasteriensis in propria persona cannot swallow.

Should you not conceive my arguments too violently pressed against your Correspondent, the insertion of this in your paper will greatly oblige, your's,

London, June 3, 1818.

To Mr. L. Hunt, Editor of the Examiner.

Tuesday, 1st June, 1818.—Sancti Pauli Schold, 5 P.M.

SIR,—I am extremely rejoiced that my Letter of last week proved so excellent a subject for your "able" criticism. Had I known that you intended me the honour of publishing it, I should not have scribbled it off so hastily, and by that should have prevented you the trouble of so pompously announcing that Dr. Roberts was Examiner at your school, and so sagaciously making known to all your readers that the omission of the letter N was intentional, "not" casual and proceeding from the hurried manner in which it was written. Whether or no you think I belong to the justly celebrated school from which I dated my last, is to me a matter of perfect indifference. I am sorry, on account of those who forsake the "common cause," that you published the laboured epistle of a Correspondent, subscribing himself Westmonasteriensis, (who, to use the scholastic epithet, is a mean spirited, milk and water renegade; who, "pitifully," speaks of this most proper system of subordination as having a "dehumanizing tendency," and being a "scholastic oligarchy") as it will deservedly bring a more aggravating odium upon that class of public scholars who have too much innate cowardice to repulse bullying ignorance, and to assert their own rights, and who endeavour to conceal that cowardice under the appearance of commiseration towards "the wretched (as they are pleased to denominate them) objects of unfeeling tyranny." To deny that this custom is abused would be folly; but although, "sapient Sir," there may be some whose brutal feelings urge them to unmanly and improper acts, the whole system is not to be condemned with the virulence you are pleased to use. Did we all resemble your Correspondent above mentioned, you might indeed incur our resentment; as none but those who possess a disposition similar to his would be so void of sense as to become "hectoring bullies," on account of, or would even take the trouble to peruse, your futile arguments. As you published my last to please yourself, if you will insert this in your paper of next Sunday, it will not only please but gratify your's, &c.

SCTI PAULI ALUM.

P. S. My Letters are not examined with that scrupulous nicety which the articles inserted in your paper require. If you are Editor of the Paper, why do you not declare yourself as such to the public? And do not let it come from the press with the subjoined information that it is published by J. Hunt.

To Mr. L. Hunt, Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—If the subject be not quite exhausted, allow me a few moments attention on the subject of school discipline. First, with regard to your Correspondent who thinks fit to attach the disgrace of his sentiments to the school wherein I was educated (St. Paul's), I beg leave to assure you, that, from the period of my admission (1804), to that of my departure (1809), the Fagging System was utterly unknown there, and from this feature in the foundation, (as a Noble Lord would say), namely, that the scholars were not boarded there, but went home twice a day, immediately that the school hours were over. The business of the school, though less complete than might have been in any but a free school, was yet sufficient to occupy the attention of both senior and junior scholars with very little exception. The whole time, from seven to eleven, and from one to five, was passed in the school, and near the master, whose eye was always a check upon anything that was not either task-learning or task-saying, and whose ear was always open to the appeal of an injured boy, let the circumstance of the case, situation and ages of the parties, be what they might. And the boys were returned to their homes, as other children are, the moment that business was concluded. The headmaster, Dr. Roberts, had 20 or 30 boarders in his house, and there might have been a little tyranny among them out of school hours, but in my time these boarders, except two or three, were boys of the same age or thereabouts, viz. between 16 and 18, and in the upper classes, and this I think will leave no doubt of the Fagging System being impracticable among them, even without the addition of this truth, that the boarders were left but little to themselves, and were treated by the good Doctor and his Lady with such care, as prevails in large families of the rich and well bred. This, I hope, will convince you that your Correspondent is an impostor.

From all that I have seen of schools, I am of opinion that the system of boarding the boys is chargeable with the far greater part of the evils that prevail in them; and that the fagging, or, in the more intelligible language of your other Correspondent, the slavery, is entirely to be attributed to it. It is never suffered in any school to interfere with the business of education in the school hours; and when the boys are released from constraint at the expiration of those hours, and returned to their natural state, free and independent, they never become degraded, even while acquiring the habit of submitting to authority, really and substantially imposing. They yield to the master as to fate; but they resist the petty tyranny of their own class as imposition. At the same time, I by no means intend to pass a censure on boarding schools, which, with the few exceptions of the alluringly and delusively cheap sort, are as excellently managed as any private family can be: I mean rather to apply these remarks to what are called Public or Foundation Schools, which stand in much more need of reform, from the cruel sovereignty of beardless oligarchs, than even poor England itself does from that of the full grown and barbed, not to say, barbarous. Though not one who has ever been a sufferer or an inflicter under the system of slavery in schools, I am heartily glad that you have done something to expose it, since, even if it have no effect on the gown and wigged, it will prevent parents from sending their children to these negro-driving seminaries. I have been sorry to miss three or four Examiners on the politics of the day, but must confess that the present subject is really of much more importance.—Your's, very truly, J. H.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JUNE 7.—Madame Catichois Lemaire, who has been for three months past confined in prison, under suspicion of being implicated in the conspiracy against the Duke of Wellington, has just been set at liberty.

JUNE 9.—The Duke of Wellington dined on Sunday with the Austrian Ambassador. We are told that his Grace will leave Paris at the end of this week.

Two of the persons arrested at Lyons, on a charge of distributing (in concert with others) small busts of Bonaparte, namely, Legros, jun. and Balleydier, have been sentenced to three months' imprisonment, a fine of 50 francs, and to pay the costs.

The tribunal of Thionville has condemned Nicolas Grosjean to three months' imprisonment, to a fine of 50 francs, a year's surveillance, and to provide security for his good conduct. He has been convicted of insults to the Mayor of the Commune, of outrages towards the Royal Gendarmerie, and finally of seditious cries and alarming intelligence, accompanied with menaces.

EAST INDIES.

Despatches from India were published on Monday in a Supplement to the Gazette. The events are not new. The principal military transaction related is the battle between Sir Thomas Hislop and the army of Holkar, on the 21st of last December. This engagement was over in three hours, and ended in the capture of the whole of the enemy's artillery, and the entire defeat and dispersion of his army, with a loss of 3,000 men. The greater part of the proceedings of General Doveton against the forces of the Rajah of Berar, which finally resulted in the capture of Nagpoor, and in the submission of the whole country, have been for some time before the public. The loss, however, sustained by General Doveton in an unsuccessful attack on the palace of Nagpoor, appears more serious than we had been prepared to expect. The attempt to storm being made on the 24th of December, was completely repulsed by the Arabs, and other troops in the service of the Rajah, who killed and wounded above 300 of our men, including 104 Europeans and 10 Officers. On the 30th of December the Arab garrison evacuated the city, on certain conditions, when it was forthwith occupied by the British troops. Our Government, as was stated in former despatches, was in possession of the Rajah's person.—In addition to the above facts, extracts from the Calcutta Gazette of the 2d of February, have appeared, presenting accounts of a series of distinct successes obtained by detachments of the British troops over many of the Pindarree Chieftains, to the northward of Nerbudda. Headed in all directions and almost surrounded by the co-operating divisions of the Generals Doukin, Marshal, Sir William Keir, and Colonel Adam, the Pindarrees, with the loss of much of their baggage, betook themselves towards Holkar's camp; but having intelligence of the treaty negotiated by that leader with the British Government, they moved to Rampoor, where it is said they were attacked by General Brown, and dispersed without resistance. Cheetoo, the richest and most powerful of these plunderers, whose immediate followers had had a principal share in the former invasion of the British territories, was attacked by Sir William Keir on the 6th of January, where he lost five guns and a portion of his baggage. The main body of the Pindarrees were reported to have fled in the direction of Rudeypoor. Cheetoo's force was said to have been beaten and plundered near Shapoorah, where his brother was taken prisoner, and he himself escaped with only nine followers. Gen. Smith had an action with Appagee, a Sardar of the Peishwa's, who fled, but in vain, to the fort of Chemeenfal. The fort was carried by escalade, when Appagee, with several other officers, were made prisoners; and 70 guns, 83 elephants, a number of fine horses, and great quantities of treasure were taken.

UNITED PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Saturday, June 6.

ALIEN BILL.

A Deputation from the House held a conference with a Deputation from the Commons respecting a clause introduced by their Lordships into the Alien Bill, which the lower House had rejected.—After the conference, the Marquis of Lansdown reported, that the Commons declined giving any reason for that disagreement, except that they considered their Lordships' amendment was inexpedient. Upon this report being read, Lord LIVERPOOL moved, that "this House do not insist upon its amendment."

Lord GREY expressed his surprise at the manner in which the report had been received. He thought the Bill was much improved by the omission of this clause, for he could not help coming to the conclusion, that it was not only impolitic, but unjust. But when he recollected that a majority of that House had agreed to the Bill in its amended form, he considered that the preservation of their dignity demanded some other course than that which had been taken. The Commons had not condescended to give any reason for the rejection of their amendment, and yet they were called upon, without explanation, to abandon it altogether—to abandon that without which it had been strongly urged the Bill would be totally ineffective. With a view that the House should take the subject deliberately into consideration, he begged to move as an amendment "That the further consideration of this report be deferred to Monday next, and that the Lords be summoned."

Lord LIVERPOOL observed, that when the clause was discussed by their Lordships, no one objected to it as a prospective measure; it was only its retrospective operation that had caused a difference of opinion. He should scarcely believe any individual existed who would say that a law should be suffered to remain in force, by which any foreigner, however rancorously disposed towards this country, might at the expense of 80l. obtain all the rights of a natural born subject, without taking the oath of allegiance, or submitting to any of the regulations which the legislature thought proper to adopt in passing naturalization Bills. He had no doubt that the objection of the Commons did not apply to the clause substantially, but to its introduction into this particular Bill. He therefore thought that a distinct measure, having the same object, would be approved both by their Lordships and elsewhere.

Lord HOLLAND observed, that a gross violation of the rights of property was contained in the clause which the Commons had rejected. The Noble Earl had more than once spoken of the trick by which certain aliens had attempted, since April last, under the Scotch Act of Parliament, to procure their naturalization; but they had only availed themselves of an existing law: whereas the Noble Earl, in contradiction to all the principles of law and justice, proposed to deprive them of their property and rights. The Act of the Scotch Parliament had been recognized by the Union, and it was the law of the united kingdom. The Noble Lord (Liverpool) said, he would call upon any person to say, whether he knew of the existence of this Act before April last? Was it because the Noble Earl himself was in ignorance of it, that it should be unknown to every other person? (Hear!) The retrospective part of the clause, which he now spoke of as a little matter, was to be omitted. In fact, the only consistent part of the Noble Earl's conduct was his precipitation and impatience. He had been all impatient to get the clause passed, and he was now in an equal hurry to get it rejected. If, however, their Lordships must stand in a white sheet on this occasion, (a laugh), he thought it becoming that they should go through the work of repentance with due solemnity, and would therefore support his Noble Friend's motion.

After some further conversation, the House rejected Lord Grey's motion, by 32 to 21; when the original one was carried.—Adjourned

Monday, June 8.

Lord SIDMOUTH gave notice, that he would to-morrow move to suspend the standing order 104. If their Lordships agreed to that motion, it would then be in their power to suspend any other standing order which would otherwise prevent them from passing any Bill which might come under their consideration through all its stages in one day.

Lord HOLLAND said, it would be necessary for their Lordships well to consider how far the Noble Lord's motion might lead them, if it should be adopted. The suspending the order No. 104 would enable any person to-morrow to procure the suspension of all the standing orders.

After some further conversation, it was agreed that the notice should be given for the suspension of the three standing orders No. 26, No. 104, and No. 125.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, June 9.

ALIEN PREVENTION BILL.

Lord SIDMOUTH moved the 1st reading of this Bill, and explained its object.

It was then read, and the Standing Orders being suspended, it went through all the usual stages, and was finally passed.—Lords HOLLAND, GREY, and SPENCER, protested against the proceeding.—Adjourned.

Wednesday, June 10.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT.

Soon after two o'clock, the discharge of 21 guns announced the arrival of the Prince Regent, who, after the usual formalities in the Robing Chamber, entered the House, and took his seat beside the throne.

Soon after the SPEAKER of the Commons, attended by a great number of Members, advanced to the bar. The Speaker presented the Appropriation Bill, and addressed his Royal Highness.

The Prince Regent then read the following Speech:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is with deep regret that I am again under the necessity of announcing to you, that no alteration has occurred in the state of his Majesty's lamented indisposition.—I continue to receive from Foreign Powers the strongest assurance of their friendly disposition towards this country, and of their desire to maintain the general tranquillity.—I am fully sensible of the attention which you have paid to the many important objects which have been brought before you.—I derive peculiar satisfaction from the measure which you have adopted, in pursuance of my recommendation, for augmenting the number of places of public worship belonging to the Established Church; and I confidently trust, that this measure will be productive of the most beneficial effects on the religion and moral habits of the people.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I thank you for the supplies which you have granted to me for the service of the present year; and I highly approve of the steps you have taken with a view to the reduction of the unfunded debt.—I am happy to be able to inform you, that the revenue is in a course of continued improvement.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"On closing this Session I think it proper to inform you that it is my intention forthwith to dissolve the present and to give directions for calling a new Parliament. In making this communication, I cannot refrain from adverting to the important change which has occurred in the situation of this country and of Europe, since I first met you in this place. At that period, the dominion of the common enemy had been so widely extended over the Continent, that resistance to his power was by many deemed to be hopeless; and in the extremities of Europe alone was such resistance effectually maintained. By the unexampled exertions which you enabled me to make, in aid of countries nobly contending for independence, and by the spirit which was kindled in so many nations, the Continent was at length delivered from the most galling and oppressive tyranny under which it had ever laboured; and I had the happiness, by the blessing of Divine Providence, to terminate, in conjunction with his Majesty's Allies, the most eventful and sanguinary contest in which Europe had for centuries been engaged, with unparalleled success and glory. The prosecution of such a contest for so many years, and more particularly the efforts which marked the close of it, have been followed within our own country, as well as throughout the rest of Europe, by considerable internal difficulties and distress. But deeply as I felt for the immediate pressure upon his Majesty's people, I nevertheless looked forward without dismay, having always the fullest confidence in the solidity of the resources of the British empire, and in the relief which might be expected from a continuance of peace, and from the patience, public spirit, and energy of the nation. These expectations have not been disappointed. The improvement in the internal circumstances of the country is happily manifest, and promises to be steadily progressive; and I feel a perfect assurance that the continued loyalty and exertions of all classes of his Majesty's subjects will confirm these growing indications of national prosperity, by promoting obedience to the laws and attachment to the Constitution, from which all our blessings have been derived."

The LORD CHANCELLOR said—"My Lords and Gentlemen,—It is the will and pleasure of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, that this Parliament be now dissolved; and this Parliament is dissolved accordingly."

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Saturday, June 6.

ALIEN BILL.

Lord CASTLEREAGH gave notice of his intention on Monday to bring in a Bill to suspend the operation of the Scotch Act in favour of Aliens purchasing such stock till the next Session. The Bill would have no retrospective provisions. The anomalous state of the law should not be allowed to exist, which gave the fullest naturalization to foreigners, even granting them the highest privilege, that of sitting in Parliament, and that by only purchasing stock to the amount of less than 100*l*. He should now only propose a Bill to suspend the operations of the Scotch Act of 1695 until the 25th of March next. In the course of next Session the law might be fully discussed.—Adjourned.

Monday, June 8.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

Mr. BROUGHAM brought up a report of the Committee on the Education of the Poor. In moving that that report should be printed, he wished to say a very few words with regard to the Bill which had just passed, as one of the most flagrant cases which had just come to their knowledge was materially connected with the alterations in that Bill. That case related to the abuse of a charitable fund in a certain borough, (we understood in the county of Huntingdon). The only borough interest, that which gave the patron of the borough the whole power of sending two Members to that House, was the unjust abuse of a considerable estate left for charitable purposes. It would come within the compass of the Education Bill, for it had been set apart in the reign of Edward II. for the maintenance of a free-school, and in that reign had been estimated at the annual value of 35*l*. The land amounted to 145 acres. The whole rent was now 160*l*, while the value upon the lowest scale could not be less than within a trifle of 900*l*. per annum. This land was held by the mayor and 12 aldermen. Who were the trustees? The mayor and 12 aldermen. Who were the lessees who had this land contiguous and convenient to other property of the Crown? Who were the lessors?—The mayor and 12 aldermen all in one. They were all; and all that interest they had got from the property of the poor, which they had robbed for the purpose. (Hear, hear!) In that borough the burgesses were the people who had the right of voting; and it was so managed, that once a burgess, always a burgess. The lands were given amongst the burgesses for little or no rent. It was asked whether they had any opposition in the borough, or in what it consisted. The reply was, that there was no such thing as an opposition; the borough was what they called a maiden borough. (Hear, hear!) There never was an opposition known there. In fact, if there was any such thing, all the burgesses engaged in it would be turned out of the lands. It had pleased certain persons to persuade that the commission of inquiry should not operate so as to extend to that case. That worst of all cases was free from the visitation of a commission by that most fatal clause that exempted all charities that had special visitors. It seemed as if that case had been sent to fill up every vacancy in his arguments against the alterations in the Bill. Who were the visitors in this case? The Mayor and Aldermen themselves, the trustees, lessors and lessees, who had abused the trust, and robbed the poor for their own interest. He would ask, if any man could say, that that Bill, if not altogether, had not been almost entirely frittered away and destroyed by the alterations that had taken place? All that he could say was, that they ought not to sit and slumber, but to supply the great deficiencies that the Bill laboured under. He thought that instance would be seen, and the measure at a future period amended accordingly, notwithstanding the great love of doubting that might exist.—The Report was ordered to be printed.

BILL TO SUSPEND THE SCOTCH ACT CLAUSE.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, the House were aware that any commission could not regularly be granted to an alien, without the express sanction of Parliament by law. By the Scottish Act, however, any man, by purchasing 80*l.* worth of stock, without any oath of allegiance, or any other qualification whatever, became from that moment a naturalized subject. By this method military commissions might be granted under the Crown. There would, under that Act, be the means of employing any extent of military force of any foreign power, by only making purchases of the Bank, without going farther. If such was the state of the law, there could be but one opinion, that it ought no longer to exist. He therefore moved, that "leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent aliens for a limited time from being naturalized, or being made or becoming denizens, except in certain cases."

Sir J. MACINTOSH by no means rose to oppose the motion, though the principle of the measure before proposed, was an outrage on the Constitution, and calculated to violate all principles of justice, to destroy every maxim of public faith, equally subversive of public credit, injurious to private property, and fatal to every right that was dear to this country. But as that abominable part had been withdrawn, he was ready to accede to what was now proposed. But he had difficulties with respect to the hasty adoption of any Bill like that for which the Noble Lord had moved. The extraordinary circumstances that had occurred in both Houses in the course of fourteen days, might excuse these scruples. What discoveries had fourteen days produced? Before the Alien Bill had passed, they were not aware of the Scotch Act at all. When it passed, they did not know that it contained a money clause in subversion of the privileges of that House. Since that time, they had found that corporate bodies, in different parts of the kingdom, had the power either of giving all or part of the privileges of naturalization. His advice to the House was, to beware of any thing founded on confidence reposed in any government which was obliged to plead guilty to such accumulated blunders and mistakes, and which had been so negligent of informing itself of what line of conduct Parliament ought to adopt.

After some further remarks, leave was given, the Bill was brought in, read a first and second time, and committed. The report was then brought up and received, and agreed to, with some verbal amendments. It was afterwards read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

Tuesday, June 9.

There not being 40 Members present, an adjournment took place.

Wednesday, June 10.

ALIEN BILL.

A message from the Lords informed the House that their Lordships had assented to the Bill preventing Aliens from being naturalized, or from being or becoming denizens, under certain limitations, till the 25th of March.

SLAVE TRADE, &c.

Mr. WILBERFORCE observed, that he had received certain information that the Slave Trade was openly carrying on to a great extent in the French colonies on the north-west coast of Africa, and that this inhuman practice was accompanied by circumstances of peculiar atrocity, murders having been committed by wholesale. As it was extremely desirable to prevent the possibility of any effectual revival of this detestable traffic, and as one great means of doing so would be to ascertain the real facts of the case, he should move an humble address to the Regent, praying that he would be graciously pleased to order that there be laid before the House copies of any communications that had been received by his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, concerning the carrying on of the Slave Trade on the north-west coast of Africa.

Lord CASTLEREAGH said, that every disposition was manifested by the Government of France to put an end to the Slave Trade; but his Hon. Friend must be aware how difficult it was to cause a trade of that kind suddenly to cease in any colony, but more especially when that colony had recently passed into the possession of the power by which it was held. Although he was apprehensive that considerable mischief had occurred in the quarter alluded to, yet it was by no means to the extent supposed. With respect to his Hon. Friend's motion, as the information wished for was not in such a shape as would allow of its being produced, and as his Hon. Friend had, by calling the attention of the House to the matter, effected in some measure the object in view, he was desirous that the motion should be withdrawn.

Mr. WILBERFORCE assented; at the same time he took the opportunity of observing, that Portugal was another power with which it had been in vain endeavoured to discontinue the traffic. He trusted, however, that the British Government would persevere in their efforts, and that they would soon be crowned with success.

Lord CASTLEREAGH heartily concurred with his Hon. Friend in hoping that that power, which was now happily the only power by which that traffic was sanctioned, might soon be induced to remove this stain from its character.

The motion was then withdrawn.

Soon after two o'clock, the Usher of the Black Rod required the attendance of the House in the House of Peers. The Speaker and Members present (about 80) accordingly attended.—On their return, a short conversation took place between the late Speaker, Mr. Manners Sutton, and Mr. Tierney, the former being about to read the copy of the Speech of the Prince Regent, which he had procured.

Mr. TIERNEY objected to this, observing, that though such was the practice when Parliament was merely prorogued, yet that now, a dissolution having taken place, it would be irregular.

Mr. M. SUTTON acquiesced in the validity of the objection, and waved his intention.

On this the Members separated.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JUNE 15.

PARLIAMENT was dissolved on Wednesday. The Speech on the occasion is worth little remark. Its main feature is a reference to the long contest with BONAPARTE, the event of which is of course attributed to that stubborn continuance of hostilities, which, for their ignorant subsidizing spirit and mere passion, were justly thought obstinacy; but which, on account of the unexpected opportunities afforded by BONAPARTE'S own rashness and unjust invasion of Spain, we are now to look upon as so much sheer wisdom and perseverance. That the dissolution, however, might be graced with something new, it was done in a way which, it seems, has not been put in practice since the blessed time of the STUARTS,—pronounced vivâ voce by the REGENT. People wonder at this; and a conversation even took place upon it afterwards in the House, with apparently equal astonishment,—Mr. TIERNEY considering it as “an insult to Parliament,” and the SPEAKER himself seeming mystified. Mr. TIERNEY opposed the latter's offer to read the Speech, as it might imply some approbation of this strange proceeding. Mr. SUTTON said he had consulted Mr. HATSELL in the morning, on a case which had no precedent, “there having been no such dissolution since that of the Oxford Parliament;” but the great difficulty of the case, he added, consisted in this, viz. that he himself was no longer a Speaker; to which my Lord CASTLEREAGH the seat-seller, with his usual delicate insinuation, subjoined, that “if Gentlemen present appeared to deliberate as a House of Commons, they might incur a præmunire.” What a dreadful thing! We hope they will incur no such danger next Session. It was remarked, however, that there could be no harm in a conversation between Mr. CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON and his friends round the table; but whether this ensued or not, we are not informed. The Speech was not read, and the House separated.

This singular circumstance will doubtless be taken into consideration on the meeting of the new-Parliament. It is the more thought of, inasmuch as it used to be reckoned a purposely ungracious thing in the Sovereign that did it; but we know of no cause which the REGENT has for quarrelling with Ministers or Parliament, except indeed on a score which is very unlikely; and if he had, he would not be in a hurry, we suspect, to shew it. The most likely cause is, either that there was a wish to be as grand as possible in the presence of the Grand Duke MICHAEL and other princely visitors, or that it is thought as well to creep gradually back into as many of these old legitimate practices as occasion and toleration will allow.

There is no news of importance from Paris. The silence of expectation, which seemed immediately to rouse when it was known that the foreign troops were to go away, still continues. The readers of the extracts from the French Papers learn for the first time, that a lady, a Madame CAUCHOIS LEMAIRE, has been for three months past in prison under suspicion of being implicated in the alleged conspiracy against the Duke of WELLINGTON. She has just been set at liberty. A full-length portrait, we are told, with all the dignity of a shewman, has been exhibited of Louis the 18th, “in his royal robes,” painted by M. PAULIN GUERIN, and inscribed as follows:—“Given by the KING to his friend the PRINCE REGENT of England.” His MAJESTY appears to be seized with little gouty fits, now and then, of giving this awkward hint to the French people. We suggest the following compliment in return from Carlton House:—an allegorical picture of the French Nation with a halo of bayonets all round her, the points towards her body,—and this inscription, “Given by the PRINCE REGENT to his friend the KING of FRANCE.”

The most extraordinary piece of news from the Continent is the following:—

“The New Constitution for Bavaria, establishing a representative system, was published on the 28th ult. The States-General are to be assembled for the first time, on the 1st Jan. 1819. There are to be two Chambers, in the upper of which, the mediatised Princes are to have hereditary seats amongst the Nobles of the Kingdom, and the two religious Communions are also to be represented there by a certain number of their Prelates. The lower Chamber is to consist of the Representatives of the Universities, the towns, &c. The whole of the Constitution is not given in these Journals, but so far as the nature of it can be ascertained, it appears to be highly satisfactory.”

This is curious intelligence certainly, especially after the anger with which that alternately whining and tyrannizing person the King of PRUSSIA answered some of his subjects the other day for reminding him of his old promise to the same effect. It is the best thing the Allies have yet done for themselves; but what is also not a little curious is, that the first and only legitimate Government which has kept its promise of a representative constitution should be intimately connected with an illegitimate person, who is understood to have great weight at its Court,—EUGENE BEAUHARNOIS.

The expedition set on foot by the wealthy French Emigrants in North America continues to excite great interest. General LALLEMAND, says the Courier, “has left the French expedition, and proceeded on a secret mission, as it is reported, towards Mexico. The assertions, that it is the intention of these exiles to cultivate the soil, and remain in peace, are now altogether discredited. Not only were several vessels dispatched from Philadelphia, but several others were to join them from other ports. The number of their expected new allies is variously stated, from 2000 to 4000 men. The principal persons who have arranged the expedition, and promoted its success by subscriptions, are, JOSEPH BONAPARTE, Marshal Grouchy, and STEPHEN GERARD.”

An American paper says on the same subject,—“It appears to be a fact, that a large expedition has been set on foot from the United States against the provinces of our neighbours. The force employed is apparently respectable in point of numbers, but still more so from the great military experience and talents of the leaders; and even most of the privates may be reckoned as veterans. It must certainly be expected that as soon as the Captain-General of the internal provinces hears of this intrusion, he will adopt measures to expel and destroy the invaders. ARREDONDO is believed to be the present Captain-General. He is more noted for unrelenting cruelty to prisoners, than by his defeat of the mixed force under TOLEDO, near St. Antonio, five years ago."

It appears by the following curious statement, that NAPOLEON's jailers have found out at last the possibility of his getting out of their magnanimous clutches. Major MOODIE's arrival, say the papers, "with despatches for Lord BATHURST, from Sir HUDSON LOWE, at St. Helena, has excited some speculation in the city, coincident as it is with the account of the landing of a sailor at that island. The sailor had been one of the crew of the Northumberland, which carried BONAPARTE to St. Helena, and in that situation had formed an acquaintance with BONAPARTE's servants. This sailor afterwards became one of the crew of an East Indiaman, which being at St. Helena, the sailor, in the night, contrived to swim from the vessel, clamber up the rocks, visit and pass some hours gaily among BONAPARTE's domestics. This he did two several nights without being noticed; but in conversation he boasted of his adroitness, and told his messmates what he had done. Knowledge of the transaction transpired; he was arrested and conducted to England in confinement; but it has not appeared that he had any sinister intention, or more in view than an innocent frolic. It is not believed BONAPARTE knew of his being among his servants. However, the occurrence is supposed to have demonstrated the possibility of BONAPARTE's escape on board of any English vessel, the Captain of which might be inclined for a bribe, or otherwise, to convey him to Europe or America. Indeed, it is reported several such occurrences have taken place at St. Helena, as have induced Sir HUDSON LOWE to declare to the Government, that if vessels are allowed to come to that island as at present, he cannot answer for the security of his prisoner. It is reported that Major MOODIE is come home to make representations on this subject, and it is supposed another place of refreshment will be assigned for our East Indiamen."

Another account believes that BONAPARTE himself saw and conversed with the man.

If any stricter measures of confinement are taken against him, or rather, if all passing communication is cut off with the island (for the first step would be somewhat too gross) we trust that steps will be taken to bring the sailor and his messmates personally forward, in order that the truth of these paragraphs may be ascertained. But we are not at all sure that they are not forerunners of intelligence of another description.

The Second Lieutenant of the Griffin, at St. Helena, informed Captain GUNNER, of the Lord Sidmouth, which arrived on Friday off Portsmouth, that BONAPARTE was quite well on the 14th April, and attending the Races on that day.

The report of a seaman having found his way to Longwood, BONAPARTE's residence, and back, gains additional credit. It is added, that he belonged to the Northumberland, which conveyed BONAPARTE to St. Helena, and had been employed in making some roads to Longwood. Upon his return to St. Helena, he went ashore in the boat, climbed the rocks, and got to Longwood, where he passed some time with the domestics, and even saw and conversed with BONAPARTE. The next night he went again, and took a comrade, and again conversed with BONAPARTE, effecting his return to his ship both times without being discovered. But having boasted of what he had done, he was put in irons and sent home. Such is the report.—Courier.

The Foreign Papers announce the death of Field-Marshal Prince BARCLAY DE TOLLY, one of the most distinguished Officers in the Russian army.—Field-Marshal Prince SCHWARTZENBERG, the Commander in Chief of the Allied Armies, on their first entrance into France, is also seriously ill with a liver complaint.

The QUEEN rides out daily in her garden, and continues to mend.

The PRINCE REGENT takes frequent rides in his buggy into the country, in the evenings, dressed in the plainest manner, and generally with only one attendant. In a late excursion with Sir BENJAMIN BLOOMFIELD, the heat of the weather drove him to seek for some beverage to quench his thirst, at a gardener's cottage by the wayside, where his Royal Highness waited, till his hostess prepared tea for him, of which he partook most heartily.—Evening paper.

The marriage of the Duke of KENT with the Princess MARIA LOUISA VICTORIA, of Linangen, sister of Prince LEOPOLD, was announced, on Thursday night, by the Duke of Sussex, at a public dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern.

In the City, there are 6 or 7 Candidates, and among them, Messrs. WOOD, WATTHMAN, and THORPE, all three advocates for Retrenchment and Reform. Surely the Livery, after their long sufferings under the corrupt system, advocated by CURTIS and his set of politicians, will hardly suffer one such man to represent them in Parliament.

We are sorry to announce the death of the Right Hon. JOHN HILEY ADDINGTON, of a mortification in his stomach, the night before last. He had been indisposed for some time, but it was not apprehended till Wednesday last that his dissolution would be so speedy. An express was then sent off to his brother Lord Viscount Sidmouth, who set off immediately, but could not arrive before the fatal event had taken place.—Courier—Saturday.

A general meeting of the Proprietors was on Monday held at Drury-lane Theatre, Sir THOMAS TURTON in the Chair, for the purpose of receiving the Report of the Special Committee. After hearing the Report, it was unanimously resolved that the Theatre should not be continued open longer than was absolutely necessary to allow the usual benefits to performers, unless the performers were willing to take on themselves the risk of loss during the remainder of the usual season; that no attempt to open the Theatre next season, without previous arrangement with the creditors, was advisable; that if such arrangements could be effected, it was expedient to raise the sum of 6000*l.*; and that the system of management should be changed, and a person properly qualified should be entrusted with the sole management of the Theatre during the ensuing season, subject only to the revision of his pecuniary arrangements by a Committee named by the Proprietors.

Saturday was married at Tottenham, by the Rev. J. SAMPSON, Mr. R. ROUSE, of Finchley, to Miss GYE, of Wood Greer.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO FANNY, AGED THREE YEARS.

"Even so this happy creature of herself "Is all sufficient: Solitude to her
"Is blithe Society."

WORDSWORTH.

As young and pretty as the bud
Of the strawberry in the wood;
As restless as the fawn that's there,
Playing like a thing of air,—
Chasing the wind, if there be any,—
Like these, art thou, my little FANNY.

I look on thee, and in thy face,
The life is there of childish grace:
I see the silent thought that breaks
Into young smiles as Fancy wakes;
And newly-winged Intelligence,
Trying its little flights from thence.
I see a strife 'twixt Health and Beauty,
Which shall the best achieve its duty;
A gentle strife, for both contend,
But both, like Bees, their labours blend.
Thy cheek by Health is rounded well,
By its hand invisible.

But sweet and rosy hues there are,
And you may trace young Beauty there.
Health made thy gentle lips to be
So glad in their own company;
So lavish of the cherry's dyes,
So like the leaf, when autumn flies;—
But Beauty claims thy young blue eyes.
And oh thy little light soft hair,
Parted on thy forehead fur,
Doth seem to take its own delight
In leaning smooth and looking bright.
Thy figure small, and tiny feet,
Dotting the carpet round us, greet
Our hearts with joy, and feed the sense
Of love for utter innocence.

These beauties, FANNY, are to thee,
As yet, unknown society;—
And so they're a befitting dress
For thy mental prettiness;—
For thy simple thoughts, that seem Fragments of a summer dream;—
For thy merry lips first sayings,
For thy Fancy's fairy strayings:
Thou art wiser far than many
That in years are richer, FANNY.

The best of wisdom dwells with thee,
In thy white simplicity,—
In thy young imaginings,
Which float about on spotless wings;

In thy prattlings, kindly meant,
And in thy beautiful content.
Thine is the bloom of life, and we Are jarrers in society,—
Opposers of each other's good,
Despoilers of all neighbourhood;
Prone to pain, and serious folly,
And framers of self melancholy.
Thou dost wander light and free,
In thine own heart's company;
Making mirth, wherever chance
May lead thee in thy mazy dance;
Like the Linnet wild, that weaves
Glad liberty amid the leaves.

Little copyer of the lives
Of thy playmate relatives,— Mocker of the elder ones,—
How thy wayward fancy runs,
By light from thine own laughing eyes,
Its circle of sweet mimeries.
Oft in thy little face, I find
The fitting shadows of the mind
Pass and repass, as thou dost tease
That mind with infant sophistries:—
And then, when no conclusion's near,
Thou, like a true philosopher,
Dost seek the joyous heart again,
And leave at rest the little brain.

Fare thee well, I've found in thee
Blithe and sweet society;
Merriment in drooping pain,
Pictures, given back again,
Of the pranks of childishness,
Ere I tasted of distress.
Fare thee well, may youth be slow
To pass from thee, who wear'st it so;
For years are but the links of care,
To one so innocent and fair.
Around thee joy, within thee truth,
Thou'rt worthy of perpetual youth;—
Worthy of that delight which lies
Within thy blue and pleasant eyes;
Worthy thy mother's fond caressing.
I owe thee, FANNY, many a blessing,
For pranks of kindliness and glee,
And words of childish charity;
For pleasures generous, light and many,—
And therefore do I bless thee, FANNY!

ANECDOTE OF MR. KEAN.

(We do not insert the following letter for Mr. Kean's gratification, but for our own and the reader's.—Edit.)

SIR,—I think that you will feel pleasure in making the anecdote, which I am about to relate, known to the public. You may rely on its being authentic, as I heard it from undoubted authority.

One evening, as that unrivalled Actor, Mr. Kean, was walking by Drury-lane Theatre, he was addressed by a poor Negro, who was almost naked. The miserable condition of the suppliant excited Mr. Kean's compassion, and as he wished to relieve him, but had not any money about him, with almost unexampled charity he took off his own great-coat, and put it on the beggar, who was, I make no doubt, greatly surprised at such an act of benevolence. In the hopes that you will give this a place in your paper, I shall conclude, by subscribing myself, Sir, your obliged humble servant,

DRURY-LANE.

Mr. ELLISTON appeared on Tuesday as Sheva, in CUMBERLAND's comedy of the Jew, and as Young Wilding in FOOTE's farce of the Liar. Perhaps we never saw him to better advantage in either of these parts. His tremulous and tearful impotence in the former was not less true to the character, than his robust readiness of falsehood in the latter. There is no comparison however in the merits of the two, as pieces of authorship. The humility of the Jew is so over done, that Mr. CUMBERLAND, with all his good intentions, appears to have been hardly so sincere in the work as he would seem. He confessed he expected great gratitude for it from his Israelitish contemporaries, and was disappointed at not finding his portrait realized. Perhaps his flattery was not thought to be so very complimentary. Sheva in fact was intended as a mere contradiction to Shylock. SHAKESPEARE shewed us how a Jew was rendered money-getting and malignant by circumstances, which nevertheless still left the elements of a human being in him;—Mr. CUMBERLAND, not quite so wise, wished to shew us how a Jew was not dependant on habits and circumstances of any sort. Therefore, because Shylock was revengeful, Sheva has no revenge; because Shylock was very furious at being spurned and called a dog, Sheva is collared only to shed tears; because Shylock loved usury, and kept tight hold of the only thing his persecutors allowed him to realize, Sheva makes hundreds to give them away; because Shylock was a Jew all over, such as Judaism and Christianity to boot had made him, Sheva only plays the Jew enough to hinder us from forgetting his excessive Anti-Jewishness, and like Dr. GARTH, is

The best good Christian, though he knows it not.

This is the way neither to mend nor to flatter.

FOOTE's Liar, though not his own idea, for it came to him through comedies both English and French, is a very different thing very spiritedly tossed up. The moral also is as much to the purpose, as it is excellent and unaffected. The way in which the hero gets out of petty difficulties only to get into greater ones, the voluntary extravagances of falsehood to which his habit has brought him, and the affected nicety of detail which is generated by the consciousness of it, are all managed to the life, and were as excellently given us by Mr. ELLISTON. Nothing could be in the more genuine spirit of comedy than the dry and affectedly unconscious manner in which he would halt occasionally, and then resume with an air of eager recollection.

This theatre abruptly closed the other day for the rest of the week. The acknowledged and extreme difficulties of this theatre are very extraordinary things to us. They are laid by many to the account of bad management; but if the theatrical performances are any test on such an occasion, those at Drury Lane have most assuredly been in a finer and higher taste. We cannot but think that a rumour of its being much poorer than Covent Garden, has gone a great way these money-making times.

We are authorised to state, that the representation in our paper of yesterday, that Drury-lane Theatre will close after next Monday, was inaccurate, as the performances will continue in regular succession after that day until the end of the season.—Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of CAMBRIDGE have signified their intention of honouring Drury-lane Theatre with their presence on Wednesday next.—Morning Chronicle.

LITERARY NOTICES.

No. 43.

THE EDITOR OF THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

This little person is a considerable catspaw: and so far worthy of some slight notice. He is the Government Critic, a character nicely differing from that of a Government spy—an invisible link, that connects literature with the police. It is his business to keep a strict eye over all writers who differ in opinion with his Majesty's Ministers, and to measure their talents and attainments by the standard of their servility and meanness. For this office he is well qualified.—The Editor of the Quarterly Review is also Paymaster of the Band of Gentlemen-Pensioners; and whenever an author comes before him in the one capacity, with whom he is not acquainted in the other, he knows how to deal with him. He has his cue beforehand. The distinction between truth and falsehood is lost upon him: he minds only the distinction between Whig and Tory. The same set of threadbare common-places, the same second-hand assortment of abusive nicknames, are always repeated; and the ready convenient lie comes in aid of the lack of other resources, and passes off, with impunity, in the garb of religion and loyalty. He is under the protection of the Court; and his zeal for his King and country gives him a right to say what he pleases of every writer who does not do all in his power to pamper the one into a tyrant, and to trample the other into a herd of slaves. Without wit or understanding in himself, he derives his weight with the great and powerful from the very circumstance that takes away all real weight from his opinion, viz. that it has no one object but to flatter their folly and vices in the grossest manner, by holding up to hatred and contempt whatever opposes in the slightest degree, or in the most flagrant instances of abuse, their pride and passions. Accustomed to the indulgence of his mercenary virulence and party-spite, he seems to have lost all relish as well as capacity for the ordinary exercises of the understanding, and makes up for the obvious want of ability by the barefaced want of principle. There is something in the nature of man that suits with his office. He is in no danger of exciting the jealousy of his patrons by a splendid display of extraordinary talents, while his sordid devotion to their will, and to his own interest, at once ensures their gratitude and contempt. Of an humble origin himself, he recommends his performances to persons of fashion by always abusing low people, with the smartness of a lady's waiting-woman, and the independent spirit of a travelling tutor. Raised from the lowest rank to his present despicable eminence in the world of letters, he is indignant that any one should attempt to rise into notice, except by the same regular tramels and servile gradations, or go about to separate the stamp of merit from the badge of sycophancy. The silent listener in select circles and menial tool of noble families has become the oracle of Church and State. The purveyor to the prejudices of a private patron succeeds, by no other title, to regulate the public taste. Having felt the inconveniences of poverty, this man looks up with low and grovelling admiration to the advantages of wealth and power: having had to contend with the mechanical difficulties of ignorance, he sees nothing in learning but its mechanical uses. A self-taught man naturally becomes a pedant, and mistakes the means of knowledge for the end, unless he is a man of genius, and Mr. Giffard is not a man of genius. From having known nothing originally, he thinks it a great matter to know any thing now, no matter what or how small it is—nay, the smaller and more insignificant it is, the more curious he thinks it, as it is further removed from common sense and human nature. The collating of points and commas is the highest game his literary ambition can reach to, and the squabbles of editors are to him more important than the meaning of the author.

He thinks more of the letter than the spirit of a passage, and in his eagerness to shew his minute superiority over others, misses both. There cannot be a greater nuisance than a dull, envious, low-bred man, who is placed in the situation of the Editor of the Quarterly Review. Conscious that his reputation stands on very slender and narrow foundations, he is naturally jealous of the pretensions of others. He insults over unsuccessful authors; he hates successful ones. He is angry at the faults of a work, more angry at its excellences. If an opinion is old, he treats it with supercilious indifference; if it is new, it provokes his rage. Having but a limited range of understanding, every thing beyond that range appears to him a paradox and an absurdity; and he resents every suggestion of the kind as an imposition on the public, and an insult on his own sagacity. He cavils at what he does not comprehend; and misrepresents what he knows to be true. Bound to go through the periodical task of abusing all those who are not, like himself, the abject tools of power, his irritation increases with the number of obstacles he meets with, and the number of sacrifices he is obliged to make of common sense and veracity to his interest and self-conceit. Every instance of prevarication he wilfully commits makes him more in love with hypocrisy, and every indulgence of his hired malignity makes him more disposed to repeat the insult and the injury. His understanding becomes more and more distorted, and his feelings more and more callous. Grown old in the service of corruption, he drivels on to the last with prostituted impotence, and shameless effrontery; gorges a meagre reputation for wit, by venting the dribbles of his spleen and impertinence on others; answers their arguments by confuting himself; mistakes habitual obtuseness of intellect for a particular acuteness, not to be imposed upon by shallow pretensions; unprincipled rancour for zealous loyalty; and the irritable, discontented, vindictive, and peevish effusions of bodily pain and mental infirmity, for proofs of refinement of taste and strength of understanding.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

The great outlines of almost all objects contain within them lesser outlines, and these again numerous smaller ones, so that the whole presents a beautiful, crimped, and touchy surface; gradually however becoming finer and smoother in appearance as they are removed from the place they are seen from, till the whole melts mistily into the horizon. All this is particularly seen in landscape scenery, and even a round and smooth young face has, when viewed nearly, a pleasing broken tinting of red and white. It is a great and unusual beauty in the painting of flesh. Mr. JACKSON, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. PHILLIPS, are quite alive to it, as is Mr. CALCOTT, in his Mouth of the Tyne. We always see this rich feature of Nature well pencilled by Mr. COLLINS. His 8, Scene on the Coast of Norfolk, has it profusely in the nubilous atmosphere, the still wave, the young fishermen, &c. Mr. NASMYTH has well painted it in 22, View near Lutterary. This picture has little or no aerial perspective. In Mr. KIDD's excellent picture, 18, The Poacher detected, it enriches a most naturally represented scene in a study, where the shaggy gentleman, the hand-fumbling, sheepish poacher, standing before him, the accusing game-keeper, the hare, dogs, dresses, &c. all invite us to fulfil our intention of giving it a eulogistic notice. The main light shining in at the window spreads beautifully into the room, where it glows on the ink-stand and other objects, so as, with a due proportion of lesser light in other parts, to keep in just counterbalance the strong sunshine at the window. Every object is seen with proper distinctness and no more, and with a cheerful colour that does not participate of any place; so that in all the requisites of the subject there is an effective but controuled power, a praise that attaches to few of our painters of domestic subjects, who mostly strike into caricature. Even Mr. ALLAN, whose powers are great, deviates somewhat into bombast in his picture of a Press-gang. In the attitude of the Officer, he rouses up the departed spirit of Mr. KEMBLE's studied starts. But this picture, though poor in colour, has, like that actor, some capital passages of character, though rather overwrought, for fathers and wives are not apt to faint away on these occasions in sea-ports. Mr. KIDD has, in fine, painted his subject on sound principles.—Notwithstanding a hard outline and somewhat too olive a colour. Mr. J. J. CHALON has given us good Spanish scenery and good character in 81, Gil Blas and Diego the Barber meeting with the Player.

Excellent as our Miniature Painters were last year, they have still more beautifully advanced their respective styles. The grey quakerism of Mr. A. E. CHALON's colouring is recommended by its unity, neatness, and brightness, and by the remarkable look of life and easy attitudes of his figures. They almost make us doubt whether his style is not the best. On the whole, however, we prefer a warmer spread of colour, masterly as it is of its kind. Mrs. GREEN's are such as we should expect from the taste and intellectuality of her family. 704 and 717, Major Light and a Lady, have a chastened brightness of colour, admirably understood effects of light and shade, and a cast of dresses truly elegant. Mr. A. ROBERTSON's add to their former elegant neatness and lively colour the advantage of greater force. He has a beautiful distinctness of outline and breadth of manner; but we rather prefer that style of outline and effect seen in Mr. S. P. DENNING's portrait of Mrs. Fletcher, which is more broken and varied in the outline, the marking, and the flesh, and is the exact medium, we think, between the liny and hard and the very blended outline. His colouring, too, is here a nicely calculated midway between the very glowing and the grey. This portrait is, at least in our judgment, one of the most correct displays of what the style of a miniature ought to be, particularly in relation to the degree of strength. His strongest shades are only as dark as the half tints of others, and yet Mr. CHALON's are scarcely brighter. Diminished as a miniature is in so very great a degree from the original size, it strikes us that it is best when it has a considerable degree of tenderness in the colouring, light, and shade, that do not necessarily belong to larger works. This appears to be Mr. DENNING's principle, and the effect of it, as seen in this miniature, is charming. He has given a different style in light, shade, and colour, to 646, Portrait of Hagee Baba, which is nearly as dark as REMBRANDT, and painted on very similar principles, but better drawn. The sumptuous dress is kept in excellent subordination to the face and hands, while it receives a beautiful and varied play of half light. Masterly as this is, we prefer this style for larger works, though the whole is still softened into sobriety and great tenderness as a miniature; for it is not more against very decisive outlines that we contend, than against decisive colours and chiaro-scuro, such as are in Mr. ROBERTSON's capital and justly admired miniatures. Mr. ROBERTSON's are beautifully finished, and have extraordinary brilliancy and look of life. Mr. NEWTON has every year made strides of improvement, in a style where every principle of his art is well understood.—Mr. HAUGHTON's style is sometimes rather heavy, but with very considerable attachment and excellent likenesses.

The three Misses SHARPE should have more than a brief mention, did our room allow, for their very able miniatures. 830, A Mother and dead Child, by Miss L. SHARPE, has a true vigour of feeling in the different requisites of her subject. She gives a more elevated character to the class of miniature by the superiority of her subject.

and her excellent manner of treating it. Among many other striking miniatures are those by F. FERRIERE, Mr. THOMSON, Middle, BEAUREPAIRE, Mr. HARGREAVES, Mr. DOUGLAS, H. THOMSON, H., Mr. EMDIN, P. VIOLET, Miss JONES, Miss KNIGHT, Mr. FAULKNER, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. SCOTNEY, Mr. H. HERVE, &c.

Among various good Drawings are those by Mr. CONSTARLE, 446. A Gothic Porch, &c.; 482, the Haymaker's Repast, R. HILLS; Mr. CAPON's Trees; Mr. W. VARLEY's Views; 871, View of Cloakham, J. B. KNIGHT, H., and some beautifully bright and new effects in various houses and pleasure grounds by Mr. J. MARTIN. It is almost superfluous to mention the admired works in Enamel by Mr. BONE, Mr. MURPHY, &c. Mr. HAYNES, Mr. UWINS, and others, have good portrait drawings. It is a pleasure to see the labour and talent which produce this year such an improved shew of flowers and fruit, coloured and drawn with botanical nicety, purity, and splendour, both on light and dark grounds. Among the best are Mr. PELLETIER's, large on white grounds, Miss BAKER's, small on dark grounds, which are among the highest finished and clearest we have ever yet seen in the Exhibition, and worthy to be placed, as one is, among Mr. EDRIDGE's masterly portrait drawings. She has also a very correct Study of Grouse from Nature. The Florist will look with pleasure on Mrs. KEARSE's, Mrs. ADAMS's, Miss COTTON's, Mr. BURGESS's, Mr. MIKELL's, Mr. HARDY's, &c. The chaplets all these Artists produce, in honour of British taste, are too beautiful to be overlooked by a British Critic.

TO LORD HENRY H. MOLYNEUX HOWARD.

MY LORD.—I have lately read your address to the Freemen of Gloucester, and the eulogium which the persons who met at the Plough Tavern have passed upon your conduct. The reference in the latter to the necessity of a minute attention to the expenditure of the country is rather unfortunate, as your vote upon one occasion, since your present rank was conferred upon you, if the list of the minority was correctly given, was not very favourable to economy. Neither was the allusion to your independence well-timed; since, if we may judge from that vote, you had, for years, sacrificed your own judgment to the wishes of the patron by whose influence you obtained your seat in Parliament.

In your address, you have taken some pains to conceal the plain fact, which may be told in a few words. The influence of the late Duke of Norfolk procured your election for Gloucester; and, he being dead, you had no more chance of being returned at the next election, than you had of being made Prime Minister. The only parts of your address, which it is my intention to notice particularly, are, your avowal of personal prudence, your declaration of care for your family, your boast of independence, and your determination not to hazard your comforts. Of your personal prudence I have had a convincing proof; and if you, at any time, wish for my testimony, it shall be at your service. Your care for your family induced you to cling to the late Duke of Norfolk, and to retain the legacy he bequeathed to you, though his Grace's children receive only miserable pittance in the form of annuities. Your professions of independence must be laughed at by every one acquainted with your subserviency to the late Duke, and the servility by which you induced his Grace to permit you to remain at Arundel, after he had openly shown his desire to remove you from it. As, however, you have, by your public profession of this virtue, challenged inquiry, I shall accept the challenge, and shall, at a proper opportunity, publicly state the means by which you have obtained, for yourself and your son, the largest portion of the immense property bequeathed by the late Duke, while his children are left in penury; means which appear to me to militate against your claims to independence. As for your avowed determination to secure your own comforts, no one can doubt your sincerity. You have always studied to increase them, as far as wealth could enable you to attain that object; and have not hesitated to accept, and retain, property which, according to every principle of moral justice, ought to belong to others. Some men think that riches, purchased by a loss of character, cannot add to their comforts: others, and your Lordship may be amongst the number, fancy that wealth, however obtained, is desirable, even though infamy should attend the possession of it.

Perhaps you may think that this letter is a repetition of the insult, which, as I have been informed, you consider me to have formerly offered you. If such should be your opinion, I recommend patience to you; for the course which you formerly pursued is no longer open to you. You cannot now go, whining like a beaten school boy, to your neighbours, requesting them to fight your battles for you. You cannot again intreat and implore a wine-merchant, and an attorney, men respectable in their stations, but whom you had previously treated with considerable arrogance, to stand forward in defence of one of the Noble Family of Howard, who could not, or would not, defend himself. Nay, even the rank and influence of your noble and magnanimous relative will now be of no avail; and the threat that no persons who dared to receive me, or the daughters of your benefactor, within their doors, should ever enter the gates of Arundel Castle, would now be uttered in vain. The Catholic Patron, however inclined to persecution, cannot deprive me of another Living, in direct opposition to the avowed sentiments of his Catholic Brethren, who maintain that "it is utterly unreasonable and inconsistent, that the members of one religious community should appoint the Pastors of another;" and must therefore regard the removal of the Pastor of one religious community, by the member of another, for the purpose of persecution, with abhorrence. I am beyond the reach of the weapons with which you courageously attacked an unarmed man, and the mode of warfare you formerly adopted must be laid aside. You can no longer fire from behind a parapet and wound your adversary, while you are secured from hazard.

My Lord, I take my leave of you for the present; reminding you, that you could notice and ridicule the arts and manoeuvres of some other branches of the Noble Family, who were competitors with you for the late Duke's favour, when your fears were excited lest they should obtain, as they have done, portions of the prize; that the character of a legacy-hunter has always been held in contempt or abhorrence; and that, while a single spark of virtuous and manly feeling has remained in a nation, the odious reptile, when once exposed, has been driven from the society of honourable men.—I am, my Lord, your's, &c.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Tuesday, June 9.

MARQUIS OF EXETER v. DRAKARD.

Mr. GURNEY said, that he was instructed to show cause against a rule for a criminal information against the proprietor of the Stamford News, for a supposed libel upon the Marquis of Exeter.

Lord ELMENBOROUGH asked, if Mr. Gurney were provided with any affidavits in which it was sworn that the imputations contained in the alleged libel were true.

Mr. GURNEY answered, that he was: several persons, whose names it was not necessary to state, deposed to the irregular and indecorous conduct of the Marquis of Exeter, who, in company with a Capt. Percy, had frequently (seven instances being particularized) ridden through the town of Stamford, nodding, &c. to females whom he saw; on one occasion he stopped before a window where some most respectable ladies were sitting, and who in consequence were obliged to retire. At another time his Lordship had been seen smiling and nodding at Mary Bolland, a milliner and dress-maker in the town, and peeping into the shop where she was at work. The Noble Marquis had carried these improprieties to such a length, that his conduct had become the subject of general conversation and complaint. He had also several confirmatory affidavits on behalf of the defendant, the proprietor of the Stamford News.

Mr. CLARKE interrupted Mr. Gurney, and observed, that it was unnecessary to enter further into the facts stated, if the Court thought that a repelition of the assertions in the libel afforded a sufficient answer to the application. The Marquis of Exeter probably could not contradict what was sworn, that he had ridden through the town, of which he was almost the sole proprietor, and he might have looked into a milliner's shop; but the Learned Counsel submitted that this could not warrant the gross attack made upon him by the defendant. The Marquis of Exeter was a very young nobleman, and might, perhaps, have been guilty of some of those indiscretions, from which his rank did not exempt him; but it was not fit, for the sake of public decency, that they should thus be made the subject of public discussion.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—It should seem that this staring in at the windows and these noddings have been many times repeated, and they lead to the conclusion that there is something improper in the conduct of the Marquis of Exeter, which has been made matter of animadversion and complaint. I apprehend, according to the rule the Court has laid down for itself, it will not interpose by criminal information, if the facts are confirmed upon affidavits; but it leaves the party to his remedy before a Grand Jury.

Mr. CLARKE repeated, that the Marquis of Exeter was a very young nobleman, only about 18 years of age.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—We do not say whether the publication is a libel or not; only that the Court, under the circumstances, will not take notice of it.

Mr. CLARKE submitted, that the affidavits did not sufficiently answer the complaint. The Marquis of Exeter had a right to ride through his own borough, and if he saw friends at a window, there could be no great harm in nodding to them.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH again said, that as affidavits were produced to show that what was advanced in the letter published in the Stamford News was true, the Court would not interpose.

Mr. CLARKE complained that the attack had been repeated; and that to prevent the further outrage of his Lordship's feelings, it had become necessary to take some step or other.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY observed, that if the Noble Marquis thought it prudent, he could bring his case before a Grand Jury, and that very shortly, as the assizes were so near.

Mr. GURNEY contended that the defendant had only maintained the facts he had once asserted, and which he was ready to prove.

Mr. CLARKE referred to what he called the indecent observations made by the Stamford News upon the motion for a criminal information: as to the part of them that related to himself and supposed mis-statements he had made, he was perfectly indifferent.—Rule discharged.

LORD S. CHURCHILL v. THE TIMES.

Just at the rising of the Court, Mr. SCARLETT addressed their Lordships, and requested that they would permit him to make a motion, which, unless made to day, a young nobleman would still continue subject to those persecutions which he had suffered for some time past. His application was for a criminal information against a public print, and he made it on the part of Lord Charles Spencer Churchill, whose character had been attacked in the grossest manner, and who had been tormented both with public and private libels for some time past. His present application was founded on affidavits verifying every word which he should state to their Lordships. It appeared that on the 20th of last month, Lord Charles Spencer Churchill was driving in his tilbury along the King's-road, at a moderate pace; just before him was a chaise, in which were Mr. Tooke and two ladies. Mr. Tooke appeared to be a very indifferent driver. There was full room for three carriages in that part of the road in which they were; but the unskilful manner in which Mr. Tooke managed his horse, rendered it impossible for Lord Charles to pass him. His Lordship called to him several times, but Mr. Tooke apparently paid no attention. At this instant another carriage came up, passed Lord Charles and Mr. Tooke, and Lord Charles then determined to pass himself. Mr. Tooke, however, either alarmed by the carriages passing him, or from want of skill, drove against a post, and by the concussion one of the ladies was thrown out, and the consequences which followed were most calamitous. Lord Charles immediately pulled up, got out of his carriage, and anxiously offered every assistance in his power to the young lady and her friends. On the day following he called at the surgeon's, and requested, if it should appear that his presence was at all necessary before the Coroner, that he might be summoned. The surgeon, however, stated, that there was no necessity for his appearance. The verdict of the Coroner's Jury was "Accidental Death;" and the Learned Counsel stated, that he had now an affidavit from one of the Jurymen, which declared that it was the unanimous opinion of the Jury that no blame ought to be attached to Lord Charles Spencer Churchill. On the day following, however, a letter appeared in the Times newspaper, addressed to the Editor, and signed "A Relative." That letter purported to contain a correct account of the accident which had happened in the King's-road, and it imputed the occasion of the catastrophe entirely to the furious driving of his Lordship, and to his improper impatience in attempting to pass the carriage. The letter went on to state that the witnesses examined before the Coroner were unanimous in imputing the accident to the negligence of Lord Charles, and it contained a comment upon his Lordship's conduct, dictated in the strongest language. Since that time, a second letter had appeared in the same paper, signed T. Tooke, expressing indignation at the manner in which his Lordship had treated the matter, Lord Charles having gone to a ball at Almack's on the same night on which the accident happened, and never having once sent to inquire after the family. The Learned Counsel said, that the assertion contained in both these letters were false and calumnious, and observed, that Lord Charles had also received certain anonymous communications, in which he had been charged with the murder of the young lady.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—One does not know but that he may have been negligent in driving, but that was not a ground for a charge of murder. It was certainly unfeeling in him not to have called upon the family after the accident.

Mr. SCARLETT.—He did call, my Lord. This is a misrepresentation.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—You are not now moving for a criminal information against Mr. Tooke, but against a newspaper. If you can bring the anonymous letters home to Mr. Tooke, it is well. You may then move for a criminal information against him.

Mr. SCARLETT.—Three witnesses were examined before the inquest, Mr. Tooke, Mary Smith, and William Jones. The Jury were unanimous in their opinion that there was no improper driving on the part of his Lordship. It was only Mr. Tooke who swore that there was any negligence.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—There was different evidence before the Coroner then, if Mr. Tooke swore that there was improper driving.

Mr. SCARLETT.—Yes, my Lord; but the newspaper had no right to state that the witnesses were unanimous on that subject. On the contrary, all but Mr. Tooke swore that there was no negligence on the part of his Lordship.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—This is certainly a misrepresentation, and upon that account I think you are entitled to your rule to show cause.—Rule granted.

THE KING v. STANLEY, ESQ. AND MORGAN.

An indictment against the two defendants, the one the son of Mrs. Stanley, widow of a Master in Chancery, and the other her coachman, for an assault upon Samuel Darby, a livery stable-keeper.

Samuel Darby deposed, that he was a livery-stable keeper at North Portland-mews. Mrs. Stanley jobbed horses with the witness, and on the 16th of December last Morgan brought the horses home, having used them very ill; witness remonstrated, and said that he should not use them so again; but Morgan knocked him down. He then went away, but returned with young Stanley; the witness insisted that the defendant should drive the horses no more; defendant said he would, and struck the witness on the breast, and broke one of his ribs: at the same time young Stanley struck the witness, and cut his lip; they then both fell upon him, and beat him very much. Young Stanley then took him round the body, and said, "Out with him; d—n him we'll have him out, if we murder him." The witness then cried murder. A person named Bunkell then came to his assistance, and the two defendants went away with the carriage and horses. The witness kept his bed for a week, and was attended for a fortnight by a medical man.

Mr. Baylis, an apothecary, had attended Darby, who had considerable fever and a cough; a rib was fractured on the right side; he was also much bruised, and his head contused.

Mr. READER addressed the Jury for the defendants. Young Stanley was only between 18 and 19 years of age, but not at all of a disposition to commit an outrage of this nature. The horses were jobbed by the year, and for the time the horses were here, and she had a right to have them out at any time of the night. The fact was, that Darby was quite drunk at the time of the assault, and young Stanley might legally exercise so much force upon the prosecutor as was necessary to give him the use of his mother's horses to carry him to his brother's, the night being very wet. It was very likely that a struggle took place, but it was entirely owing to Darby's refusing to allow Mrs. Stanley's coachman to take out her horses.

John Caldicot, constable, swore that he had seen the prosecutor extremely intoxicated on the night in question; he was leaning on the pole of a carriage, as if he could not support himself without it. The witness had never heard a man use more abusive language. This was soon after the assault. The witness was not aware that Darby had been assaulted, and heard no complaint.

Thos. O'ly saw Darby after this assault very drunk and very abusive to the defendant Morgan.

Mr. GUNTER insisted that the appearance of intoxication was occasioned by the cruel beating the prosecutor had received.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH left the case to the Jury, who found both the defendants guilty.

BYRNE V. CUNOX.

This was an action brought against the defendant for a nuisance. It appeared that the defendant was a goldbeater, living next door to Mr. Byrne, who was continually disturbed by the noise and hammering.

Mr. SCARLETT stated the case to the Jury: after which several witnesses were called, who deposed, that such was the effect of the hammering, that the glasses were continually shaking on the table, that the furniture was also shook, and that it was extremely disagreeable to the plaintiff's family.

A Jurymen.—It is useless to go farther.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—Really, Mr. MARRYAT, you might as well give up the case, unless you can bring contrary evidence. You see the common sense of the Jury makes them state that they are satisfied. It is clear that the plaintiff is much annoyed by this noise and shaking. No earthly consideration could induce me to live in such a situation, unless compelled by extreme poverty. It is, in fact, depriving a man of all the comforts of life. The Jury may find for the plaintiff, with the smallest damages, as his object is merely to remove the evil.

Mr. SCARLETT.—My Lord, I shall take a shilling damages, on the defendant agreeing to remove the nuisance.

Mr. MARRYAT agreed to this.

CONSISTORY COURT.

Thursday, June 11.

SULLIVAN V. OLDACRE, FALSELY CALLING HERSELF SULLIVAN.

Sir Wm. SCOTT.—This suit was instituted by the Right Hon. John Sullivan, for the purpose of annulling the marriage of his son, John Augustus Sullivan, with Maria Oldacre, which took place under the following circumstances:—Mr. Sullivan, jun. having left Eton school, was placed at Riching's Lodge, under the care of a private tutor. In 1815, he began to hunt with the Berkeley hounds, which were under the direction of Mr. Thomas Oldacre, and consequently Mr. Sullivan, jun. often visited at his house, where he lived in a style far superior to that of huntsmen in general. Hence an acquaintance commenced between Mr. Sullivan and Miss Oldacre, which soon ripened into intimacy. Mr. Sullivan, sen. seems to have been totally ignorant of this intimacy, being disabled by his public functions from paying minute attention to his domestic concerns. The Misses Sullivan once accompanied their brother to the house, and the tutor was often there; yet Mr. Sullivan, sen. never heard of the intimacy which existed, either from son, daughter, or tutor. The bans were published in two churches, by the names of John Augustus Sullivan and Maria Holmes Oldacre, and the marriage was solemnized in St. Olave, Southwark; Mr. Sullivan, jun. being nearly 18, and Miss Oldacre nearly 21 years of age. It is impossible to doubt but that Mr. Sullivan, sen., on hearing the event, expressed the deepest regret; and there is nothing remarkable in his subsequent reconciliation, while he considered the marriage irrevocable. Mr. Sullivan having received further advice, commenced proceedings against Mr. Oldacre and his daughter. Mr. Sullivan was totally ignorant of the transaction, and his want of consent is necessarily implied. One point I lament much, that Mr. Sullivan, sen. should unfortunately have put an interrogatory, which reflects on the character of Miss Oldacre; and I consider that I am but discharging a debt of justice when I declare, that there is not in this evidence a single word that can in the slightest degree impeach her character. Her father and mother both discouraged the young man's attention. She was at first under an engagement to marry a young man in her own situation in life, which affords a strong presumption in favour of the correctness of her conduct; and the letter of Mr. Sullivan to his father bears strong testimony of her good qualities. Much more has been said with respect to disparity of age than I am inclined to give attention to. It has been argued, that a young woman understands manœuvring, and tricks, and tactics, sufficient to deceive a youth who was three years her junior; but I must recollect that the young man has gone through Eton school; and, if I may judge from his letters, certainly does exhibit a greater maturity of intellect than usually falls to the lot of that age. Disparity of circumstances is a more serious objection; but we well know that the passion which leads to marriage is very apt to overleap distinctions of that nature. At first, I supposed that it was to be argued as a conspiracy, and the parents of the young woman were pointed out as the conductors of it. It is very natural to them to endeavour to promote what they consider the advancement of their daughter, and if that is done without fraud, it is too much to call it a conspiracy. When it is followed up by fraud, it is possible that the validity of the marriage may be affected, but if a young man of large fortune and noble birth should be induced to marry a person beneath himself, after due publication of bans, nothing can relieve him from chains which, though forged by others, have been fastened by himself. Artifices and misrepresentations are charged, amounting almost to spells and witchcraft, but not one witness is able to explain them. A pretty strong distortion of facts has been used to prove this a conspiracy. Mr. Oldacre desires his daughter not to ride out with Mr. Sullivan. Mrs. Oldacre desires Mr. Sullivan to abstain from writing love-letters to her daughter. This is called not only simulation, but stimulation. What language were the parents to hold? What conduct were they to pursue? Where was the delusion? He was aware of her age and condition, and of his father's ignorance. All the declarations are on his side. He himself writes the bans, and delivers them at both churches. There are no advances on her part, but a mere return of affection. The concealment from the father is an act of clandestinity on the part of the son. The silence of her parents is no act of clandestinity, unless you prove a previous obligation to communicate; but the law requires no such thing. The whole fraud, then, is resolved into a non-communication of the fact to Mr. Sullivan, sen. The case is then reduced to the simple question of the publication of bans. The marriage act requires, 1st, that bans should be three times published in the parish-church where the parties dwell; 2d, that they shall indicate the true names and residences of the parties; but these are required under different circumstances. A false description of residence will be a mere impedimentum impeditivum, whereas false names will operate as the impedimentum dirimens. The true names of illegitimate children are difficult to be ascertained. It is usual to give them the name of their mother. In general, where there is a name of baptism and a surname, these are to be used, unless a name be assumed afterwards by which they are better known. In the case of Mather against Ney, the lady, from a frolic, would be married by the name of Wright: the Court held, that the publication operated as a fraud, and pronounced against the marriage. It can neither encourage dangerous levity, or destroy marriages by a pedantic strictness; partial variations arise from various causes, and with different effects; sometimes of one letter only, as Dobbins, for Dobbyn; sometimes of more, as Widowcraft, for Meadowcraft: at others, the omission of a name. These may arise from fraud, but they may also arise from accident; but where the variation does not so disfigure the name as to destroy identity, it is open to explanation. If that refers to causes perfectly innocent, the Court will decide that there is no fraud. If it is left doubtful, then general evidence will decide the point. But you must first show that there is falsehood in the explanation, before you can go into other circumstances of fraud. If there is no false publication of bans, no evidence of other frauds can be received. The falsehood of the publication is the whole—prove that, and every thing is proved—without it nothing. I cannot think the name of Holmes inserted by Maria Oldacre is sufficient to destroy her identity. The explanation offered is, that she was born before her mother's marriage, whose maiden name was Holmes. Her parents desired it might be inserted in the bans, as a measure of caution. This is a very natural solution of the fact. One circumstance is to my mind decisive, that it could not be used in fraud. Who was to be concealed, not Maria Oldacre, but John Augustus Sullivan. Mr. Sullivan, sen. did not know such a person was in existence, and therefore could not have been deceived. If fraud had been intended, it would have nestled in that part of the case. In the case of Puget, and all the cases, the name of the minor has been disguised. This name was assumed for the purpose of making assurance doubly sure; and I am convinced that this is the view of the case which the law compels me to take—that the knot of this marriage cannot be untied by the law. I have therefore to pronounce, that Maria Holmes Oldacre is the lawful wife of John Augustus Sullivan, and that he is bound to take her home, and treat her with conjugal affection.

BOARD OF EXCISE.

Thursday, June 11.

THE KING v. LUKE LYONS.

The defendant is a brewer, and was brought up, under an indictment containing seven different counts, charging him with having made use of various deleterious drugs in his brewery.

Wm. Wells, an officer of the Excise, stated, that the residence of Mr. Lyons was in Dean-street, Shadwell, and the brewhouse was in Bell-wharf, Shadwell. Witness had a warrant to search for drugs. The defendant said, that he had no such thing in his house. After going through many rooms, followed by Mr. and Mrs. Lyons, and Mr. Lyons, jun., witness found one pound of capsicum, two pounds of liquorice root ground, two pounds of coriander seed, one pound of copperas, eight pounds of orange powder, and a small quantity of Spanish liquorice.

Joseph Middleton, who accompanied the last witness, corroborated his statement.

Charles Angus, a chemist, was next called, the liquorice-powder, he said, was used as a substitute for malt; it had more saccharine matter in it, and was much cheaper. The orange-powder was also used as a substitute for malt, and was intended particularly to give a flavour and a colouring to the beer; it had nothing pernicious in it. The capsicum produced a heating effect similar to cayenne; the coriander seed was used for the purpose of keeping the beer up, to prevent its turning gray or sour; the copperas had the effect of showing off bad beer to advantage, and to preserve it from turning sour, but would not supply the place of malt, having none of its spirit.

Mr. C. Lyons, the son of the defendant, said, he had been told to destroy the bag and drugs, and it was his own neglect that he had not done so. He had never used any of the drugs in his life, nor did he know the names of them. On his oath he never used a drug of any kind. If the drugs now produced were those which had been taken from his premises, they were the same as those which came from a fire that had occurred in the neighbourhood.

The defendant was ordered to pay the fines of 20*l.* upon the first count, 200*l.* upon the third, and 200*l.* upon the seventh count in the indictment.

THE KING v. RICHARD BOWMAN.

The defendant was also a brewer, living in Wapping-street, Wapping, and was charged with having in his possession a drug which was called multum, and a quantity of copperas.—The articles were produced by Thomas Gates, an Excise officer, who had after a search found them on the defendant's premises.

Mr. Angus proved that the multum was an extract of quassia: it was both sweet and bitter, and answered the purpose of both malt and hops: it contained nothing deleterious. The copperas was a green copperas, and was a poisonous drug, sometimes used as a vomit: it was used in breweries to make a good brown head to the beer. An ounce of it would be sufficient for a butt, such was its powerful effect.

The Court sentenced the defendant to pay a fine of 200*l.*

THE KING v. CROWN DANCIE.

The charge against this defendant, who was also a brewer, was for having in his possession 7*lb.* of molasses.—The defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of 20*l.*

THE KING v. THOMAS EVANS.

The charge against this defendant was, that he had in his possession 47 barrels of sour unwholesome beer.

It appeared that this beer was purchased at the sale of a bankrupt brewer; and Mr. Laws, on the part of Mr. Evans, proved that that gentleman was now a cooper, and was in the habit of employing a number of workmen. He also endeavoured to show that the beer was bought for the use of the workmen he employed. These hard-working men were not contented, he observed, in this hot weather, with common beer; they liked something sharp, and as he had heard it emphatically called, "cut-throat beer." This was the sort of stuff for their palates, and he had little doubt but that it was as good as Champagne to them.

Several samples of the beer were produced, all of them of a different colour, and filled with sediment.—A fine of 30*l.* was ordered to be paid by the defendant.

Friday, June 12.

KING v. WAINWRIGHT.

This was an information against Mr. George Wainwright, bottle-merchant, Nos. 63 and 64, New Compton-street, Soho, for having in his possession and using a private still.—The Commissioners convicted the defendant in the penalty of 100*l.*

THE KING v. HOLT.

The defendant, Mr. Holt, the proprietor of the Phoenix, Ratcliffe-cross, was convicted in the penalty of 25*l.* for running contraband spirits, which were seized by the officers of the Excise in Whitechapel. There were only two gallons of spirits: the penalty was taken by consent.

ADMIRALTY SESSIONS.

On Friday, Wm. Henry Newton was put to the bar, accused of poisoning Henry Ryder.

John Carter (a man of colour) was on board the brig William. The deceased was Captain: she afterwards made a voyage in July last from Barbadoes to Maranhon: prisoner came on board that voyage at Barbadoes to be pilot for the Brazils; he messed in the cabin with deceased and William Bowden, the mate.

This and the other witnesses detailed a number of circumstances, which appeared to leave no doubt that the deceased was poisoned by means of arsenic. The only question was, whether it was by accident, or through the malice of the prisoner, who had had a quarrel with the deceased.—Several witnesses were examined as to the character of the prisoner; and after a trial of some length, the Jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

SOUTHWARK SESSIONS.

John Driescoll was found guilty of having, together with nearly 50 other persons, riotously and tumultuously assembled, on the 5th of April last, to break and disturb the peace, and for having assaulted the Rev. John Rippon, D.D.—The prisoner having been found guilty, was earnestly recommended to mercy by Dr. Rippon, on account of his penitence, and the sickness he had endured since his confinement for more than two months.—The Court, in passing sentence, wished the prisoner to convey to his countrymen the lesson that no religious congregation should be disturbed on pain of the most rigorous punishment. By way of example, he could not be visited with less than imprisonment for another month.

POLICE.

UNION-HALL.

On Tuesday, Hall and Goff, the officers, brought the Rev. Isaac Tapper before R. J. CHAMBERS, Esq. charged with having in his possession a quantity of stolen property.—Mr. Knevatt, of Peter-street, stated, that on the night of Whit-Sunday last his shop was broken open, and a great number of carpenters' tools were stolen. Hall and Goff produced a part of the property, which they found in the possession of Mrs. Abraham, of Mint-street. Mrs. Abraham stated, that she purchased the articles in question of Mr. Haynes, who also lives in Mint-street, and Haynes deposed that he bought them of the prisoner.—The prisoner protested most vehemently that the stolen property had never been in his possession; it was a charged trumped up against him by the officers, and was a continuation of that conspiracy which had caused him to be brought before the Magistrate in a former instance, when he was charged with having in his possession stolen property.—He was remanded.

Mary Ann Johnstone, a young woman, dressed in the first style of fashion, was on Tuesday charged as follows:—Collingbourn, the officer, stated, that being on duty at Vauxhall-gardens in Monday night and Tuesday morning, he was applied to about three o'clock, by a Gentleman of some rank, to remove from the gardens three females, who by their obscene expressions and disgusting conduct had compelled himself and his family to quit a box in which they were sitting. He sought for them a considerable time without success, but his attention being attracted by a great disturbance in the Prince's gallery, he proceeded to the spot, and there discovered the prisoner and her two companions, who had been supping with some gentlemen, and having afterwards quarrelled with them, were in the act of carrying on a furious war; one of the gentlemen was sprawling on the ground, while the blood flowed profusely from his nose. Collingbourn requested the prisoner to leave the gardens, which she not only positively refused to do, but assaulted him in a most outrageous manner; with the assistance of the other officers in attendance, he got her into a coach and conducted her to the watchhouse.—MAGISTRATE.—Why did not you take the other two girls into custody?—Officer.—Because, your Worship, we must have had a general fight with Sir Arthur somebody, and my Lord I don't know who, and several other gentlemen by whom they were protected, if we had attempted such a thing.—The prisoner was ordered to find bail.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A man, charged with murder, has been committed to Dumbarton-gaol, Scotland. The following are said to be the particulars of the case:—That on Friday the deceased, named Borrowman, having approached the spot in the muir of Dumbarton where some men were engaged in smuggling, they at first gave him whisky, which he drank in large quantities. They then stripped him naked, and having rubbed his body with whisky, they set him on fire, and tortured him in the manner of the American Indians. He survived only 24 hours. Two men, who are not apprehended, are said to be implicated. The deceased has left a wife and six children. It is reported that he became obnoxious to the smugglers, as they suspected him of being a spy.

A good deal of bustle was occasioned in the neighbourhood of Newington, on Wednesday morning, by the appearance of a female in the public road, in a state of nakedness. She assaulted several persons very violently, and broke the windows of various tradesmen. From the pavement in front of the house of Mr. Angers, Walworth, she took up a cast iron wheel of considerable weight, and such was her strength, carried it about on her shoulder, dancing at the same time in the most frantic manner. After a lapse of two or three hours, she was taken into custody by Snow, the constable, and proved to be a Mrs. Pine, of Cottage-place, Walworth, who has for a considerable time been in a state of mental derangement, and on Tuesday night eluded the vigilance of the persons under whose care she was placed.

Tuesday night, between eight and nine o'clock, a respectably dressed young woman attempted to throw herself over Blackfriars-bridge. A gentleman rushed forward, and catching her clothes, grasped them so firmly as to retain her on the outside of the balustrade, partly suspended and partly resting on the exterior cornice. In this situation she continued for some moments, feebly struggling, and faintly exclaiming, "Let me go," till a man courageously climbed over the balustrade to her, and assisted those within to lift her back. She was at first insensible and speechless, but afterwards so far recovered as to be conducted, by support, from the spot. Two women who saw her take the desperate plunge were so affected as to fall into hysterics. One of them, who had a child with her, was a person of a respectable matronly appearance; the other was a decent looking poor woman.

On Thursday morning, about 10 o'clock, at the Abercromby-aim tavern, in Lombard-street, a young man, whose name is Kentish, and whose parents reside at Peckham, put an end to his existence by shooting himself through the body with a pistol. He entered the coffee-room only a few minutes before committing the rash action, and partook of some soup. His purpose was so completely effected, that he survived the shot only a few minutes. The ball passed completely through his body, and lodged in the opposite waistcoat. His name and address were discovered by some letters found about his person: his unfortunate father was sent for, and arrived about two hours after the fatal event.—An inquest has sat on the body. It appeared clearly that the deceased had for some time been subject to fits and derangement; and a casual visit to St. Luke's was supposed to have made a dreadful and unconquerable impression on his mind.—The Jury returned a verdict of Insanity.

THE LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, JUNE 15, 1818.

The supply of English Wheat this morning was small, but the arrivals from abroad were most amply compensated for any deficiency of that of our own growth, and have produced a decline of 2s. per quarter in our prices, and at that reduction the sales were heavy.—Barley fully supports last Monday's prices, having but little at market, except of a few cargoes of Foreign of inferior quality.—Oats are 1s. per quarter dearer.—Pease and Beans were in brisk demand, at an advance of from 2s. to 4s. per quarter, in consequence of the heat of the weather, which is considered injurious to the growing crops.

No. 547. SUNDAY, JUNE 21, 1818

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. Page.

No. 532.

TO THE LIVERY OF LONDON.

GENTLEMEN,

I address all the liberal and intelligent among you:—I address, not those who make politics a mere party-business, or party-business a mere help to their private business,—not the mere money-getters, eaters, or cheaters, who take mere cunning and personal success for wisdom, and are callous or unhappy for their pains,—but those who think that the ancient and free city of London contains something else in it besides their own shop, and who feel that there are really such things in the world as their fellow-creatures.

You are often told, Gentlemen, that people may talk against party here and there, but that every thing, in fact, is matter of party, and above all, that elections are entirely and obviously matters of party. An honest party man, in his eagerness to be candid, and out of a still finer but too often superfluous wish to set his opponents at their ease, will sometimes unwittingly encourage the notion by confessing in general terms that certainly he is of such and such a party, and Jones or Thomson of such another, so that it becomes them all to behave liberally to each other's opinions. Yes, yes,—it is quickly replied—you are very right—Jones is of one side, you of another; the thing is a mere matter of opinion or words; and so (it is cunningly asked) had we not better take care of the main chance, and agree with the honest fellows that are in, than with the honest fellows that are out?

But, Gentlemen, this is a gross delusion. There is, no doubt, a great deal of mere party work on all sides; and party, as a thing to be fostered for its own sake, and as the greatest possible maintainer of our comforts, appears to me as ridiculous a thing, as if a family, in sitting down to dinner, should think fit to hold up the table by dint of squeezing it against each other's ribs, instead of letting it have its proper footing, and taking their leg of mutton amicably. But all party meanwhile is no more alike, than being a party at a robbery and a party at a philosophical discussion. It is very well, for instance, for writers on the side of power to tell us, that governments must be upheld, meritorious servants rewarded, and so forth; but power has such a natural tendency to augment itself, and to attract supporters, that in almost all instances it is a much more suspicious feeling which induces a man to accompany it, than that which keeps him aloof; and when in addition to this feeling, you see its partizans going with it through thick and thin, and gathering dirty fortunes by the way, the suspicion is verified, and two of the most odious qualities in the world stand before you,—gross self-interest, and gross hypocrisy.

Choose therefore from among your present candidates the men whom you think least liable to this suspicion. Of some of them the public know little or nothing; but we all know the political conduct of WOOD, and WAITMAN, and CURTIS, and ATKINS; we all know that WOOD was Lord Mayor two years together for his unequivocal and independent zeal in behalf of your city and liberties; we all know that WAITMAN, the most conspicuous man among you for knowledge of his country's history, has been for upwards of twenty years opposed to mere power, both in its doubtful days and in its triumphant; and we all know that CURTIS and ATKINS have been the flourishing humble servants of the said power, with only such little ingenious exceptions as render them still more valuable in their servitude, and enable them to muster up a pin's point of independence on a day of election.

WOOD, whose election seems to be reckoned certain, is more, I believe, of the professed Reformer than WAITMAN. The latter is rather a reforming Whig; but still he is one of the most candid and consistent of that party, and unquestionably more zealous and practical in his love of Reform, both local and general, than the majority of it; and though, in an election like that of Westminster, it is desirable, for obvious reasons, to see none but the most complete Reformers succeed, yet it is highly desirable also that liberal and intelligent men, who form the link between the Whigs and Reformers, should be returned to Parliament in other places, especially where they are directly opposed by Government Candidates. The choice is then between party men who are the livery servants of power, and party men who remember that there are other and better liveries;—and therefore, though I go farther than Mr. WAITMAN in matters of Reform, yet if I were a liveryman, I would give him my vote with all my heart,—not only because he has been so long tried in opposition to power, nor because he opposes or has an antipathy to any thing, but because he has a sympathy with his species as well as his immediate party, and would think of me and my fellow-creatures when he was called upon for his Aye or No.

But Mr. WAITMAN, Gentlemen, has a prodigious fault, it seems, in the eyes of the Corruptionists. He can speak; that is to say, he can utter something more than this aye and no, and give his reasons at length for so doing. Therefore the Courier calls him "a brawler," and says it can do without "men of his stamp;"—much better no doubt without them, than with them: much better, if none of us did not utter a single word or even sound, but walked about bare-footed, for fear of disturbing the ears of our well-booted masters. But the Courier, in another number of his paper, bethinks himself that Mr. WAITMAN is not a mere brawler, and insinuates that all his knowledge is confined to HUME's History of England. He is a very wonderful man then, for he knows other books by instinct. Alas, Gentlemen, it is not Mr. WAITMAN's knowledge which seems confined to HUME's History, but that of much more powerful statesmen, who have such a tender recollection of the STUARTS.

I am not at all acquainted with Mr. WALTHAM; yet I will answer for it that he possesses or has read as good and various a set of books as it becomes a leading English citizen to be acquainted with, and a much greater number than that prodigious leader of us all, the great seller and allied-snuff-taker, my Lord CASTLEREAGH, who confounds all metaphor as well as law, and who, in consulting even his map, knew nothing about the first spot his finger came to outside of England,—the Island of Walcheren. You know the melancholy history of that Island, of our troops there, and of Sir WILLIAM CURTIS's jolly splashing round about it on his turtle's fins:—yet these are the leaders and legislators the Courier would have! It would have, it says, “not the hacknied demagogue, but the practical statesman” (viz. Lord CASTLEREAGH)—“not the voluble declaimer, but the grave counsellor” (Mr. CANNING)—“not the pert prater, but the enlightened enquirer” (Mr. CROKER)—“not the tongue that gabbles, but the head that thinks” (Sir WILLIAM CURTIS)!

Gentlemen, with a mutual hearty laugh, and a hope that Mr. WALTHAM may be in Parliament to give lectures on these thinking heads,

I am your very sincere well-wisher,

THE EXAMINER.

GENERAL ELECTION.

CITY OF LONDON.

The election of four persons to serve in the ensuing Parliament as representatives of the City of London, commenced on Tuesday, and we believe a fuller attendance of liverymen has not been known on any former occasion.

Sir W. CURTIS was the first who came forward to address the Livery. He observed that he had already served in six Parliaments as a representative of this great city, and now, when he came to ask them to re-elect him, he could tell them that he had discharged his duty fully, fairly, and fearlessly. If he should be rechosen, he assured them that he would pursue the same course he had hitherto done. (Marks of disapprobation.) He should say one word on the doctrine of the right of constituents to instruct their representatives. Whenever the rights of the city of London came under the consideration of Parliament, he should constantly stand up for them, and would only on such occasions attend strictly to the wishes of the Livery. On questions, however, which related to the interests of the nation at large, he claimed the right of judging for himself. The House of Commons was a deliberative assembly; but it would entirely cease to be so, if the members made up their opinions before they went into it. (Hisses.)—Notwithstanding that some of them appeared to be dissatisfied with him at present, he expected to see many of their good-patured faces coming up to the poll, and voting for him. He felt confident that, as they had already chosen him to represent them six times, they would on this occasion return him for the seventh time, and they might rely on his discharging his duty faithfully. (A mixture of applause and disapprobation.)

Alderman HUNTER said, he intended to propose to them a gentleman, from his character, truly worthy of their suffrages; and, from his commercial experience and connexions, in every way qualified to represent for the city those great interests which formed the bulwark of the nation. He should move that Thomas WILSON, Esq., be one of the representatives of this city.

Mr. BLADES seconded the motion.

Mr. Alderman ATKINS then came forward, but was received with strong marks of disapprobation. He begged leave to assure the Livery that he entertained a deep sense of gratitude for the honour which they had on former occasions conferred upon him. The duties which belonged to their representative he had always endeavoured faithfully to discharge. Whatever shades of difference there might be between his views and those entertained by others, his vote had never been given but on conscientious grounds. Having always discharged his duty to the best of his ability, he relied with confidence on the approbation of his fellow citizens, which he trusted they would take this opportunity of showing, by again returning him their representative.

Mr. Alderman WOOD next presented himself, and was greeted with considerable applause, mixed however with some tokens of hostility. He commenced by observing that he felt highly gratified in once more soliciting the suffrages of the electors. He had endeavoured to discharge the trust with which they had honoured him with diligence and integrity. He had devoted himself almost exclusively to their service, and had never been absent from his post for a single day. He had experienced a most flattering reception on his canvass, and this encouragement left but little doubt of his success: even if he failed, this kindness would be an ample reward. With regard to his political principles, he was of no party: and if he had opposed the measures of Government, it was because he conscientiously disapproved of them. He threw himself on the opinion of the Livery; and could assure them, that if their opinion was favourable, he should never refuse to obey their instructions, unless he felt on any such occasion that he could not conscientiously do so; and that then he would resign his seat. He should always be anxious to do his duty, to maintain their privileges, and support the great interests of mankind. (Applause.)

Mr. Alderman BRUCE next came forward amidst very general approbation. He had been induced to offer himself to their notice as a candidate for the honour of becoming one of their representatives, from a recollection of their former confidence in raising him to the highest offices they could bestow. It was not for him under that roof to inform them who he was, or on what grounds he rested his pretensions. They must have been long since satisfied of his ardent loyalty to the best of Kings, his firm attachment to those principles upon which our ancestors had raised the glorious Constitution under which we lived, and his zeal in the maintenance of their own rights and interests. It was of importance that they should well consider what a trust they were now about to repose; that their interests were various; that there was a Protestant interest to be upheld, as well as a commercial and a manufacturing interest. They would form their own estimate of his fitness for their service, and he should feel certain that their choice would be dictated by candour and impartiality.

Mr. Alderman THORP came forward, and was received with applause. He had always venerated the constitution of our country as established by our ancestors, and he had reprobated the encroachments that had been made upon it. A full and free representation of the people in Parliament he considered to be essential to the excellence of the Constitution. He should therefore never cease in his exertions till such a Reform could be obtained as would restore representation to its ancient and constitutional purity. (Applause.) This must appear indispensable to all who regarded the future prosperity of the country. Economy and retrenchment alone could enable the Government of this country to retrieve its resources, to alleviate the distressed situation of the people, and to perform those sacred engagements into which they had entered with the public. (Great applause.) For himself he begged leave to say, that he had been born among them; that he had been bred in mercantile habits; that he had always felt a deep interest in the public interests of his fellow-citizens and of the nation; and should he have the honour of being elected to be one of their representatives in Parliament, he should have no other object in view but to promote their prosperity, and to assert the rights of the people. (Shouts of applause.)

Mr. Alderman GOODBENNER said, he had heard a great deal said of the glorious Constitution of our country. It was for them to judge who had and who had not acted according to the spirit of the Constitution. He was proud to propose for their choice a friend congenial to their hearts, (great and long continued applause), a man of known diligence, principle, energy, and talent, whose exertions on behalf of the Livery they were all aware of. (Applause.) He proposed Mr. Waltham. (Renewed shouts.) He had been before them for 20 years, and they were quite competent to judge of his merits or demerits. The result of their judgment would be, his triumphant election to represent their interests, and to vindicate their rights. They would have as much pride in bestowing this honour upon him, as he now had in proposing him for their choice. (Applause.) All the candidates were before them, and they had the means of forming their judgment of their merits. If they had the same opinion as he had of them, their decision would be ready and complete. (Great applause.)

Mr. FAVELL seconded the proposition.

Mr. WAITHMAN now came forward, but could not speak for some minutes, on account of the repeated shouts that resounded through the Hall. He felt it impossible to describe the sensations which that reception had recalled to his mind. He hoped they would make allowances for him; for whatever might be his deficiencies, they knew him not destitute of courage in maintaining their rights and liberties, or in contending against corruption. (Applause.) Every liveryman had a right to consider well the character of a candidate, and it was his duty to exercise that right. (Applause.) They could be at no loss to know his merits or demerits. When they looked back on the conduct of those whom they had formerly elected, they could determine whether they would now elect those who should represent their feelings. As to the doctrine of instructions, he would not push it too far; he would not be for fettering representatives. (Great applause.) They must necessarily be trusted; they must be left to exercise their own judgment on questions as they presented themselves to them. But if they were deficient in judgment, or what was worse, if they were deficient in integrity, (partial hisses,) the Livery had now an opportunity of withholding from them a trust of which they were not worthy. When they had met and deliberated, and given to their representatives their solemn instructions as to a particular subject, where was the man who had spurned their instructions, and yet now called for their suffrage? (Much applause.) He had heard some of those gentlemen speak of their love of the Constitution, and protest that they had uniformly defended the Constitution; yet during the time they had been in Parliament, the Habeas Corpus Act, the great bulwark of the British Constitution,—[Here he was interrupted by considerable hissing, which called forth the loudest applause from his friends],—that great bulwark had been suspended not less than seven or eight times. Those gentlemen had always supported our glorious Constitution, and yet they had always supported the Minister in suspending the Constitution. (Shouts of applause.) They had often heard it boasted of, that the right of petitioning was free and unimpaired. The House of Commons had, however, been crowded with Petitions, complaining of grievous injuries, and praying for redress; yet a motion for inquiry into the truth of those Petitions had been refused. Would they again return those men to Parliament?—(Very great applause.)

Mr. WILSON next addressed the Livery. In consequence of the solicitations of a great number of respectable individuals, he had come forward to offer himself as a candidate for the representation of this great city. He hoped he should not be accused of intruding, on the ground that he did not belong to the Corporation. He was convinced that to be a member of that body was not an essential qualification, and that if he should be found in other respects worthy of their choice, they would not reject him on account of that deficiency. If they honoured him with their suffrages, they would soon, from the manner in which he should discharge his parliamentary duties, and from his strict adherence to those principles on which the great interest of the country depends, be enabled fully to appreciate his character. With respect to his principles, he should only say that he would zealously support the constitution of King, Lords, and Commons, as established at the glorious revolution of 1688. Whatever public trust might be reposed in him, he would exert himself to the best of his ability in performing the duties which belonged to it.—(Much noise.)

Mr. ROWENORR begged the attention of the Livery for only a few minutes; it would not become him, from the slight connexion he had with the proceedings of the day, to detain them long. After Sir James Shaw had intimated his intention to retire, there appeared a want for another candidate. It was natural that the means of supplying the deficiency should be considered; and the partiality of a few friends induced them to wish that that duty should be assigned to him. Some steps were in consequence taken towards that end, but in a few days all intention of proceeding farther was laid aside. It was never his intention to offer himself, if others better qualified came forward; and since then a gentleman extensively connected with the commercial interest had become a candidate, and indeed there was now an abundance of respectable candidates of every party. Under these circumstances he had withdrawn; and if an opening should at a future period occur, it would then be for him to consider whether he should offer himself again as a candidate.

The show of hands for the different candidates was now called for, when a person in the midst of the crowd in the Hall got up on one of the posts, and proceeded to harangue the Livery. After some opposition he gained a hearing. On being called on to declare who he was, he said his name was DOWNING, and that he was an advocate for Parliamentary Reform, and all the rights and privileges of the corporation of the city. He wished his fellow Liverymen to choose good representatives, for there never was a time when they were so burdened with taxes.

The shows of hands now commenced. On the name of Alderman Shaw being put up, there was great applause. The show of hands for Sir William Curtis and Alderman Atkins was less than for any of the others, and that for the latter was very inconsiderable. At last the City Remembrancer declared, that the choice of the Livery had fallen on Mr. Waithman, Alderman Wood, Alderman Thorp, and Mr. Wilson. This was the order in which, judging from the show of hands, the candidates appeared to be favoured by the Livery.—A poll was then demanded for Sir William Curtis and Alderman Atkins. At the termination, when the numbers were posted up, Messrs. Wood, Waithman, Thorp, and Wilson, each addressed the Livery, and were well received.

Sir W. CURTIS came forward, amid a tumult of applause and hissing, which entirely prevented him from being heard. After standing for some time on the front of the hustings in dumb show, and attempting in vain to appease the uproar by a gracious demeanour, he retired with apparent resignation.

Mr. Alderman ATKINS was equally unsuccessful in obtaining a hearing, and was received with more unmixed disapprobation.

The Hall then adjourned. The candidates then left the Hall. Sir W. Curtis met with a mixed reception. Mr. Wilson passed almost without observation. Mr. Waithman was loudly and universally greeted; and Alderman Wood had the honour to be dragged along by his fellow-citizens, instead of his own grays.—Mr. Alderman Atkins, who was on foot, met with no very flattering reception.

At the close of the poll on Wednesday, when the numbers were announced,

Mr. Alderman WOOD offered himself to their attention, amidst loud and continued acclamations. What he had stated yesterday, of the anticipations with which the kind assurances of his friends had filled him on his canvass, was now completely realized, and proved what reason he had to say that he even then felt highly gratified with the prospect before him.

Mr. WILSON next came forward, and was received with pretty general applause. Whilst he gratefully acknowledged their support, he was far from arrogating any merit to himself; he owed it all to the courtesy of his friends. He belonged to no party; he stood betwixt them; and he stood on independent grounds. A paper had been circulated that morning inviting the Livery to vote for Sir W. Curtis, Alderman Atkins, and himself. He could assure them that this paper did not proceed from himself or his friends, and that he certainly did not intend to join in any such coalition. (Applause.) He came there not ambitious to be at the head of the poll; but to be one of their representatives.

Mr. WAITHMAN was also greeted with loud applause. So far as the election had already proceeded, it at least proved the strength of public opinion: for, however men might be influenced, perhaps not improperly, by private friendship, or by applications which it might be difficult to resist, the state of the poll this day showed, either that a great change had taken place in public opinion, or that the Livery of London were at length sensible of the conduct of those who had before represented them. (Applause.) He neither desired to be at the top of the poll, nor cared for a seat in the House of Commons, except as connected with public principles. It was not personal vanity or personal ambition that actuated him, nor did he aim at a mere triumph over individuals. But his name had been so long connected with certain political opinions, that the influence put in exercise against him would necessarily be in proportion. Their exertions, however, if persevered in, must be irresistible.

Mr. Alderman THORP presented himself next, and was loudly cheered. He must ever feel highly grateful for the reception they had given him. As there was no certainty till the end of the poll, he trusted that his friends would continue to use their best exertions. (Applause.) Their own independent principles alone had given him support; on those principles he entirely depended; in the principles of independence he had hitherto lived; and in those principles he should die. (Great applause.)

Alderman Sir W. CURTIS, as soon as he showed himself on the hustings, was assailed with hisses, groans, hootings, and whistles, beyond all precedent even in Guildhall. He stood calmly, though thus attacked, for a few minutes; and at last withdrew, exclaiming, with all his power of lungs, "I wish you a good evening."

Mr. Alderman ATKINS's appearance redoubled, if that were possible, the uproar of disapprobation. He was heard by those who were quite near him to say, that notwithstanding the low place he now had of the poll, he felt no fear of the result. He still relied on the support of his friends, and he should persevere.

The poll began again on Thursday, and soon proceeded with great activity. An interruption, however, occurred, in consequence of a hand-bill having been circulated, reflecting upon the private character of Mr. WATTMAN. He said a most intemperate hand-bill had been published, containing an atrocious libel upon himself, and, if he was rightly informed, was written by a Mr. Sharp; and if that person was in the hall, he called upon him to appear upon the hustings, and to avow or deny his being its author. Mr. WATTMAN then read the hand-bill, which charged him with leaving his widowed mother to linger out her days in a parish workhouse, or drag on her existence, supported by a scanty parochial allowance, or the charity of strangers.—Mr. W. appealed to the electors whether an attack of so atrocious a nature did not deserve the severest condemnation? No far from there being any truth in the base insinuations of the writer, he declared them to be absolutely false; “and although upon some occasions a lie was told with a mixture of truth, this was a lie altogether;” and he again called upon the infamous scoundrel to declare himself, and also, under whose auspices he had dared thus to traduce him. It was true he (Mr. W.) had been born in an obscure rank of life, and had made his way in the world by his personal exertions. He left his home when only 10 years of age, his father having died when he was six months old. His mother married a second husband, by whom she had a second family; this husband died; since which time, until her death, a period of 25 years, he (Mr. W.) had supported her. He had also brought up two children of the 2d marriage; and he defied any person to prove that any part of his family had been supported either by the parish or by the public money.

This speech was received with acclamations.—After the poll concluded, Messrs. Wood, Wilson, Watthman, and Thorpe, were heard with much complacency; but Sir W. Curtis and Mr. Atkins were groaned and hissed at with such violence that they retired unheard.

On Friday, when the poll had closed, the three candidates at the head were heard as usual with great attention, and so was Mr. Thorpe; but all that was audible of the address of Sir W. Curtis was, “Look there—look there!” (pointing to the numbers on the poll) “the poll speaks sufficiently for me.”—And as for Mr. Atkins, he was absolutely groaned off the hustings again.—During the proceedings, a pleasant occurrence took place. One of the Society of Friends appeared before the hustings to give his vote, and spoke as follows:—

“Friend Alderman Wood, I have come to vote for thee, because thou hast been a good Magistrate, a friend to the poor, and has kept thy word with the people in Parliament. Thou art not like the large candidate who stands beside thee, for he hath deceived the people, and even hath no mercy upon females. He hath in his Magisterial capacity called a woman an Amazon.”

Sir W. Curtis.—“Friends, dost thou mean me?”

Friend.—“Yea, verily, that I do.”

Sir W. Curtis.—“Then, Friends, I tell thee thou liest, and art a wicked one; and the information thou has derived is false—it is from a newspaper.”

Friend.—“Friend William, I do not like thee.”

Here the Worthy Baronet was treated with little ceremony by the Livery.

Friend.—“Friend Watthman, I give thee my vote, trusting that thou wilt perform one half of what thou hast so long promised.—Friend Thorpe, I do the same for thee, though thee hast promised less; but I have known the most virtuous and patriotic of thy name.—Friend Wilson, I know thee not, but thou hast been recommended, and I trust thou wilt merit the future support of thy fellow-citizens.”—The public-spirited Elector then retired amidst the most uproarious applause.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

Thursday being the day fixed for this election, an immense crowd collected in Covent-garden at an early hour. Sir Murray Maxwell's friends hoisted a union flag, and three ships' ensigns, white, blue, and red, on the scaffolds at the extremity, next King-street. A few minutes after nine o'clock, Mr. Hunt, accompanied by his two sons and several friends, arrived in a barouch, amidst the huzzas of the populace, at the hustings. From the centre of the barouch his red flag was displayed. It bore the inscription, “Universal Suffrage,” and was surmounted by the cap of liberty, round which was written “Henry Hunt and Liberty.”

Mr. Hunt's barouch was preceded by a number of persons wearing red cockades. Mr. Peter Walker, Mr. Cleary, and the friends of Major Cartwright, soon after made their appearance. The friends of Sir Francis Burdett stationed themselves almost in the centre of the hustings, and, by displaying placards with the Hon. Baronet's name inscribed on them, excited loud cheering amongst the crowd.

Mr. Hunt stepped forward, and called on the friends of Burdett to “show their man.” “If he (Sir Francis) be here, let him stand forward.” (Great applause.) He trusted they would hear patiently every gentleman who demanded their attention; at the same time he could not help thinking that candidates ought not to appear by proxy.

Shortly after this, Sir Murray Maxwell arrived, dressed in a full naval uniform, and was received with a mixture of hisses and applause.

A few minutes after ten the act against bribery was read.

Mr. STURCH then came forward. He begged to congratulate them on the time having arrived, when, in consequence of the gracious condescension of Ministers, they were about to enjoy the advantage of exercising their elective franchise. In ancient times the people exercised that right on every occasion that Parliament assembled. Every Session was in fact a new Parliament, and those who were elected knew that they would very soon have to return to their constituents, and have judgment passed on their conduct. Such was the state of the people's right of election in the early periods of our parliamentary history; and the first effectual infringement of this invaluable privilege, under the form of law, took place in the reign of William and Mary, when an Act was passed to provide that Parliaments might sit for three years. But the greatest infringement of this right was that made in the reign of George I., when a Parliament, which had been chosen for three years, thought fit, when the termination of that period was very near, to extend it, and men who were in possession of seats which they were about to vacate voted that they should retain them four years longer. But the greater the encroachments which had been made on the people's rights, and the greater the number that had been wrested from them, the more tenacious ought they to be in the defence of those that remained, and the more determined to make a good use of the exercise of them. (Cheers.) They had now the opportunity of electing their representatives, and it was their duty to send into Parliament men who possessed knowledge and talents, and were distinguished for true constitutional principles. They would take care, he hoped, not to send into Parliament men who had no object in going there but to provide for themselves and their families; but such as would be the guardians of liberty and the terror of wicked Ministers. With regard to their late representatives, it was not necessary, for one of them, to make any observations in the prospect of a return. That representative was going to assist an oppressed and high spirited people to regain their independence. (Loud applause.) Sir Francis Burdett was, however, still among them, and now they had the right of again returning him to Parliament if they thought fit. The question as to the propriety of so doing lay in a very narrow compass. If they found that he had been pursuing his own private interests in preference to that of the public—if he had neglected to present the people's Petitions, and always opposed them—if, instead of endeavouring to check abuses and procure Reform, they found that he had been whispering in the ear of Ministers with the view of seeking a place.—(Cries of No, No.)—if he had been the representative of his own interests, and not of his constituents.—(Cries of No, No.)—then it would be right for them to reject him. If, on the contrary, none of these suppositions were true—if, during the eleven years that he had served them in Parliament, they found him constantly guided by the same principles which first recommended him—if he still remained the firm friend of public liberty, and the undaunted advocate of the people's rights, then, if they had any regard for the principles of justice, they would come forward with one heart and one voice to re-elect him. (Applause.) With regard to any other candidate it became him to say little. He doubtless had his own partialities with respect to the other candidates; and he had made up his mind as to his choice. Who was so fit as Sir Samuel Romilly to be the colleague of Sir Francis Burdett? He had known the former gentleman long, and admired his upright and able conduct in Parliament, and he should certainly vote for him. At present, however, all that remained for him to do, was to propose the nomination of Sir Francis Burdett to be again one of their representatives.—(Applause.)—Towards the close of his speech, Mr. Sturch was greatly annoyed by a body of sailors, who endeavoured to press to that part of the hustings where Sir

M. Maxwell was, and who accosted the gallant officer in no very courteous terms.)

Mr. RICHARDSON, jun. seconded this nomination. He advised the electors to beware of the Whig advocate. They wanted no lawyers, who would care nothing for their constituents unless they came to them with a brief in the one hand and a fee in the other. As little did they want a Court candidate—such a one as now stood before them decorated in all the contemptible paraphernalia of Court despotism. For his part, he should vote for Sir Francis Burdett only.

Mr. PETER WALKER proposed Major Cartwright. He recommended the venerable Major as the tried friend of universal suffrage and annual parliaments. Two factions had been long contending to subvert the liberties of the people of Westminster, and now it appeared they had united to effect that object. It was said that Major Cartwright was too old; but the next Parliament was likely to be a very short one; and that venerable man would live long enough to perform his duty, ay, and perform it well, while it existed. He would attend there, as he had done every where else, to the best interests of the people. What was it that gave a public voice to Westminster? Major Cartwright was the man. (Applause.) Were they friends to universal suffrage and annual parliaments? (Shouts of "Yes, yes, from the crowd.") Then when should they return to Parliament, but the man who had supported those two great principles during a long life? (Applause.)

Mr. PATERSON seconded the nomination.

Lord HENRY HOWARD next addressed the electors, but owing to the low tone of voice in which he spoke, very little could be heard. He recommended Sir Samuel Romilly to the electors as a statesman who was an honour to his country and human nature. He had been tried, and never found wanting; and no man was better capable of performing the duties of a representative of the people, or more determined to discharge them diligently and faithfully.

Mr. WISHART seconded the nomination of Sir Samuel. He observed, that the Learned Gentleman was the first and best of men, the constant advocate of the interests of humanity; and in electing him they would confer an honour on themselves, and show that they properly estimated the virtues of the man of their choice.

Mr. GLOSSOP proposed the Hon. D. Kinnaird, a gentleman whose constitutional principles were well known, as a proper person to be nominated on this occasion.

Mr. RICHARDSON, senior, seconded the nomination. The electors of Westminster had much to oppose here—much influence was exerted against them. If they chose Douglas Kinnaird, Lord Cochrane might be said to have left them a valuable legacy, for he was a man of known talent and principle.

Mr. WILLOCK appeared to nominate Captain Sir Murray Maxwell. It was said that this candidate was not known. He was known, and well known, by his services. He had never turned from an enemy; and after having nobly sustained the cause of the country abroad, he now wished to maintain their rights at home.

Mr. CHEERE seconded the nomination.

Sir MURRAY MAXWELL, who appeared dressed in a full uniform, and had been previously assailed by various missiles, immediately commenced his address, which, after a long interruption, became audible. "I see a gentleman (Mr. Hunt) in front of me who appears desirous that I should be heard, and I hope you will yield to his authority, and favour me with a few minutes' indulgence. I am sure, notwithstanding all I hear, that I am popular amongst you, for I see hundreds of pretty girls pressing forward to hear what I have to say. (Laughter and noise.) One of the proudest privileges of an Englishman is to solicit the favour of his countrymen. I feel that I am now standing on the boards from which a Rodney, a Hood, a Gardner, and last, though not least in your estimation, a Cochrane, have formerly met with your kind attention. You have long been accustomed to select one of your representatives from the profession to which I have the honour to belong. (Various interruptions.) I appear in person before you, an humble candidate for your suffrages. I throw myself into the midst of you. (Here Capt. Maxwell was saluted with a considerable quantity of dirt, which bespattered all those around him.) I have often received shot from my enemies; this is the first time I have ever received them from my friends. (Applause.) Two representatives are to be returned: if you select me as a mark of your regard for the naval service, let me be allowed to recommend one from the sister profession of arms; and as the only one amongst the other candidates who answers to this description is Major Cartwright, I recommend him to your notice." (Applause.)

Mr. HARLEY next stepped forward in support of Mr. Hunt. Great confusion prevailed throughout the course of this gentleman's speech. He observed, "Gentlemen, we go upon the principles of justice, truth, and humanity; and as to the accusation of promoting disorder which has been made against us, who have been more strenuous in its reprobation? (Bravo! go on—very true.) Romilly is a lawyer, and they want to force him upon you; a man who was never in Parliament except for a rotten borough. Mr. Hunt, Gentlemen, has sworn to obtain for you all you desire, your liberties and rights, through the medium of Universal Suffrage, Annual Parliaments, and Election by Ballot. You have a Court Candidate also proposed; and if you elect him, what then becomes of you? You will be slaves, and any thing but Englishmen. Rescue yourselves in time from oppression—select an honest and independent man, who asks nothing from a wicked Government, who swears he will take nothing—elect him, Gentlemen, as I am sure you will, and you may hope to live as freemen." (Applause.)

Mr. GAIN FOXES seconded the nomination of Mr. Hunt. He said, among other things, that Sir Samuel Romilly might be an excellent man, but private character was no recommendation there; his friends had done wrong to advise him to offer himself for Westminster, when he could have been elected elsewhere without injury to the cause of freedom.

Mr. HUNT—I wish not to obtain your votes by coming in under any man's wing; the gallant officer and myself are the only real candidates; the rest are ashamed to show their faces, because they know that they would meet with your disapprobation. The gallant officer has manfully appeared in person, and had a right to expect your attention, although his politics are known, and although he be a friend to the despotism which enslaves you. With regard to Sir S. Romilly, I mean to say nothing against him; but he is sore of his seat in the den of corruption: let him therefore go back to his friend the Duke of Norfolk, and the rotten borough of Arundel. (Laughter and applause.) I would say a few words respecting Sir Francis Burdett; but no, Gentlemen, no, I see you understand him as well as I do. (A cry of "give it to him well, Hunt.") He may be entitled "the Hero of the back door of the Tower," and has fallen below our notice. The Editor of the Courier said a little while ago, that I deserved to be sent to the Tower. The Tower, gentlemen, has no terrors for me; but if ever I should go there, I promise you I will never sneak out at the back door. (Shouts of applause.) Eleven years ago Sir F. Burdett pledged himself to his constituents to exert all his endeavours to tear out the accursed leaves of the infamous red-book. Has he ever succeeded in tearing out a single leaf, or even in erasing a single name or provision? (Cries of no, no.) Now with your assistance, and although not in Parliament, I have by petition caused the Marquis of Camden to resign his enormous and disgraceful salary. (Applause.) If you return me I will attempt much more, and, if well supported, doubt not of success. My principles are well known: I have raised the cap of liberty—that cap which crowns the statue of the greatest statesman ever known in this country, the statue of Lord Chatham in the Guildhall of London. I thank you for the kindness you have already shown, and doubt not of its continuance.

The HIGH BAILIFF then called upon the electors to declare, by a show of hands, which of the gentlemen nominated they chose to be their representatives. The names being then called over, and a show of hands taken on each, the High Bailiff declared that the election had fallen upon Sir Samuel Romilly and Henry Hunt, Esq.

A poll was then demanded for the other candidates; and at one o'clock the poll began. The crowd immediately in front of the hustings soon showed great anxiety to know the result. In the mean time they amused themselves by throwing sticks and mud at Sir M. Maxwell, who kept respectfully bowing in return. Some hard substance happened to be thrown from the outskirts of the crowd, which unfortunately hit the gallant and ministerial candidate above the right eye, and occasioned much pain, and a momentary retreat. Very general and strong reprobation was expressed at this outrage. Captain Maxwell soon stepped forward on the advanced railing, bowed three times, and then came back to his former station. The state of the poll was now exhibited:—Sir Sam. Romilly, 169—Sir Murray Maxwell, 176—Sir F. Burdett, Bart. 87—Hon. Douglas Kinnaird, 25—Mr. Hunt, 14—Major Cartwright, 10.

Sir M. Maxwell said, that although he had got his eye hurt, he should still address them as his friends. However ill-used he might be by some individuals, he should not shrink from his post. He had to thank his friends for the place they had given him on the poll; he hoped they would not relax their efforts, and he felt confident of ultimate success. (Applause and hisses.)

Mr. PITT observed, that the superior success of Captain Maxwell had been owing to the extraordinary exertions of the Court party. A servant of Lord Ellenborough had been the first to vote for him. Burdett had always been the firm and eloquent friend of the people; and the people, if they valued their own interests, were now bound to befriend him. If they lost this opportunity, they could never expect to be again in the same situation, or to be represented by a man who could be compared to Sir Francis Burdett for political integrity and consistency, for elegant manners in private life, and for eloquence and judgment in parliamentary debate.

Mr. WISHART said, he addressed them in the name of Sir Samuel Romilly, and thanked them for the conspicuous mark of respect and confidence which they had bestowed upon him in placing him at the head of the poll. Sir Samuel Romilly was a native of Westminster. His superior abilities he had always employed in pleading the cause of the people, and in putting to silence the venal adherents of a corrupt administration. (Applause.) He was the zealous friend of a true and useful Reform. (Applause.)

Mr. WALKER observed, that they had to contend against a coalition of parties, who in their turns fattened on the public spoils. There were 18,000 electors in Westminster; out of that number Major Cartwright could yet have a majority.

Mr. FISH was anxious to state that Sir Samuel had no borough, and that if they did not return him, they might bid adieu to his proud services in the House of Commons.

Mr. HUNT said he was not discouraged by the state of the poll. Let them see what it would be on Monday next. He thanked them for what they had done, and took leave of them with gratitude.

Mr. GALE JONES reminded them, that in that very place Mr. Horne Tooke had broken the coalition between the two political parties. Sir Francis Burdett, Mr. Tooke's pupil, had reaped the fruits of that victory. But it was now to be lost unless the people exerted themselves. Sir Francis Burdett should have united with Mr. Hunt or Major Cartwright, and then the popular candidates would have been triumphant.

On Friday morning, at ten, Captain Sir M. Maxwell arrived, and was welcomed with loud applause. He had a shade over his right eye. On taking his place at the hustings, the chairman of Major Cartwright's committee in their name expressed their sentiments of condolence for the injury he had sustained. The Captain acknowledged their kind attention, and observed, he was the individual who was the cause of the affair had acted thoughtlessly, and without intention to do him so serious an injury.

When Lord YARMOUTH appeared at the booth for the purpose of giving his vote, he was objected to by Mr. Hunt on the ground of his not having paid up his taxes. The Noble Lord seemed a little indignant at this imputation, as well as considerably annoyed by the delay which the examination of the parish books occasioned. After it had taken place, however, and it was found the Noble Lord had discharged all the taxes due upon three several houses, he politely asked Mr. Hunt if he might then vote; Mr. H. smilingly bowed assent. Perhaps it is unnecessary to state that Sir Murray Maxwell received a plumper from his Lordship.

Soon after four o'clock the state of the poll was exhibited:—Sir Samuel Romilly, 825—Sir Murray Maxwell, 754—Sir F. Burdett, Bart. 348—Hon. Douglas Kinnaird, 55—Mr. Hunt, 30—Major Cartwright, 18.

Sir MURRAY MAXWELL was about to address the people assembled in front of the hustings, when a violent pugilistic fray interrupted him, and agitated the crowd for several minutes. It appeared to have been occasioned by the indignation of some sailors, at hearing the gallant Captain hissed and abused. When order was restored, the Captain proceeded. He had received several shots yesterday; many imagined that they had come from enemies: he contended that they had proceeded from the exuberance of public feeling, which every Englishman had a pride in showing. He considered the person who had nearly robbed him of his sight as a friend in disguise. He had obliged him to wear on his face an electioneering placard, which would procure him thousands of votes. They had stated that the person who had struck at his eye had been taken. He begged of them for God's sake to liberate him, and he was sure, from what he had heard of Sir Samuel Romilly's private life, that he would have advised him to that conduct.—There was a constant uproar of approbation and disapprobation during this speech.

Mr. RICHARDSON addressed them for Sir Francis Burdett. The state of the poll was owing entirely to the forces of courtiers and placemen which had been brought to the field. (Applause.) He had nothing to say of Capt. Maxwell personally; but he well knew that every effort had been made to place him at the head of the poll. The voters from all the offices, where excise-officers and others had influence, had come forward in crowds. (Applause.) He was glad that those persons had come forward so numerous, for their numbers were now almost exhausted.—They had voted because they were ordered to do so; and for a candidate who appeared before them, because he had been commanded to do so. (Applause.) It was with great gratification he had to tell them, that on a former occasion the court candidate had in the first two days polled 50 more than at present, and yet failed at last. (Applause.) Let the people therefore not despair; the shot, at least the powder of the enemy, was exhausted. Let the gallant Captain double his votes, the discernment, sense, and spirit of the electors of Westminster would at last prevail.

Mr. WISHART said, that it was most flattering to a man of honest ambition to be supported as Sir Samuel Romilly was supported by them. The more his political character was inquired into, the more he rose in the estimation of good men. No blot could be found in his character during the time he had been in the House of Commons. He thanked them for their exertions, and hoped that there could be no doubt of their arduous keeping at the head of the poll a Citizen of their own, who was not connected with Ministry, or with party, when it interfered with justice and humanity.—(Applause.)

Mr. WALKER said, that Lord Cochrane, when he had decided to go abroad, had resigned his seat.—Would the Naval Officer who was now a Candidate do so? Of Sir Samuel Romilly he should say nothing. Sir Murray Maxwell could better give a round dozen at the mast than represent them. He was unfit for them, because he might be required to go abroad, and because he had flogging habits. An iron chain of 30lb. weight had ruptured Mr. Ogden.—(Bravo.)—He objected to Captain Maxwell as a tool, a mere tool.

Mr. HUNT, while addressing the multitude, was asked in a loud and distinct tone, "Why did you turn your wife out of doors, and take another woman into your house?" Mr. Hunt called upon his accuser to come forth; and then, pointing to a particular gentleman, he said, "I see him, and I have a charge against him; he knows what I am going to say, he knows quite well what I have to say of him." Mr. Hunt then made an abominable recrimination. The volleys of execrations were instantly so loud and vehement, that Mr. Hunt was obliged to give way, and put an abrupt termination to his speech.

Mr. GALE JONES was with some difficulty, and after a considerable interval, suffered to be heard. He was grieved to see Sir Francis Burdett so low on the poll; but if he had united himself with Mr. Hunt, they would have been at the head. A deputation had been sent to his Committee to this effect, but without success.

Mr. BROOKBANK explained, that Mr. Kinnaird was never to have been brought in as connected with Sir Francis Burdett, but for his own personal merits; he was the firm, eloquent, and patriotic friend of reform. Although he had been mentioned as Sir Francis Burdett's friend, that was only to show the coincidence of their sentiments on parliamentary reform.

Mr. PITT explained, that Sir Francis Burdett had never, directly or indirectly, recommended or approved of Mr. Kinnaird's nomination. If the committee had agreed to Mr. Hunt's proposal, they had disgraced themselves for ever.

Mr. HUNT now again attempted to be heard, but in vain.

SOUTHWARK ELECTION.

On Thursday, Mr. PRINCEP, the High Bailiff, appeared on the hustings in front of the Town-hall. He addressed the electors, and recommended order and regularity in their proceedings.

Mr. SOL. DAVIS said, it was scarcely necessary for him to enter into a detail of the conduct pursued by Mr. Calvert, since he had become a representative of Southwark. His opposition to the Corn Bill would be recollected by many with pleasure. The next thing to which he should allude was the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. There Mr. Calvert would be again found an opponent of Ministers; and in like manner on the question of the Indemnity Bill, he would be discovered in his place in the franks of opposition. (Applause.) These were the remarks which he had taken the liberty of making before he recommended to them Mr. Charles Calvert as an object of their choice, which he then did with the most complete conviction of his merits.— (Loud applause.)

Mr. CLARKE seconded the nomination.

Mr. F. YOUNG proposed Mr. Barclay, but the noise was so great that it was impossible for some time to hear him. He said that Mr. Barclay's property placed him above temptations; and if they wished to be fairly represented, they could not elect a more fit person as one of their Members for the ensuing Parliament.

Mr. T. A. SAUTER seconded Mr. Barclay's nomination.

Mr. R. HALL proposed Sir R. Wilson. Of the merits of Sir R. it was unnecessary for him to say much. He was well known to them all. He had served his country bravely. He had no doubt, if they should elect Sir Robert, that he would be found an equally brave, active, and persevering opponent of their domestic enemies in the senate, as he had been of their foreign enemies in the field. (Great applause.)

Mr. WEATHERSTONE seconded the nomination. He trusted that the electors would perform their duty by selecting Sir R. Wilson as one of their representatives, a gentleman who was a warm friend of the Constitution—not that Constitution that was an object of the admiration of many who stood behind him, but that constitution for which the Russells, the Sidneys, and the Hampdens had fought and shed their blood. (Applause.) It had been said that a coalition had been formed between Sir R. Wilson and Mr. Calvert. It was due to himself and to those gentlemen, however, that that should be denied. No such connexion had been formed. Sir Robert Wilson stood alone.

Mr. CALVERT said, he had always voted for the people. He had opposed the Corn Bill, because he considered it most mischievous for Parliament to interfere in fixing a price upon grain. He had opposed the Suspension Act, on the same grounds he had opposed the Bill of Indemnity. His conduct was in their hands, and they would judge of it. (Great applause.)

Mr. BARCLAY next came forward; but the noise was so great, that it was with difficulty any thing he said could be heard. He defended his Parliamentary conduct throughout. He had always, he said, acted according to the dictates of his conscience; and if they should elect him, he should always continue conscientiously to discharge the duties imposed on him.

Sir R. Wilson then came forward amid great applause. He was bound, first, to express his satisfaction at seeing those whom he now addressed once more, restored to the exercise of their elective franchise; and, secondly, to congratulate them on being thus restored by the dissolution of the most unconstitutional Parliament that ever afflicted this country—a Parliament that had sanctioned doctrines, and consented to proceedings not only hostile to the liberties of this country, but to the liberties and rights of mankind—a Parliament that had rendered this great empire a land of servitude, oppressed itself, and leagued with despots to oppress other states; when, by the bravery of our fleets and armies, and its great internal resources of spirit, enterprise, and industry, it might have rendered it the most happy and glorious nation of the world—secure in the enjoyment of its own wealth and greatness, and the general supporter of liberal principles over Europe. (Applause.) It was an old saying, that we ought only to speak well of the dead; but if after the acts of which the late Parliament had been guilty, he did not express his decided opinion of its proceedings when referring to its monumental history, he would reckon himself unworthy of living in a free country. He was actuated by no motive of personal ambition—his standing where he now did was not even of his own suggestion. A deputation of the borough, who justly felt indignant at the state of thralldom into which their representation had fallen, looked about for a representative to whom they thought they could more properly entrust their interests. They called upon him, and offered him their zealous support. In consequence, he could not hesitate in yielding to the wishes of his friends. Since that time, their canvass had been followed by the most flattering result; and he now stood before the electors with humility as to his own pretensions, but with the proudest confidence of success. In coming forward, he professed no personal hostility to the gentleman whose election he opposed. He knew the respectability of his private character, and believed that it was above suspicion. (Applause.) But Mr. Barclay, though he may have voted conscientiously, had disqualified himself from being a representative of the people by concurring in measures contrary to their opinions, and hostile to their interests. He (Sir R. W.) would not attempt to enumerate all the unworthy acts to which their late representative had given his sanction. The task would be too arduous; the day would be concluded before he half finished the list. (Applause.) He would only say, that if there were any who wished to see British victories converted into the means of partitioning and oppressing foreign states and consolidating domestic tyranny; if there were any who wished to see British troops made Janissaries for the support of foreign despots against the wishes of their subjects, and in defiance of their right to settle their own Government; if there were any who wished to see British gold squandered to light the fires of the Inquisition, and to feed the flames of war in the new world; if there were any who wished to see the public mind demoralized—confidence between man and man destroyed—social ties broken—domestic and kindred attachments embittered or annihilated by the employment of an infamous system of spies and informers; if there were any who wished to see the public burdens increased till taxation exhausted all the means of supporting individual industry, and life itself was rendered a burden; if there were any who wished to see men taken from their homes without a crime, and immured in dungeons for months without trial; if there were any who wished to see the melancholy spectacle of those individuals appearing in a Court of Justice, demanding inquiry and redress, and a Bill of Indemnity passed to protect their oppressors against the consequences of their conduct; if there were any who wished to see every species of reform opposed, and its supporters vilified; if there were any who wished to see this once happy and hospitable land shut against foreigners who sought an asylum here from the tyranny that our Government had contributed to establish in their own country; if there were any to whom these things were agreeable, he did not expect they would vote for him (Sir Robert Wilson), they would give their suffrages to another representative. (Applause.) He could not hope for the support of the friends of the holy alliance—he could not hope for the support of those who concurred in every measure of oppressive taxation—he could not hope for the gratitude of Ministers, or the favour of those assistants or privy counsellors of Ministers, Reynolds, Oliver, and their band—(applause)—but those who wished to see reform introduced, who wished to see liberal principles advocated, who wished to have a representative who would never oppose the opinions of his constituents, and who would pledge himself to resign his seat when he could not hold it consistently with their wishes—such would give him their support. But it was not enough to make professions for the future, it was necessary to give explanations of the past, as a candidate should be, like Cæsar's wife, not only free from guilt but from suspicion, which Cæsar's wife was not, and therefore he repudiated her. (Applause.) Sir Robert here read extracts from a pamphlet which he published on the national defence, to prove that he had then in view to guard against the dangers of a standing army, by mixing the national defenders with the people. In this pamphlet he condemned the system of corporal punishment, and recommended its abolition. There was another charge made against him, in which he was accused, as the historian of Egypt, of having published a charge against a great personage, and of having afterwards confessed its falsehood when he had quarrelled with Ministers. When he first saw this libel, he went to the printer, to inquire into his authority for publishing it. He was as indifferent as any man to political squibs; but when he was accused of falsehood, he could not, both as a soldier and a man of honour, sit quietly under the charge. He therefore desired the printer to tell the author of this libel, that he was guilty of calumny and falsehood, and that he would confront him whenever he chose to come forward. (Applause.) He did not now wish to go into the details of this question. All that he had written remained, and might be compared. Knowing that Bonaparte had made a defence of his conduct, which, though it did not deny the fact charged, deprived it of a part of its horrors from the necessity he alleged of committing it, he had lately published that defence along with the charge. It had no reference to his general system; and he (Sir Robert), who had been accustomed to meet his enemies in the field, would sooner cut off his right hand than follow the example of those who had trampled upon a fallen enemy, and treated with cruelty one who had sought refuge in misfortune in British generosity and British humanity. There were other charges brought against him, namely, that he was a poor man, and a dissatisfied officer. He did not dislike moderate wealth, but he trusted he should never grow rich on the spoils of his country. He had no reason, indeed, to be satisfied. He had given above 5,000*l.* for his commission, and twenty-five years of service to his country. He had shed his blood in its defence. He had used every exertion of which he was capable, civil and military, to support the civil and military character of England. But he had not yet even had the annuity interest for his 5,000*l*. But he saw those about him who had never given a shilling for their commissions, who had never seen a shot fired; he saw some of those become rich men, and enjoying honours. The electors wished to expel the drones; he trusted, however, they would give the bees their honey. Why had come been given him to be dissatisfied? It was because it was known, that though he would at any moment cheerfully devote his life as he had done for his King, he was also willing to devote it with as much cheerfulness in defence of British freedom. (Loud cheers.) He trusted that in the whole of the contest they would preserve good temper, and, as freedom of speech and trial by jury were the best rights of Englishmen, that they would bear every candidate. (Great applause.)

A show of hands was then taken. The nomination was declared in favour of Mr. Calvert and Sir Robert Wilson, after which a poll was demanded for Mr. Barclay.—The polling continued till four, when the numbers were—For Mr. Calvert, 427—Sir R. Wilson, 338—Mr. Barclay, 228.

After the poll was declared,

Mr. CALVERT thanked his friends for their kindness, and invited them early to the poll to-morrow morning to ensure his triumph.

Mr. BARCLAY attempted to speak, but could not be heard from the tumult of yells, groans, and hisses, mixed with some applause, with which he was saluted.

Sir ROBERT WILSON was received with immense applause. His friends, he said, had nobly redeemed the pledge which he made to the country of their patriotism and independence. Sir Robert expressed his confident hope, that the good sense and patriotism of the electors of Southwark would powerfully contribute to redeem the country, and that before Saturday night they would set a great example to the rest of the nation; and manfully assist, not only in recovering their own rights, but in extending liberty over the world. (Immense applause.)

The meeting then dispersed. A body of the populace waited for Sir R. Wilson, and carried him on their shoulders in triumph to a neighbouring inn. During the whole of the day Mr. Barclay and his friends seemed to be the objects of general and virulent animosity. Every vote that was given him was followed by yells and hissing. His colours could not with safety be worn. One of his carmen, who exhibited the orange riband, was assailed with mud, and the constables who seized the rioter were obliged to fight their way through a crowd that attempted to rescue him. On the other hand, the friends of Mr. Calvert and Sir R. Wilson were always received with shouts of applause.

When the poll concluded on Friday, Mr. CALVERT alluded to some attempts that were making to prevent the poorer electors from voting, on the plea, that they had, during the late distressing times, applied for relief, as to the Poor Rates.—Mr. BARCLAY, though at the bottom of the poll (his proper place) thanked the electors for their favours!—But the attention of the people was again occupied by Sir R. WILSON, who spoke with his accustomed fluency and energy. He informed his auditors, that from every part of the country, where the elective franchise was enjoyed, he received communications indicative of the triumph of liberal principles; and although 40 or 50 men could do little immediately, they might, by asserting the opinions of that part of England which was represented, produce a reaction in the public mind, and cause it no longer to endure a system which had covered the land with affliction. It might then be seen, that all those who had a voice to express were equally animated “by an ignorant impatience” of abuses which spread universal misery and distress. With regard to the endeavours used to deprive of their votes those poorer individuals who had dared to assert their independence, he would see justice done; and whether returned or not to Parliament, he now pledged himself to brand with infamy those who had thus dared to invade their privileges. He stood there the champion of their rights as well as of their laws. He was sorry to detain them so long in the rain; but they had proved that the performance of their duties did not depend on foul or fine weather; and he could promise them on his part, that he would at any time go through fire and water for their sake.—This speech was followed by loud and general acclamations.

COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX.

A meeting of Freeholders took place on Friday, at Hackney, when Messrs. BYNG and MELLISH were proposed as Candidates. After which, Mr. BYNG came forward with several resolutions to the following effect:—

That Middlesex should be represented by men who were avowed enemies to encroachments on the liberties of the people, and determined friends of retrenchment and reform; that the abuses of liberty had been occasioned by persons falsely calling themselves Representatives of the people; that it was the imperative duty of the Electors to return to Parliament men whose principles had always been those of general and constitutional liberty; that the thanks of the Meeting were due to the independent political conduct of Mr. Byng; that Mr. Mellish, from his unvaried support of Ministers—from his voting for that most inquisitorial impost the Income Tax, and from his agreeing to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the Indemnity Bill, and the Corn Bill, had forfeited his claims to represent so enlightened and populous a county as Middlesex; that it was the opinion of that Meeting, that T. W. Clarke, Esq. of Swaitley-house, was a proper person to elect as a Representative; that District Committees should be appointed to canvass the county in Mr. Clarke's favour, and that a subscription should be opened for defraying the expenses.

The first Resolution was then put to the vote, and carried unanimously. On the second, there was so much confusion, that it was difficult to say how the question was carried. The third and fourth were carried. On the 5th (that relating to Mr. Mellish), a considerable noise ensued, and the Sheriff, after some time, declared the Resolution to be negatived. The Sheriff's decision was questioned. The Sheriff then again put the Resolution, after which it was declared that it had been carried by a very small majority.—The remainder of the Resolutions were then agreed to.

Mr. BYNG then thanked the freeholders for their good opinion.

Mr. MELLISH declared, that he had always exercised the duties reposed in him with the greatest impartiality. He had done his best for the interests of the county as well as the whole nation, and having so done, he should demand their suffrages. (Applause and noise.)

The Meeting broke up.

MEETING OF MR. WOOLER'S FRIENDS.

On Monday a very numerous Meeting assembled at the City of London Tavern, for the promotion of Mr. Wooler's election for Coventry.—Major Cartwright was unanimously voted to the Chair.

Mr. PETER WALKER, in rising to read the resolutions, wished that he had had the talents of the man who was the object of the Meeting. He had not seen what was intended to be moved till that moment, and he would rather have had some person of greater ability to propose them than himself.—Mr. Walker then proceeded to read the resolutions, the substance of which was—That as a large majority of the Members of the House of Commons were returned by the Ministers of the Crown, by the corrupt influence of the Peers in Parliament, and by the conduct of a few boroughmongers who had usurped the rights and privileges of the people of England, it became the duty of every Englishman to rally round the standard of independence, and give their votes to its known supporters; that it was equally the interest and duty of every individual who had been robbed of his elective franchise by the encroachments of arbitrary power, and those who had been disfranchised by the unjust exercise of corrupt influence, to return the man who possessed talent to advocate their rights, principle to support, and firmness to defend them; that the talents of Mr. Wooler peculiarly qualified him for a defender of unrepresented and misrepresented Englishmen; that the meeting hailed the resolution of the people of Coventry as a proof of disinterested and independent patriotism, and as the best pledge of Mr. Wooler's ultimate success. There were other resolutions, for subscriptions to defray the expenses of the election, and the expenses of the freemen who had undertaken to march to Coventry, to support Mr. Wooler.—From the knowledge he had of Mr. Wooler, he could say that he was a man of the highest honour, and the greatest eloquence, and, in reply, he was most forcible and effective. He would be in the House of Commons a rock of support to the people. (Great applause.) He would be the greatest assistant and protector of that body against which the aristocracy would direct their greatest exertions. There was no man who had been present at, or had read his trial, but had the greatest respect for his mind and qualifications. It was true, if a man was wanted to fight the mock fights between Whig and Tory, they would not fix on Mr. Wooler; but as a man of sterling merit and independence, coming from the middle rank of society, in which there was more honest worth than in any other, they would find it their interest to support him. They could fix upon no man more proper to oppose Canning, or any vile wretch, that would venture to pass his brutal jokes upon the personal calamities of an unfortunate fellow countryman. (Applause.) Mr. Walker concluded by moving the resolutions he had read.

Mr. DAV seconded the resolutions because he was satisfied that their object was the protection of the freedom and privileges of mankind. There was no man so capable of advocating the cause they all loved, so well as the gentleman they had met to support on the present occasion. No man had ever presented himself so capable of meeting the exigencies of the times in favour of the people.—No man was ever better calculated to render justice to the public. He might mention, that out of 400 freemen of Coventry belonging to London, above one-half had offered to go down even bare-footed. (Great applause.) It was necessary that every exertion should be made for the cause, and even a penny from each for the support of the election would make it more secure. It was advisable to try to bring him in, after the ancient manner of choosing representatives. By choosing Mr. Wooller, the people would show their patriotism and political consistency; but, if they did not send such men to the House of Commons, they would have more Centennial Parliaments, and God knew whether shortly they would have any liberty left at all.

Major CARTWRIGHT stated the reasons for his being in the chair. He had been told that Mr. Cobbett had no chance of success, and though he had subscribed towards his election, having pledged himself to Mr. Wooller, when he saw no likelihood of Mr. Cobbett's succeeding, he had still determined to support the cause of Reform by being present at that meeting. It was a very convenient doctrine that only men of great fortune and family were fit to sit in the House of Commons. But whom had they had for Coventry? A bookseller—a man who sold books in Fleet-street. Mr. Wooller, however, was a writer of books. One sold pack-thread and pasteboard, but the other possessed the genius that gave life and soul to the book. Mr. Wooller was a printer; let it never be forgotten that America in a great measure owed her independence to a printer—the immortal Franklin. (Applause.) The King's printer had been in the House; he should be glad to see the people's printer there. The King's turnspit had been once in Parliament, which occasioned some peculiar observations of Mr. Burke. The Major then read the resolutions, which were severally agreed to unanimously.

The items of the subscription already commenced were then read, amongst which were—Mr. Charles Pearson, 21l.; an Enemy to Corruption, 21l.; a Reformer, 21l.; a Blow to Borough-mongers, 10l.; Major Cartwright, 5l.

Mr. PEARSON read a declaration of a number of freemen of Coventry, that they would go on foot or by canal conveyance to support Mr. Wooller. Mr. Wooller was a man who had "steered straight on a constant course," neither turning to the right nor to the left; but what ever current there was against him, he was always ready to stem and overcome it. Every exertion he had made had tended to place him on the pedestal whence ministerial personages had in vain endeavoured to remove him. They had heard of subscriptions for the abolition of the negro slave-trade, why should there not be subscriptions against the slavery of the whites? Mr. Pearson concluded with moving the thanks of the meeting to such of the freemen of Coventry as had set the noble example of walking down to support Mr. Wooller. The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

The thanks were then given to the Major, after which the meeting broke up.

(Notwithstanding all this, Mr. WOOLLER did not proceed to the poll; but we are happy to see that Mr. Butterworth will most likely lose his seat for Coventry, which will, it should appear, be occupied by Mr. E. . .)

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JUNE 12.—The celebrated chemist Sir H. Davy, who intends to travel in different countries of Europe, has arrived at Frankfort.

The old men in the environs of Paris declare, that they do not remember a year in which the vines have given finer hopes than at this moment. The heat, which is extreme for some days, gives the expectation of much greater abundance.

Letters from Bucharest, in Wallachia, dated the 17th

March, announce, that an earthquake has destroyed the great and flourishing town of Philippopoli, in Rumania. This town counted at least 70,000 inhabitants. We are assured that it has been altogether swallowed up in the subterranean abyss, and that its traces are in vain sought for. The positive date of this disastrous event is not stated.

The celebrated Roman painter Camuccini set out from Rome in the latter end of May to present in person to the King of the Two Sicilies his great picture of The Death of Caesar, which is destined to ornament one of the great halls of the Royal Palace of Naples.

The mausoleum which the army of the Sambre and Meuse had caused to be erected in 1796, near Coblenz, on Mount Saint Pierre, to General Marceau, has been demolished. The materials are to be employed in the works of fortifications. General Marceau, at the age of 27 years, and endowed with great military talents and much intrepidity, was slain at the battle of Altenkirchen. The Archduke Charles, who then commanded the Austrian army, as soon as he was apprised of General Marceau's wound, immediately sent his private surgeon to him, and after his death caused funeral honours to be paid him.

Bastide, Jausion, and Colard, the assassins of Fualdes, were executed at Albi on the 3d of June. About half-past four, the condemned were conducted from the prison and placed on the fatal cart. Bastide, Colard and Jausion, were in the middle, and two respectable ecclesiastics at the extremities, holding in their hands the cross, the sign of our redemption. They invoked them, in the name of their God, to ~~reference~~ and confession; but the condemned never ceased to protest their innocence. Arrived at the place of execution, a momentary impulse of horror and alarm appeared to affect them at the sight of the horrible preparation for punishment. Jausion first ascended the scaffold, with sufficient resignation. Colard was borne almost in an agony, and did not display in his last moments the same energy he had manifested during the trial. Bastide followed them with firmness, and underwent his fate without complaining. Before submitting his head to the hatchet of the executioner, Jausion invoked heaven and mankind. He said, that belief ought to be attached to the assertions of a man on the point of death—that his words ought to be sacred; and he again protested his innocence. He seemed, however, cast down. The execution did not last more than a few minutes. A numerous crowd of spectators had assembled to witness the last moments of the condemned. Order was not disturbed for an instant. Not a cry escaped, and humanity was respected at the sight of those whose crimes had outraged it most. Anne Benoit was exposed on the following day, and was branded with the letters T. P. She did not cease to shed tears during the time of the punishment. She seemed to regret Colard very much. Both and the woman Bancal have obtained a respite. From this woman some new discoveries were expected; but this unhappy woman has resumed her former apathy. She declares she will not make any discoveries but to her confessor; and if she persists in this, it is thought she will be executed on Saturday next.

JUNE 14.—At the sitting of the Correctional Tribunal, a case was called on of a seditious engraving. An engraver, named Partout, designed a plate, representing a child, dressed en militaire, seated on the knee of an old grenadier, and surrounded by old soldiers. The engraver and several dealers who had sold the print having been summoned to answer for it, they replied that they had discovered nothing in the plate but the representation of a scene in l'Enfant du Regiment, a piece played at the Theatre. An ordinance of the Chamber of Council of the Tribunal of First Instance declared that there was no cause for prosecution. On the opposition, however, of the Ministry, the Cour Royale set aside this decision, and directed Partout to be tried before the Tribunal of Correctional Police. The arrest containing this determination imports that the engraving, in its different parts, and in its ensemble, is intended to represent the son of Bonaparte.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JUNE 21.

A PARIS paper says, that a man at Copenhagen the other day made an attempt, or rather signs of an attempt, to assassinate the King of DENMARK. His MAJESTY, who unlike his more prosperous royal brethren receives every class of persons at his morning audiences, and converses with each individual on the nature of his demands, was approached by the man in so wild a manner, that the attendants luckily seized on him. Surgical instruments were found upon him, and it appears that he had formerly been a barber-surgeon, who had become subject to paroxysms of madness. The people crowded about the King in a most affectionate manner during his usual airing. This Sovereign, who when Prince Regent meddled as little as possible in the long contest between France and the Allies, and whom his legitimate brethren paid accordingly, first by battering his metropolis and then by suffering him to be despoiled by BERNADOTTE, seems to be justly popular among his subjects. They feel that he has been firm to his friends, nobly-intentioned, and severely tried; and therefore, notwithstanding his misfortunes, and rather the more on that account, they shew him respect and attachment. This is indeed a spectacle worthy of the nations, and most honourable to both parties. How different from the situation of much more apparently flourishing princes!

There is little news from Paris of any importance,—at least of what is usually called importance. But under the present anxious circumstances, every little movement is an indication of important feelings. The Papers of last Sunday inform us of a curious case of a "seditious print," now before the Correctional Tribunal. Now there is one thing clear at least in this business, which is, that the Court think the picture of importance,—and so much so, that they cannot help shewing what they think. If a mere resemblance of young NAPOLEON, painted on a grenadier's knee, can produce such a sensation, what would the semi-legitimate little rogue do himself, were he to come by and by among the old soldiers themselves?

The Courier, with an equal deliciousness of news, climax, and betrayed feeling, informed its readers on the 16th, that "the country might now be considered as plunged into all the confusion, violence, and zeal, of a general election;—and for what is passing," continued he, "at this moment in every county of the British empire, some idea may be formed of the benefit we should derive from the annual recurrence of such scenes."—"Let it not however," he adds, with a grave face, "be supposed, that &c. &c. &c. BUT, &c. &c." The reader sees at once all the passages we have omitted. These little explanatory words, but and however, make exquisite short hand. The fact is, the Courier does not like "such scenes," and sets out pretty fiercely with telling us so; but a constitutional recollection comes across him;—and so he must give us a however; and then again the cloven foot itches to be pawing, and forth comes it with a but.

Truly interesting indeed to the lovers of their country are "such scenes," especially after the long and sufficient experience they have had of other scenes, both at home and abroad. Every day promises better and better for a fermenting of the old Parliamentary leaven,—except, we must confess, in Westminster. The chief servants of the old system will of course get in again, not however without some unusual contests; and so will many of their understrappers;—but many of the said understrappers will not; and many persons of a very different kind will get in for the first time. Some, in particular, of a most desirable description, are likely to be returned,—men who can speak; and this is of double importance, inasmuch as, with the exception of a single man, who has done his best to spoil the effect of his own talent, the Ministers are ridiculously deficient in this respect. It is likely, among others, that Mr. WATTHAM will be returned for London, and Sir ROBERT WILSON for Southwark. Among the Members already returned, we are heartily glad to see WILLIAM HENRY WHITBREAD, the son of the late excellent Englishman of that name. As to Westminster we hope that the opinion of the reforming advocates respecting the numerous compulsory attendance of the hostile voters may prove true; but it is but too certain in the mean time, that great schisms have been unhappily effected among the Reformers themselves; and we think it but too manifest also, that those schisms have been principally owing, first, to an endeavour to force Sir FRANCIS BURDETT into contact with individuals whom he reasonably disliked; and second, to the resentment of Mr. CORBETT against him, for his having given perhaps too much way to the dislike. With respect to Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, we have said, and we repeat, that we wish him well every where but in Westminster. We need not repeat our reasons; we gave them in our last, and have insinuated them in the article at the head of our present paper. But the Chronicle says that the report of Sir SAMUEL's certainty of being returned for some place or other, is not true; that if it were, it would be no argument against his return for Westminster; and that instead of Sir SAMUEL, it is Mr. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD who has a second chance before him of getting into Parliament. All this however does not change our opinion respecting Sir SAMUEL. We were aware of the chance in favour of Mr. KINNAIRD, and said as much. Indeed it was another reason why we wished to see him returned for Westminster, because we had been given to understand also by a kinsman, that in that case, another friend of Reform would get into Parliament with him. Again, a decided Reformer; that is to say, one who goes the whole length of the question with Sir FRANCIS BURDETT; is in our opinion the only proper person to be returned for a city which has made itself conspicuous by the same zeal. And lastly, we were not the authors of the report, which the Chronicle calls "false, if not malicious;" nor indeed do we think that the Chronicle means to call us so, when it mentions us as the "publisher" of it. We do not think that it supposes us capable of falsehood; much less of malice. The supposition, we have good reason to believe, was not confined to ourselves; nor can we imagine that it will have been at all weakened by the subsequent appearance of Lord HENRY MOLINEUX HOWARD, as the nominator of Sir SAMUEL on the Hustings. We rather suspect, that at the visitation of that personage, borough after borough danced across the astonished eyes of the beholders, like the cloudy reflections of towns and landscapes off the Calabrian coast, and that a groan went through all the hearts of the Reformers.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY gave us an eloquent description of the sins of the late House of Commons. It was, in fact, a portrait of too many of our modern Parliaments. But what is the remedy? The speeches of Sir SAMUEL! Alas, the Learned Gentleman knows full well, that he has long spoken in vain.—No! it is a Reform in the Constitution of that House which can alone prevent its continuing to be, what it has for years been,—a Manufactory of Mischief.

Sir W. RURROUGHS is expected to oust the Ministerial Candidate for Taunton, Somerset.

It is calculated that Ministers will lose at least 30 votes in the new Parliament.

STATE OF THE POLL

IN WESTMINSTER, LONDON, AND SOUTHWARK, AT THE CLOSE YESTERDAY:—

WESTMINSTER.—ROMILLY, 1276.—MAXWELL, 1241. BURDETT, 484.—KINNAIRD, 63.—HUNT, 33.—CAITWRIGHT, 20.

LONDON.—WOOD, 3779.—WILSON, 3338.—WAITHMAN, 2979.—CURTIS, 2844.—THORP, 2739.—ATRINS, 1613.

SOUTHWARK.—CALVERT, 1954.—WILSON, 1408.—BARCLAY, 1102.

We are informed, that the Committee for conducting the election of Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and Mr. KINNAIRD came yesterday to the following resolutions:—

"That, from the result of the Canvass which has been made for the Honourable Douglas Kinnaird, it appears to this Committee, that there is no prospect of securing his Election.

"That Mr. Kinnaird has, by Letter, and by the Communications of his personal Friends, earnestly, and in the most handsome and disinterested manner, expressed his desire that his Name might be withdrawn from the Poll, whenever its continuance there should appear not likely to promote the Cause of Reform.

"That it appears to this Committee, from the reports of several Sub-Committees, that the zeal and abilities of Mr. Kinnaird are not sufficiently known to the electors at large; and that the continuance of his name on the poll is likely to prove prejudicial to the election of Sir Francis Burdett, the most illustrious, able, disinterested and courageous advocate of the rights of the people.

"That, therefore, this Committee decides, that the name of Mr. Kinnaird be withdrawn from the poll.

"That in coming to this resolution, the Committee cannot refrain from expressing their deepest regret that the Electors of Westminster should not have bound to their service an ardent and strenuous advocate of Parliamentary Reform—one who would have done honour to the choice of the electors, and have justified the selection made by this Committee. But they are consoled by the hope that, upon this occasion, the electors, for whom they act, will redouble their efforts in favour of Sir Francis Burdett, and lose no time in placing that long-tried and faithful Representative of the People at the head of the Poll."

It was said last night that Mr. BARCLAY had given it, but we believe the report is incorrect: he means to grapple with fortune a little longer, it is said.

The Tax-gatherers,—with a few honourable exceptions,—are on the alert both in the City and in Westminster, canvassing for the Ministerial Candidates. One of the Sons of Sir W. CURTIS, we are informed, goes about with a person of this description named Day, and even ventures to hint at accommodation if necessary.—In Westminster, they are equally active for Sir M. MAXWELL. Now it is quite clear, that such a course operates both in the way of terror and bribery. Thus it is that the very grievances of the people are made instruments by which to coerce and enslave them.—But this, we suppose, is what the knaves call "legitimate influence."

The gallant Captain MAXWELL (observes a Correspondent) commanded the Alceste at the time the Boa Constrictors, two large serpents, were brought over to this country, and very gallantly allowed them to be fed with live goats. The torture which the poor creatures suffered, and the whole history of this humane scene, may be found in M'LEON'S Voyage.

On the 5th day of the last Election, Sir W. CURTIS was 3,615: on the 5th day of the present, he counts only 2844.—At the same periods, Mr. WOOD had only 1979 votes; and now he reckons 3779. The Livery are not the only persons who are quite tired of Sir WILLIAM'S selfish politics.

Noncon. June 18.—The numbers at the final close of the poll were—For Mr. SMITH, 2089—Mr. GORNEY, 2032—Mr. HANFORD, 1475.—The two first were duly returned by the Sheriff; and were chaired from the Hall in grand procession.

ELECTION TRICK.—The Courier of Friday contained the following paragraph:—"A curious circumstance occurred yesterday evening at the London Tavern. The Patrons of the Clergy dined at that place, and Mr. WAITHMAN, for electioneering purposes, attended there, with a view to canvas the votes of those who were present; but he, not being a Subscriber, Governor, or Patron, was thrust out of the room with some degree of violence."—This version of the story is a gross falsehood, as by the Morning Papers it appears that it was Sir W. CURTIS who obtruded himself on the company, and Mr. WAITHMAN, thinking that he had as much right there as the biscuit-baking Baronet, appeared in the field also, and then began the tug of war, but not by Mr. WAITHMAN. To shew how accurate the Courier is in describing scenes of this nature, and how correct its information is, it may be necessary to observe, that the dinner party was composed of Patrons of the Charity Schools of the Metropolis, and not the Patrons of the Clergy.—T.

FIRE.—Yesterday morning the neighbourhood of Temple-bar was in great consternation, by a fire breaking out at Mr. DOWNES's, a printer, where, by the activity of the firemen, its ravages were solely confined to the premises of Mr. DOWNES, which were nearly consumed, with the whole of his printing materials.

MR. CURWEN AND IRELAND.

Mr. Curwen, in 1818, has published his travels in Ireland in 1813. On leaving Scotland for Ireland, he says, vol. 1, p. 94,—"So entirely had my mind been absorbed in revolving this great political question (the Union), that time passed unheeded; and I did not perceive our near approach to the shore till the report of a cannon roused me from the reverie into which I had fallen, and which, I fear, you may by this time have cause to regret was of so long duration."—This excuse of a reverie is to "Sir," a personage whom gentlemen tourists are very anxious to amuse, instruct, and conciliate. How comes it that every thing said or done is fantastical among us? Here an ancient legislator, a gentleman farmer, instead of stating his opinions simply to the reader, approaches him through Sir, in an epistolary form, which Sir evermore receives the kindest regards at the conclusion of each separate letter of seventy-four. How much does this differ from John Doe and Richard Roe, and the common vouchee in the consummate absurdities of our law proceedings. These infantine tricks are not the cause of my objecting to Mr. Curwen. He favours the Union of Ireland with England, even though he declares himself the determined political opponent of Mr. Pitt; "for," says he, "that hostility did not warp my judgment on this occasion. An union of the two kingdoms appeared to me indispensably requisite to preserve the connexion between them: the interest of both required it."

What are his reasons for this opinion?—that the union with Scotland had the happiest consequences, though Fletcher of Salton was against it. This is the only ground for his opinion, that the union between Ireland and Britain would have the happiest consequences. He however suggests reasons why the Irish should be satisfied to want a legislature, and why the Irish legislature should have been annihilated. He says,—"The exterior form of the Irish Government was correspondent to our own, but was only nominally the same."—Then, I ask, why did not the Irish obtain in form and spirit the same Constitution as the British. Perhaps he imagines they were not fit to have so perfect a system of government. Mr. Curwen proceeds:—"The supreme authority and administration of Ireland had the outward form but not the internal spirits—the essence of the British Constitution. The Commons were the mere puppets of the two great aristocratical factions—the people a feather in either scale, until arms were put into their hands, and they became the means of extorting, from the weakness of our councils, what ought to have been yielded to Ireland from a principle of justice. Corruption had become so general, so familiar, and so fashionable, as to extinguish all sense of propriety, and even that of shame. Remuneration was considered to be expected, if not actually demanded, not for public services performed, but for abstaining to clog the wheels of Government. In power there was no shade of difference between one party and another." &c.—Let us ask, in passing, if this statement is not truly applicable to the existing British Constitution, at least it requires a keen vision to perceive that between them there was merely a nominal coincidence. Are not the English Commons puppets of the two great aristocratical factions? In 1793, 161 Peers and Commons nominated 306 Members to the House of Commons. Is not remuneration expected, that the wheels of Government may move glibly on? What are all pensions to unemployed Statesmen, Ambassadors, Chancellors, &c.? These simply mean—you were paid so much for vociferating for monarchy and against the people; retire; let new faces, with fresh lungs, take your place, and you shall have half price for silence. Call pensions a retirement—what you please; they are truly a bribe, and the people know it.

Mr. Curwen, who is, I believe, a moderate reformer, says,—"All ranks were dissatisfied, and felt themselves treated by Great Britain, not as a co-equal empire, but as a conquered province;" that is, before the union, and what are they now after it? When Ireland had a Parliament, there was the show, the hope, the possibility: at present Ireland is at the mercy of the British Parliament. To be sure, the Irish may petition over land and sea, and this boon is the residue of their political rights.

Mr. Curwen and others imagine they determine the argument, when they have amply reviled the Irish Parliament as corrupt and flagitious; but who made its members so?—not the Irish people—not the instinctive depravity of the Members of the Parliament—but the English Government in Ireland, who bribed and bought the majority of the Members who were returned by boroughs. The remedy then was, to abstain from bribing them—to exchange the nominees of Lords and Boroughmongers for representatives of the people. This was the remedy then; it is the remedy now.

The English Ministry, headed by Mr. Pitt, followed a different course; they bribed and bought up the whole Irish Parliament at once. On this Mr. Curwen says,—"The odium attached to its completion (the union) rests with the bribed not the briber; and as the measure had been expedient, and was indispensable (not a word of proof); it was better to advance at once the whole cost of corruption, and have done with it, than to pay an annual interest on the aggregate of national delinquency."

What national delinquency? Does he not say the "Commons were the mere puppets of the two great aristocratical factions." Were these puppets the nation, and their crimes the crimes of the nation? And what are the happy consequences of the Union? Laws of severity have been enacted, such as Ireland hitherto had not known: a standing army and military array are now in being beyond what Ireland ever required in time of peace; the cost of corruption is undiminished; places were created prospectively to the carrying the Union, and many have been since added to increase patronage; and the revenue of Ireland falls short of the interest of the debt and the expenditure five or six millions, which England must pay; and this is the good which England has received by the Union. S. IDEM.

MR. MATHEWS'S PERFORMANCES.

LYCEUM.—Mr. MATHEWS concluded his entertainments at the Lyceum on Tuesday night with the following Address:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—The only painful part of my exertions now remains—that of bidding you farewell. The great patent theatres have so entirely exhausted the language of self-commendation, that they have left me no choice of terms that can express my gratitude, for “overflowing and brilliant audiences;” “rapturous, unanimous, and unbounded applause;” “roars of laughter;” “unqualified approbation;” and “unprecedented success.” I must, therefore, content myself with offering in less pompous, but not less sincere, phraseology, the humble tribute of my heartfelt thanks. Accept, Ladies and Gentlemen, this homely but genuine expression of my feelings, and believe that it will be the proudest recollection of my life, that during the course of 40 evenings’ entertainments, I have been honoured not only with full houses but also by your approbation and applause. The question, whether I had done wisely in leaving the boards of what are called the regular theatres, and which was some time problematical, is now decided, and I may say (without more vanity than your encouragement will fully justify) is decided in my favour. I now, therefore, leave the metropolis with that plentiful harvest which has ripened in the sunshine of your favour. But this I beg to state distinctly, that while I am advised that my performances are within the strict letter of the law, no fear shall deter me from proceeding, and that I will resist strenuously and firmly any measures that may be pursued to support an injurious monopoly to my injury; and that I shall double all the energies of my resistance from the recollection that I am contending in the cause of the public, who have no right to be curtailed of their lawful amusements, or to be told by patentees, “If you won’t come to laugh with us, we will take care you shall not go to laugh elsewhere.” That I shall make you laugh again and again, I sincerely hope; and though I must choose a merrier subject than patent theatres and monopoly, I do not doubt that I shall have the cordial satisfaction of meeting again next year as many smiling faces as have graced this theatre for the last 40 nights: and I have had the honour and happiness of receiving you “At Home.”

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

THE aggregate of the works in the Model Academy are not quite so important as last year’s, but they are among the most perfect, some of them the most perfect specimens of their respective Sculptors. Mr. R. WESTMACOTT’S style formerly was impaired by a heaviness in the shape and movements of his figures, so much so, that even his youth appeared as if afflicted with hereditary gout. But his 111, Cypris, are indeed the Goddess of Beauty’s children. 110, Monumental Alto Relievo, has a beauty in the composition, a beauty and elasticity in the limbs, and a sweetness of sentiment in the two figures, as they entwine their arms round each other, expand their wings and look attentively downward, that assort with our ideas of refinement and vigilance, as belonging to guardian angels which they represent. So, in their lightness of execution, do their airy drapery and wings. They appear as on a special duty, as hovering over to protect some valuable charge, to secure from sacrilegious disturbance the enshrined remains, or waiting over the expiring and hallowed object of their care, as envoys to convey the seraphic spirit to the place of the immortal and the happy. Mr. WESTMACOTT’S Model of a Statue, to be cast in bronze, of the late Mr. Pitt, has much nobleness of attitude, dress, and anatomical science. But Mr. PITT, with his high, domineering, aristocratical look, rigid face, long neck, and lanky limbs, has the most unfavourable face and figure possible for a senatorial statue. Mr. WESTMACOTT has done wonders with it. We admire also his Sketch of a National Monument in honour of Gen. Picton, 1106, and the more, because it gives us matter of fact rather than less interesting allegory. The desperation of unconquerable courage, and the arrangement of the parts, or the composition, cannot, we think, be improved in the more finished sculpture.

In 1112, Mr. BAILY has represented Psyche, in a sportive mood, disarming Cupid. Though there is something unpleasant in the angular lines, produced by the position of Cupid supplicating for his shafts on his knees, yet his earnestness and the anatomy of his figure are finely expressed; and the entire group, and the figure of Psyche especially, is a playful proof of the comprehensiveness of Mr. BAILY’S talents, and that, he is a polygamist in sculpture, dividing his regard between Thalia and her pensive Sister.—His Flora, a Statue in Marble for the Earl of Darnley, is, in the graceful symmetry and turns of the limbs, a sculptural prosopopœia to the forms of the lovely objects over which the delicate Goddess presides, and worthy of a nobleman’s, and what is better, a man of taste’s possession. If to these we add the beauty of the partially covering dress, and the unassured feminine timidity of step, for she “Still doubts if it be spring, nor dares display

“Her opening beauties to the golden day,” we shall have reason to congratulate the Artist and his Patron on this genuine Flora. The dress, in its many folds, is very agreeably contrasted with the breadth of body above. Its light texture is in delicate character with its wearer; but is it not a little too much broken in its folds?

Mr. GARRARD’S 1113, Study for an Ecce Homo, with the scarlet robe, crown of thorns, and reed, at once tells us with Scripture, is “a man of sorrows,” and, in his passive and pensive demeanour, appears like one “led as a sheep to the slaughter.” So far, the performance is as it ought to be; but it would have been much better, if it did not assure us, that the posture of all the limbs, and the entire look, have been anticipated over and over again for centuries back. On this account, this is one of those subjects, which, if it is the free choice of the Artist, is injudiciously chosen, as it is almost impossible to avoid the suspicion of plagiarism. That is not the less a plagiarism which, without the Artist’s knowing it, arises from a strong impression on the mind repeatedly made by similarly executed objects. It is the reverse of invention. It is but a delivery of the memory, in which the “midwife Fancy,” as Shakespeare calls her, has no hand. Mr. GARRARD’S Model, for an Equestrian Statue of the Duke of Wellington, is a well executed group, as to the individual forms, and so we might add, are the attitudes and composition, could we praise what has been done over and over again, till repetition becomes insipidity.

The description of this group in the catalogue, is, in twelve short lines, a mixture of falshood, bad grammar, and a mean offering to that base legitimacy, which, throughout its opposition to Napoleon and since, disgraced itself by its perfidies and oppressions; and which nothing but the impetuosity of that wonderful man would have saved from a continuance of the abject submission to his greatness, which most of his royal opponents were glad to seek refuge in from annihilation.

With beautiful execution, Mr. BAILEY has precisely hit off the ardent genius and impressed look of Mr. HAYDON, and the milder intellectuality of the sculptor’s father. The merit is considerable in several busts by Mr. BENNETS, Mr. JOSEPH, Mr. SMITH, &c. The breadth and disposal of fold in the piece of drapery with which Mr. CHANTREY dresses the busts of the excellent Sculptor, Mr. NOLLEKENS, the President, Mr. WEST, the Naturalist, Sir J. BANKS, &c. are most masterly studies for sculptors, and together with his true execution of outline, of likeness, of the inflexions and prominences of the parts, the sedateness and thought, as if a sensorium was within, instead of that look of thought being created by a sensorium from without, certainly place his busts in the noblest niche of their class of sculpture. And what a cherubic creation is that little loveliness, 1116, Statue of Lady L. Russell, the representative of the gaiety, the innocence, and beauty of her felicitous age, as she rises on tiptoe with her own emblem, a dove, pressed so gracefully and warmly to her bosom, looking like a little infant Venus, or an infant Euphrosyne, so cheerful and graceful are her countenance and action, so round, active, and healthful is her whole frame! It may be thought by some to be too bold an eulogium to say, that we scarcely recollect the line of beauty more charmingly waved even in the Antique than in either of its profiles, or flesh chiseled with a more true undulation of surface, so as to give the neither more nor less of protrusion and retreating of the parts, or of their right length and breadth. Then the light dress seen only on the upper arm, and from the bosom to the knee, clustering at the waist in neat folds, which widen by degrees downwards, so as to give a varied mass, which beautifully contrasts, in its line-divided straitness, with the round, broad, and every way diverging forms of the head, breast, arms, and legs. This delicious display of infantine graces so captivates our moral sensibilities and those of our imagination, that we feel half disposed to say with Leontes in the Winters Tale, at the sight of what he thinks a likeness to Nature in a statue of his long deplored and absent wife,—

"Let no man mock me, for I will kiss her."

Mr. CHANTREY deeply studies Anatomy and the Antique, but, with more of their choice beauties than any other Sculptor in modern Europe, he shows his more devoted attachment to the ever present principles and charms of Nature, which render him the most original and popular Statuary of modern times. His genius, like SHAKESPEARE'S, vivifies whatever he sets his hand to, and warms all hearts; for the highly polished it has refinement, because it has the simplicity of Nature; for the uneducated it has deeper interest of feeling, and for the same reason. We challenge any one who can still venture with DU BOS, WINKLEMAN, &c. to pronounce Englishmen to be incapable of high excellence in Art, and we will answer him by bringing him before this persuasive figure.

1060. Model in Wax, by Mr. ROUCH, must give satisfaction to the Naturalist, whether Artist or Physiologist, for the beautiful exactness in every part of the lions, kid, cage, &c. in this miniature group.

1152. The Choice of Paris, by Mr. SCOLAR, obtained the gold medal in the Royal Academy 1817. The extract from Ovid in the Catalogue, from which this model was taken, directs us to

"Three charming goddesses."

We confess that we can no where find out the charming goddesses, though we do three very good-looking young women.

Mr. LEGER'S is an elegant Sketch of the Marquis of Anglesca. Its bold look is characteristic.

1079, Part of a Monument to be erected in memory of the Lady of Captain Abraham. J. BACON, has about the same degree of talent in Statuary as the usual run of verses in most magazines has in Poetry. So has 1090, Part of a Monument in memory of the late Sir W. Meredith and Lady, where a female lying on two coffins is getting smothered under a wardrobe of garments. There is no direct offence here against taught rules; but the heart apprehension of Nature, which rules assist to mould into Art, touching Art, where is that? We must turn for that to the before-mentioned, and to Mr. FLAXMAN'S Model of Charity, 1089. Here a play of harmonizing and opposing lines delight us with a composition learned and beautiful, and with the essence of simplicity and sensibility. The noble air of Charity gives the idea of the dignity of Virtue, while the tenderness of her look blends sweetness with this dignity, as she holds one child to her breast with one arm, and with the other gently pressing two others who are embracing each other (emblem of pure affection) and closely "gathers them to her, under her protecting arm, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings."

LETTER I.—TO MESSIEURS. J. CRISTALL, J. LINNELL, AND THE REST OF THE MAJORITY OF THE SPRING-GARDEN SOCIETY OF PAINTERS.

GENTLEMEN,—As your Exhibition will have closed for the season before this meets your eye, it will not interfere with those emoluments and advantages which to you appear so precious. Your profits will be secure, and will be exclusively your own.

But, Gentlemen, do there exist among you no such considerations, as what would be profitable also to the public? and to those of your professional brethren whom you invite to contribute to the Spring-Gardens Exhibition? and no desire to accomplish such objects? Or are these considerations to be,—silently on the part of others, and studiously on your own,—merged in those pecuniary benefits, which you have resolved to limit to yourselves? If studiously on your parts, not silently on mine. And surely you will acknowledge some responsibility to be due to that public to whom you address your pretensions. You will assign your reasons, and give me an opportunity of controverting them; or you will discontinue that self-partiality, of which I shall presently complain in more specific terms.

When you formed a Society and advertised an Exhibition separate from that of the Royal Academy, the ambiguous insufficiency of the laws of that Institution, and its seeming illiberality in excluding Painters in water-colours from its honours and advantages, afforded you a motive,—as illiberal and unprincipled exclusions ever will,—which you might safely state to the public, for forming a distinct society of Artists, and another Exhibition. I gave you full credit for the purity of your purposes, and nobody thought or knew much of your bye-laws. It appeared just, and as well for the public as for yourselves, that, though not a chartered body, you should be allowed to open your annual fair; that each Artist should be remunerated for what was sold of his performances; and not unjust that, at the close of the seasons respectively, each of you Members of the Society should receive also his fair proportion of profit for what was seen. But though not unjust, certainly this practice must be regarded as far less generous than the principle of those other Societies, who hold their door-money in trust for more disinterested purposes.

Further, there was nothing discommendable in your circulating invitations for other Artists to join in sending their pictures to your rooms for exhibition and sale. The pact was still fair, or had a seeming foundation of fairness; for if the profits of the show were exclusively yours, the exhibiting Artists willingly acquiesced, because the occupation of time, and the trouble of arranging the catalogue and hanging the pictures, was yours also: the risk, too, of loss, as long as such risk existed, was yours.

To the show of pictures on your walls, you have of late years added a smaller show of prints on your table; and your actuary, or clerk in attendance, is allowed to sell these, and to enregister the names and receive the subscriptions of such persons as may choose to patronise engraved works during their progress. But, what engraved works? and for whom? Ought you not as fair men,—much more as liberal-minded Artists,—to have stated to the public, and to those whom you invited to exhibit with you, that to the show on the walls others might contribute, but that the benefits of the table were to be exclusively your own? Were you prevented from this declaration by a conscious pettiness of selfish motive? or did you hope that such awkward questions as mine would never be asked?

Both your refusals have been distinctly conveyed to me. I am free to repeat, that during the last season you refused (declined, if you like the phrase better) to let Mr. HAYDON'S drawing-book lie on your table, greatly as that Artist had contributed to your success by the exhibition of his Judgment of Solomon; and that during the present, you will not even allow the names to be enregistered there of such visitors as might wish to possess a print from my son EDWIN'S picture of the Fighting Dogs, notwithstanding the large portion of idle time that your clerk has upon his hands. Really, Sirs, these matters, though trivial in themselves, are so important in their general consequences, that I shall probably resume the subject, whether you reply to this or not: closing for the present with an assurance, that if by my desire my son was ever to paint another dog for your Gallery, it shall be no other than him of Æsop-in celebrity, who so witlessly growled in the manger. I should need no CROXALL to point out the application; I could safely trust it to the public discernment.—I am, Gentlemen, &c. &c. J. LANDSEER.

FORGED NOTES.

SIR.—So much having been said of late on the alarming increase of forgery upon the Bank, and of the seeming impossibility of any means being discovered which shall even abate this frightful evil, is it not rather strange that the experience of America, of France, and even of our sister kingdom Ireland, should offer nothing which could be applied as an amelioration? The Irish note merits a marked attention. As a protection against forgery, it has a much better thing than "the gibbet to depend upon," in being made not easy of imitation. The present manufacture of the Irish Bank note has a character of identity so striking, as to become a more potent guard than private marks; for without appealing to these, if there be any, the singular fact is, that in all the hurry of business or of inadvertency, there never has been, during those years which the present system has existed, but one forged bill pass their clerks for genuine. Can our Bank say as much, even with its perpetual appeal to the private mark? The public become all bank inspectors in Ireland, for every postmaster's office through the country has a specimen fixed up for examination and reference, and in this manner forgery is soon detected and stopped on the spot.—The Directors of the Irish Bank deserve great praise for this well-doing, and their motto is reported still to be "Improvement."

But, say the objectors to change here, "Where can be the protection from the employment of the greatest ingenuity, when the celebrated Wm. Wynne Ryland, the Engraver, committed a forgery, and there is such a numerous body of artists, from amongst whom abundant forgeries might always issue?"

It is not from amongst these that forgeries ever have issued; the faculties of this class have not been so degraded. However, mark the consequence, if that surely insane example in Ryland be set up to prove the rule by an exception*; let them take care how they attack by implication a meritorious class; let them pause a-while before

* This man committed a forgery while he had an income of between two and three thousands a year! His professional ingenuity had no share in his crime; for what cost him his life, from its fraudulent intention, was a mere manuscript paper, which any boy could have done.

they handle the two-edged sword; for as ONE eminent artist has suffered death for forgery, so has ONE dignitary of the church*; and ONE Peer of these realms† also for a much worse moral crime, even for murder! But these things come as the mysterious visitations of Providence; and, thanks to that Providence, they are, like the earthquake, of rare occurrence.

To diminish the crime of forgery, I hope the Bank will put the manufacture of its note out of the reach of more dabblers at writing-engraving, and then solid benefits may follow to humanity and the public.

By taking notice of this, you may be aiding a public cause, and will oblige, Sir, your very obedient humble servant.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Saturday, June 13.

SIMS, ESQ. v. RIDGE, WIDOW.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY applied for an order that Mr. Sims might have the conduct of the suit, Ridge against Ridge, widow and administratrix of John Holman Ridge, and that the debts ought to be collected in.

Sir ARTHUR PIGGOTT, for Mrs. Ridge, stated, that there was a very large debt due from a Nobleman of high rank at Calcutta, to the amount of upwards of 200,000*l.*, and that an agent had been sent out to the East-Indies to endeavour to get the debt, and that nothing but entreaty could be available; and that, as to proceedings against the Nobleman here, none were practicable; and that Mr. Sims's solicitor had applied to Messrs. Evans and Bartrum (the Nobleman's agents here) to get the debt paid.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY complained that the examination of Mrs. Ridge, containing the account of her husband's estate and effects, had not been seen, and therefore the state of the affairs could not be known.

The LORD CHANCELLOR ordered that the examination of Mrs. Ridge should be delivered to Mr. Sims's solicitor for his inspection.

OLD BAILEY.

On Wednesday, William Henry Howard, commonly called the Sprig of Fashion, stood indicted for forging a certain order for the payment of 10*l.* with intent to defraud John George Draper. The Prosecutor stated he was Waiter at the Key, in Chandos-street. On the night of the 18th of April, the prisoner and another man, and two women, came to the Key; after they had taken refreshment, &c. the other person, in the presence of the prisoner, offered witness a cheque of 10*l.*, and he objected to it. The prisoner said, he need not be afraid, and wished it was for 1,000*l.* instead of 10*l.* They had supper, and desired to have breakfast at seven o'clock in the morning, saying, they belonged to the Guards, and had to be on duty at the Horse Guards early. Witness did not see the cheque in the prisoner's hand. On the following morning the other person gave his name and address, "Capt. Armstrong, Clarendon Hotel, Bond-street," and he gave him the change.—The Porter at the Key said, the last witness put the cheque produced into his hand, and told him to take it to Sir John Lubbock and Co., Mansion-House-street, which he did, and it was refused payment.—Mr. Justice PARK observed, that there was no evidence of the forgery; the instrument might be a valid one; but the bankers' clerks behaved very improperly, in not coming forward to give their evidence.—Not Guilty.

The Prisoner was again indicted for feloniously forging and uttering a certain order for the payment of 5*l.* 5*s.* with an intent to defraud Elizabeth Hurst.—The Prosecutrix keeps the Crown and Anchor wine-vaults in King-street, Westminster. This witness could not peak to the fact, and the witnesses who could were absent: they were called, but did not answer. The prisoner was consequently acquitted.—Mr. Justice PARK—"Young man, I see by the calendar that you are only 18 years of age; you have been extremely fortunate, and I trust the situation in which you have been placed will induce you to reform your life."

John Hawkins and W. Bull, two very young boys, were convicted of assaulting Louisa Haynes on the King's highway, and forcibly taking from her person a handkerchief, containing 15s. The Jury recommended them to mercy on account of their youth, one of them being but 13, and the other 15 years of age.

Thomas Hayes, a soldier, was indicted for a highway robbery upon the person of Benjamin Hooker, and stealing from his person a gold watch, value 50*l.*, a gold chain, two gold seals, and two Napoleons. It appeared that the prosecutor was upon a visit to his brother-in-law, in Parliament-street. On the evening of the 24th of May, he and his brother went to take a walk, and about a quarter past ten his brother left him, and he (the prosecutor) proceeded over the Pagoda-bridge, at the foot of which a man came up to him, seized him by his bosom, as he thought, for the purpose of stealing his brooch; he then knocked his face against the sentry-box, and demanded "what he had." Prosecutor seized him, and dragged him up towards the top of the bridge, where there was a sentinel on duty, and he begged him to interfere, but he refused, and the prisoner snatched his watch from his fob, and went away, and as he passed the sentry put something into his hand, which proved to be a corner of the prosecutor's neckkerchief, which he had torn off. On the following day a pot-boy at the Three Jolly Butchers took the watch to Mr. Jarman, a silversmith, to have a glass put in it. Mr. Jarman suspecting that it had not been honestly come by, detained the watch, and then ascertained that it had been stolen from the prosecutor. In the evening the prisoner called himself for it in a state of intoxication, and said it had been given him by a gentleman. The Prisoner did not make any defence, but instructed his counsel to insinuate that the prosecutor had given him the watch.

Mr. Smith, of York-street, corroborated many of the principal features of the prosecutor's testimony, particularly that of the prisoner's running away.

Pollard, the sentry, said, the reason he would not interfere was, that each charged the other. He denied that the prisoner gave him the corner of the neckkerchief, but said he picked it up.

The Jury, after about six minutes' consultation, found the prisoner Guilty—Death—aged 19.

On Friday, John Dennett was found guilty for the murder of Jane Rogers, and sentenced to be executed on Monday next. Nothing was adduced on the trial more than has already appeared in the different Police accounts. The prisoner's age was stated in the calendar to be sixty-two.—Wm. Bolton was capitally convicted of uttering as true a forged acceptance to a bill of exchange, with intent to defraud Peter Powell.

CHARGE OF HIGH TREASON.—On Saturday, Mr. Wm. Armstrong, late an acting Master in His Majesty's Navy, residing at 38, Grove-lane, Deptford, was apprehended under a warrant from Bow-street Office, and taken to the Secretary of State's Office, on an accusation of treason.

Sir N. CONANT attended: the prisoner was asked respecting his connexions in the North.

The Prisoner answered, that he had been mate of a ship from London to the North.

Sir N. CONANT next asked if the prisoner had not received letters from correspondents?

Prisoner.—I have a sister there, and the only letter I have received from that quarter was from her three months ago.

Sir N. CONANT.—You are represented to us as a dangerous character. Have you any fire-arms in your house?

Prisoner.—No; I have fire-irons, but not fire-arms. I have not had a pistol in my hand since I left the Navy.

Sir N. CONANT.—I really do not see any occasion for keeping this man.

Prisoner.—As you do not intend to detain me, I shall be obliged if you will inform me who laid the information against me, so that I may be able to prosecute them.

Sir N. CONANT smiled and said, you cannot prosecute.

Prisoner.—Before I get back to Deptford it will have been every where talked of, and it may be supposed I have been apprehended for theft; I wish my case to be made public.

Sir N. CONANT.—I have endeavoured that it should be kept private, and the officers sent to apprehend you had instructions accordingly.

Prisoner.—It does not appear so from the way they conducted themselves; they applied for assistance to the constable, Mr. Price, of Deptford, who came with them, and I was taken to a public-house, and there questioned, and they there said I was apprehended for threatening the life of a very high character.

Sir N. CONANT.—The officers were directed not to expose you, I shall not detain you; I suppose you are to be found at your house at Deptford, if I desire you to come again.

Mr. Armstrong feels himself much injured by the above proceeding, and conscious of his own innocence, requests the Editor to publish the above particulars. He also hopes that Sir N. Conant will re-consider the subject, and furnish him with the name of the informer.

38, Grove-lane, Deptford.

W. ARMSTRONG.

¶ Sir N. CONANT gave Armstrong a sovereign for his loss of time, or coach-hire home.

Mr. Blake, master of a school, near Runcorne, Cheshire, accompanied his boys on Thursday week to a certain part of the river Mersey to bathe, as was his custom: most unfortunately the spring tides had deepened the river just at that place, and the consequence was, that one boy got out of his depth; three others tried to rescue him, and, in spite of Mr. Blake's efforts to save them, by plunging into the river with his clothes on, the whole four unhappily perished.

Mr. Birnie was on Friday principally engaged from ten till past four, in investigating charges of robberies among the crowd before the hustings at Covent-garden, and there were no less than 16 committed for picking pockets. The robbers acted in gangs, armed with knives and scissors, and several persons were severely wounded.

BIRTH.

Lately, in Sellings Parish, Ireland, the wife of Stephen Souten, a labouring man, of her 26th child, in 25 years.

No. 533.

TO THE ELECTORS OF LONDON AND SOUTHWARK.

FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN,

THIS is glorious work. WAITHMAN and THORP elected, CURTIS thrown out, Sir ROBERT WILSON elected,—and WAITHMAN and Sir ROBERT not only elected, but added to the parliamentary friends of the Constitution and of mankind;—these are noble events indeed;—as much more truly glorious, compared with the late shewy luck of the allied promise-breakers, as the growing light of the sun is compared with the gorgeous nonsense of a Chinese feast of lanthorns.

In this, Gentlemen of the Livery, you have done two such good things, that it is difficult to say which is the better of the two, the positive or the negative one; for Sir WILLIAM CURTIS was not only a bad representative, like other bad representatives, (though not of the very worst order) but unluckily, he made good as it were in his own person, and was the personification and bodily presence of a certain character, that has grown upon the citizens of London for the last hundred and fifty years,—I mean, that of gross money-getting and gross feeding.—I am one of the last men in the world to oppose occasional festivity, or a whole round of days of hilarity. If we could get the southern wines (which according to a celebrated critic have already enlivened the veins of the northern people in spite of adulteration), I should like to hear that every one of you had his bottle a day; and would to Heaven that any change of seasons, of politics, of education, or any thing else upon earth, could induce you to leave off your toils earlier in the day, and teach you to enjoy a competence, instead of eternally mill-horsing for wealth. But without meaning to insinuate that Sir WILLIAM CURTIS is a bad man, a good large appetite for what he could get, and no very great brains in knowing what to do with it, certainly conspired to render him a formidable specimen of false and foolish success,—of a certain unwieldy flourishing,—in short, of the most vulgar idea of citizenship, grasping and gross. The effect of this was more hurtful than might appear at first sight; and the sort of joviality he exhibited, which was not intellectual enough to refine it, but only served to gloss it over to common eyes, completed the injury;—for it encouraged grossness of pursuit and taste in his fellows;—led them to think that this was really the kind of success and of joviality that made an accomplished citizen; and all the while enabled the borough-mongers to degrade and laugh at the civic character, which they affected to honour in his particular person. Gentlemen, the acquirement of a proper quantity of money, and the enjoyment of a proper festivity, are, I repeat, very good things; but the vulgar mistake on both subjects are among the very worst things in the world, and generate some of the worst humours and vices. Their pleasures are as bad as their pains. The former are not founded on sympathy, nor the latter on magnanimity. They take away use from industry, ornament from leisure, grace and health from body, sentiment from—but, Gentlemen, I do not mean to press upon Sir WILLIAM, still less do I mean to say that he is a specimen of all that a man may come to through the medium of this system; but he has ostensibly been the representative of it; and I congratulate you most sincerely on his rejection, not only in the ordinary political point of view, but as a sort of instinctive proof, that numbers of you no longer confine your notions of the flourishing London Citizen to beef and bank-notes. Your city, Gentlemen, is a noble one, pitched in a fertile and beautiful county, by the side of a magnificent river, and rich in the memories of great men and glorious actions, to those who have the spirit to dig them up. Are you any longer even to halve your reputation with the sordid? Money has been put to nobler purposes ere now, than flattering itself with its own possession, making mastication the only variety in life, and helping solemn traitors to buy up the liberties of a people. The rich citizen was once the fit associate of the accomplished, the patriotic bearer of arms, the patron of letters; the fine old civic heads and figures that look out upon us from picture-frames have more than cheeks and bodies,—they have eyes of intelligence, and an air of social dignity; and wear the jewels in their caps with a grace beyond the ornament. There was money-getting in their times, and festivity too; but the former was of a more reasonable and generous spirit, and the latter was earned by rural sports and refined by gentility. A Londoner had not then confined himself to his shop, till he forgot the names of the trees, and scarcely knew the difference between a duck and a goose but on table. He was a stout, manly, gallant, cheerful fellow, equally able to pitch a bar or to turn a versé to his mistress,—not a peaking or bloated plodder, eternally poking at his ledger, or perking up his nose behind the counter, to see what he could get, at every one who came in, like a rabbit in his box. But, Gentlemen, there are many of you who are now calling these things to mind; your present election is one of the best proofs of it; and I hope to see the day when London shall again be looked upon from the heights about it, as Florence or any other illustrious capital is,—not merely as a place of smoke, and noise, and anxiety, and money-getting, and comfort-losing, but as the residence of the truly generous as well as the rich, as the home of the accomplished merchant, as the birth-place of three out of four of the great masters of English poetry*, as the city renowned in history for its love of liberty and its valour in shewing it.

And you, Electors of Southwark, how nobly have you stepped aside from common-place habits and associations of trade, in choosing a man like Sir ROBERT WILSON! A general feeling has certainly revived in the world, that there is something greater and finer than the accustomed shapes of power;—intellect, like the spirit of heaven, has run over the stagnant waters; and it will breathe upon them, not violently, but deeply, till the world is restored to health. Mankind begin to feel their ties with each other again; and you, Electors, have been among the first to shew that your thoughts and affections are not merely local. Here is a gallant individual, eminent not for his hired services to this or that power, but for his chivalrous and unshackled earnestness in every cause he thought good;—he comes among you; and you acknowledge him as one of yourselves, nay, as your very Representative, not because his habits sympathised with your common ones, but because your minds and hearts, roused up by late events to look abroad upon the interests of your fellow-creatures, went forth as it were to meet and choose the first noble champion for the rights of the world, and he was the one that presented himself. A great deal has been said of Sir ROBERT's political inconstancy, and of his being a disappointed man. Gentlemen, his inconstancy consists in this, that he would not go all lengths with the inconstant. He was very sincere with them, and acted accordingly, whomever was concerned. He fought for the Allies while he thought them well-intentioned, perhaps lingered with them something longer; but he would not stand by their promise-breaking, and their petty persecutions; he would not see men kept in prisons, and women's hearts torn to pieces, because they had been of a different party from the successful one; neither would he scruple, when he found that he had trusted too confidently to allegations against an enemy, to shew that he did not think so ill of him as before, especially when he was no longer a triumphant enemy;—and it was for all this he got the ill-will of the small-minded persons whom he had helped to triumph over. So much for his inconstancy; and as to his disappointment, how is he disappointed, and of what? A man of his chivalrous turn of mind could hardly have hoped to please persons so unlike him, and he has obtained what such a man must love much better,—the applause and love of those who resemble him. Gentlemen, it is a singular and instructive fact in history, that men of his description never did succeed in any other way. They have been loved and admired by many of their contemporaries, and by all posterity; but they have been but askantly looked upon and timidly rewarded by courts. In fact, they do too much and too well; they are neither fitted for slaves, nor is common-place reward necessary to their glory. They can afford to do without kings and courts; and this is what kings and courts do not like. Remember the Chevalier BAYARD, "the knight without fear and without reproach,"—and the loyal champion to boot, who died fighting against rebels. He was nothing but a knight to the last; though it should be observed, in justice to Francis the First, that a knight was a greater personage then than now-a-days. Look at Sir SIDNEY SMITH, the first successful opponent of BONAPARTE, and the opponent also, it was understood, of all sorts of tyrannical pretensions. He is nothing but a knight still, and not even an English one. Sir PHILIP SYDNEY, one of the most amiable and noble of human intelligences, was not as much liked as he should have been by the higher powers. It was thought too great a thing for a private gentleman that he should be so admired by all the world, and much more that he should have been held worthy of being recommended as a candidate for the crown of Poland. Then Sir WALTER RALEIGH—remember him,—checked and interfered with by one sovereign, and regarded with notorious jealousy by another,—used nevertheless, laid aside and threatened, used again, never advanced, and finally put to death upon a despicable pretence to satisfy the resentment of a foreign power.

* It is curious that CHAUCER, SPENCER, and MILTON were all born in London. Their fathers must have been different men from the sorry Mammons of the present day.

Electors of London and Southwark, as one among multitudes of your admirers on this occasion, I offer you my hearty congratulations; and if I should have to offer them, in the name of my brother Reformers, to the Electors of Westminster also, the success which their newly rallied efforts now promise will most assuredly be partly owing to the example and inspiration of yours.

Your faithful servant,

THE EXAMINER.

GENERAL ELECTION.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

On Monday, at eleven, Sir Robert Wilson arrived in an open landau decorated with colours, and was loudly cheered; he stood up without his hat, although it rained heavily, and having alighted from his carriage, voted for Sir F. Burdett and Sir S. Romilly. He afterwards drove through the crowd, and shaped his course through King-street. The next object of attraction outside the hustings was one of a novel description—it was the exhibition of the portrait of an orang-outang, holding in his paws a green bag, sealed, and underneath the words, "Orang-Outang, a candidate for Westminster." This was meant to apply to Sir Murray Maxwell, who it will be recollected brought home in his ship an animal of this description. This was nailed up in front of one of the stands erected for the accommodation of spectators, directly opposite the hustings, and excited much laughter. There was a long address to the "Loyal Inhabitants of Westminster," nailed next to it, in which we suppose the orang-outang stated his pretensions to be returned as a representative of that respectable body; but it was written in such small characters, that we could not decipher it. It was dated "Exeter Change," and signed by the personage we have already described.

Where discoveries were made that persons voted for Sir Murray Maxwell, the groans and invectives with which they were assailed beggared all description. The Captain arrived before eleven, and was most ungraciously received.

The state of the poll at the close on Monday was—Sir S. Romilly, 1,879—Sir M. Maxwell, 1,126—Sir F. Burdett, 1,263—Mr. Hunt, 47.

Sir M. Maxwell was loaded with every kind of opprobrious epithet. A cut-of-nine-tails was flourished triumphantly near where he was standing, and he was saluted from all sides with "flogging rascal," "your face is like death," "you have no right to come forward here; Sir Francis Burdett and Sir Samuel Romilly are the men for us;" "where is Commodore Oliver?" "why don't you get Castles and Castleburgh?" He soon became all covered with every unseemly missile. His mouth was at last completely covered with mud. In this state he made a few observations. He said, he believed that no candidate had ever been used so ill as he. He had before ascribed it to exuberance of feeling; he did so still. Their hands and mouths were against him, but their hearts were with him. He had seen a letter from Sir F. Burdett, the same which they had seen. He agreed with them in considering it no honour to be elected, unless the election were free. Sir Francis Burdett could not approve of their conduct. (At this moment a scuffle arose.) As their attention was attracted elsewhere, he would take his leave of them. (The Captain then withdrew.)

Mr. BRUCE said he had to congratulate them on the glorious efforts they had that day made. Another day like that, and they should secure their triumph, and place the man who was called England's hope and Westminster's pride at the head of the poll. (Great applause.) He wished to read to them a letter of Sir Francis Burdett himself, as he was sure any thing that came from him would make a much greater impression than any speech from the individual before them. [Mr. Bruce then read the letter of Sir Francis, which we publish below.] If these simple and elegant words of their tried and illustrious friend Sir Francis Burdett were not sufficient to rouse all their zeal in favour of his cause, it was in vain to endeavour to persuade what line of conduct they ought to pursue. The question was, whether they would have for one of their members a man who would be the representative of tax-gatherers, of beadles, of the sweepings of parish vestries, and of all the public offices, or a man who had for 25 years been the upright and indefatigable defender of their rights, who had never swerved from his principles, never deviated from the course of persevering exertion for the public good. (Great applause.) He wished to expose the tricks of their adversaries. They had on the hustings an army of collectors of taxes, and when any person came to vote for Sir Murray Maxwell, they received his vote; but if any came for Sir Francis Burdett, their votes were instantly objected to. Besides that, there were many who had not paid their part of the rates and taxes; and the tax-gatherers had remitted their taxes to some of them, that they might vote for the Government Candidate; and the proud aristocrat of the country had used an undue influence with his tradesmen, and declared, that he would not continue their services if they would not vote for Sir Murray Maxwell. These were the arts that had been resorted to. Let every man consider himself the centre of his own circle; these circles would multiply, and feelings of liberty and independence would animate every quarter of Westminster. (Loud applause.)

Mr. WISHART observed that every man should exert himself that there should be chosen two honest, upright, and independent men for their representatives, and he had no doubt but their efforts would be finally crowned with complete success. In the name of Sir S. Romilly, he returned them many thanks for the support they had given.

Mr. CLEARY said, let them be firmly united and they would overcome every danger. Sir F. Burdett ought to be first; he should be at the head of the poll; he should give way to no man. Sir Samuel Romilly might be a respectable man, but he ought not to stand so high with them as Sir Francis; and till that illustrious man stood at the head of the poll, they would use every effort. That unpunished traitor to his unfortunate country had come with a plumper to Sir Murray Maxwell. That greatest traitor amongst them all had done all he could to rivet another chain to the yoke under which the people were already groaning. They should not promise their votes to any man till they had Sir Francis at the head of the poll. (Great applause.) By that he meant no disrespect to Sir S. Romilly; they all thought him a worthy and deserving man, but it would be an indelible disgrace not to place highest, almost the only man who had stood forward as the incorruptible friend and zealous defender of the people. (Loud and continued applause.)

Mr. HUNT said, that a great impression had been made that day in favour of Sir F. Burdett. He congratulated the people of Westminster that their spirit was not yet extinct. (Applause.) He had seen a letter written in reply to a request to Sir F. Burdett to show himself on the hustings. What could Sir Francis be afraid of? (Cries of "off, off," and "it won't do, Hunt.") He would never allow them to be deceived. (Off, off.) Mr. Hunt bowed and retired.

Mr. GALE JONES addressed them next, and the people then dispersed.

During the whole of Tuesday, the proceedings of the crowd were very similar to those of the day before. Parties of Sir Francis Burdett's friends paraded the streets, appeared at intervals before the hustings, and were received with loud applause. At the close of the poll the numbers declared were—For Sir S. Romilly, 2,546—Sir Francis Burdett, 2,171—Sir Murray Maxwell, 2,169—Mr. Hunt, 58.

The superiority of Sir Francis Burdett's numbers over Sir Murray Maxwell's was received by the crowd with prodigious cheers, which continued till Sir Murray Maxwell manifested a desire to address them. A young gentleman in a naval uniform, (the Hon. Mr. Legge, brother to Lord Dartmouth,) stepped forward, and attempted to speak, but the crowd would not hear him; and sooty rags and dirt were thrown at him in such a manner that he was obliged to retire.

Sir MURRAY MAXWELL said, that he perceived the tide of popular favour to be turned upon him. (A shower of dirt.) Those who were so conducting themselves did not hear what he was saying. To all Englishmen he thought it would have a favourable effect that he could stand fire and water; that he could so firmly bear all the treatment with which they received him. It had been mentioned that a gentleman connected with the administration had voted for him. He had come, however, entirely unsolicited on his part. Nobly and intrepidly he had appeared and voted for the man whom he considered deserving of his suffrage. He could assure the electors, that with that gentleman he had never even so much as exchanged words during his whole life. His flag was the union-jack of Old England; and there never was a greater moment than when that flag was triumphant over the Richardsons, the Bruces, the Sturges, and the Wilsons, of another country. Let them recollect the glories of their ancestors, the deeds performed by them at Poitiers, at Cressy, and at Agincourt, and remember how in later times the arms of their country had put to flight the blood-stained eagle of Imperial France; and then let them consider how they ought to treat those who would hold up to them such achievements, and stand forward their defenders. Yet there were people who would endeavour to obliterate all such things from their recollection. For what would they have them forget the Harries and the Edwards? Why, for the heroes of Spafelds and Palace-yard. After some other observations, Sir Murray withdrew. Through the whole of his speech the noise was so great that we could scarcely hear one sentence in connexion with another.

Mr. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD then stepped forward. The first duty, he said, that he had to perform, was, in the name of their independence, of their consistency, their character, and of their history for the last fifteen years, to congratulate them on the poll of that day, which had told the gallant Captain from China, that he had not to canvass the mandarins of the East, but an English, intelligent, free, and independent people, who named and elected the man in whom they could place confidence. (Applause.) Having discharged that duty, he hoped he should be permitted to say a little in favour of himself. His name appeared on the poll; he congratulated them that it had been withdrawn, because those who had placed it there had done it without his consent, and had without his consent withdrawn it; and on that he congratulated them, because he believed it was for their interest. He had gloried in seeing his name proposed to them without any canvass, merely on account of his coincidence in opinion with Sir Francis Burdett, and his belief that their cause was the only political cause the prosperity of which would ever produce any lasting benefit to the people—the Cause of Reform. (Great applause.) Neither the candidate from Lincoln's-inn, nor the candidate from China, had said one word about Reform. All that the latter had to tell them was, that he had fought; and he had done so, and had been paid for fighting. (Applause.) The former had made to them no declaration of principle, nor had he stated the grounds on which he founded his claim to become one of their representatives. To every private virtue he joined every public talent that any man could desire to possess, but he wanted a congeniality of opinion, firmness, and consistency, upon that subject, which had so dignified Sir Francis Burdett, and had procured for him the glorious appellations of the Pride of Westminster and the Hope of England. The candidates for their suffrages should state what reform it was that they would support; and till they did that, they should be thought unworthy of becoming their members. It had been said, that there was a coalition between Sir Francis Burdett and another candidate. There was no coalition. Coalition meant roguery. It signified a combination of private interests for the destruction of public good; a sacrifice of general advantage for private gratification. Sir Francis Burdett stood alone, and he cared not what the other candidates did. Those who supported the cause of Sir Francis asked for no vote but for him. That (holding up a card) was one of the proofs brought forward to prove the contrary; but he showed them by that (tearing it in pieces), that such proceedings were not sanctioned by the friends of Sir Francis. Sir Francis and his friends stood upon one principle, that of reforming the House of Commons, so that the people might be fairly represented. Let them then come forward and vote for him, and make him 5,000 a-head; and when they had done so, say to the other candidates—that was the way to rescue themselves from disgrace and from their pretensions. (Loud applause.)

Sir ROBERT WILSON said, that as an elector of Westminster, and the representative of the most important borough in the kingdom, he considered himself entitled to address them. (Applause.) As an Englishman more particularly he should take advantage of that opportunity to express his sentiments. The men of Southwark had made a glorious effort, they had grappled with corruption, prevailed against her exertions, and prostrated her power. (Applause.) Sir Samuel Romilly, one of their candidates, was a man who defended the oppressed against the oppressor, who was a firm friend of freedom, and he might say, who embraced

"—all the world, and reason, life, and sense
"In one blest system of benevolence."—(applause.)

Sir Samuel was the friend of reform. On Sir Robert Heron's motion for the repeal of the Septennial Act, in the minority would be found the name of Romilly. Was there any necessity, then, for his stating motives for Sir Samuel Romilly's becoming a candidate for Westminster? (Cries of no, no, from all parts, and great applause.) He hoped the electors of Westminster would not, like the foolish Greeks, get into the discussion of an abstract question, and as they did, lose their city. (Applause.)

Mr. WISHART said that himself and all his friends had voted for Sir Francis Burdett and Sir Samuel Romilly. Sir Samuel had voted for triennial Parliaments; and he had stood forward in so intrepid a manner in his opposition to the Crown Lawyers, as to deserve the support of the electors of an independent city like Westminster.

Mr. CLEARY congratulated the electors on the state of that day's poll. He had prophesied that result to their exertions, and he might express his confidence that Sir Francis would soon be above the other candidates. Till they placed him there, they had done nothing. (Applause.) They should have members who would stand up for a radical reform, and for universal freedom, and no less. (Applause.)

Mr. HUNT and Mr. JONES addressed the electors; after which the crowd dispersed.

On Wednesday, at the close of the poll, the numbers were:—Sir S. Romilly, 3,016—Sir F. Burdett, 2,792—Sir M. Maxwell, 2,598—Mr. Hunt, 69.

Mr. HUNT, the only candidate on the hustings, addressed the people; but the hisses, groans, and cries of "Off, off," rendered him inaudible for the most part. He said that the Ministers did not care who was in Parliament, provided he was out—for they knew what work he should make among them—he should be like the devil among the tailors.

Mr. D. KINNAIRD said, he wished to say a word in the cause of humanity. He had come from the bed of sickness, from the victim to the fary of an individual whose conduct they must regard with abhorrence. A British officer was of all others the last that should have been insulted or injured. ("What brought him among them?") He would answer the question put, for it was a wise one. He, too, asked "Why he had come among them?" But on whom should they bestow their indignation? He was sent by others. Let their indignation be pointed towards those who sent him. (Immense applause.) It was not against a British officer, but against the Government that they should direct their feelings. But, least of all should he be assaulted after he left the hustings; he became at that moment a private character; and it was not to his house, but to the doors of the treasury that they should carry their abhorrence. The bold and daring effrontery which had brought the Minister of the Crown, Lord Castlereagh, to those hustings, to support his system of prostitution in the face of the people, was the proper object of their disgust and indignation. (Great applause.) Even yet they felt strongly this insult; they ever would, he trusted, manifest an unconquerable reprobation against the system of despotism which he had brought from Ireland to this country. To Ireland he was now gone, and if public opinion and public feeling had free expression there, he would not soon return hither. (Shouts of applause.) The last moment he had been in London, he had come thither to insult them by voting for his own tool. (Applause.) It was this conduct that had insulted and injured Sir Murray Maxwell; and his friends, if they had spirit, would never forgive the injury thus done to him. He implored them, for God's sake, for their own sake, for the sake of the cause which they favoured, to regard Sir M. Maxwell with pity, and to hear him when he came before them, and afterwards to take the earliest opportunity of hurrying to poll for Sir Francis Burdett, in order to show their indignation against the foolish attempt made upon their liberties. (Applause.) The name of Burdett and Reform was the same thing. The lion of Westminster, that had been sleeping in the shade of retirement, was roused. Three steps had placed them above the Government. One step more would place them where they ought to be—at the head of the index of popular opinion. (Applause.) He was not a wild and desperate candidate for their favour. He was a tried friend of reform. He had not only spoken for reform; he had suffered for it. Solitary imprisonment he had exposed and made odious; and something like a system of humanity was introduced. Another victory gained by him was over the flogging system. He was confident that a substantial, a real, a radical reform, would soon become, like the abolition of solitary confinement and of flogging, not a theory, but a recorded fact in history. It might be thought extraordinary, that after he had been their representative for 15 years, it should be now necessary to canvass for Sir F. Burdett; but he thanked them for the opportunity. The aged faltered his good deeds; the tongue of the infant lisped his praise; many, with tears admired him; all expressed that he was the man, without whom they could not consider themselves represented. (Applause.) It had been his fate to have been introduced to their notice as the friend of Sir F. Burdett. Sir Francis himself, and their friends, never meant to make this friendship a ground of claim upon their favour. But they thought it an information, by means of which they could travel up to his character, since they must at once be satisfied that the friend of Sir F. Burdett could not be a bad private character. (Very great applause.) Let them look neither to the right nor to the left; if they wanted reform, they could think only of Sir F. Burdett. Let them not be accused of envious feelings in the moment of their triumph. The charge could only be made by those who were themselves so anxious to obtain votes, as to take them on any terms. He concluded by asking from them, what he had given himself, a plumper for Sir Francis Burdett. (Great applause.)

Mr. ELLIS took this opportunity to speak for Captain Maxwell. When Sir M. Maxwell should be well they should see him again before them. He would have proceeded, but the noise was so great, and the symptoms of a rising war so manifest, that he felt it prudent to withdraw.

Mr. WISHART attempted to speak for Sir S. Romilly, but he could not go on.

Mr. CLEARY would not congratulate them till Sir F. Burdett should be at the head of the poll; then he would congratulate them, himself, England, and reform. He expressed in the strongest terms his regret that Sir M. Maxwell should have fallen into the hands of ruffians, who could be connected with no political party; for their outrage could be calculated only for the reproach of any party with which they might be connected. (Applause.)—He made a bitter invective against Lord Castlereagh and his Irish despotism, and concluded a speech of great animation, by urging them to great activity for Sir Francis. (Applause.)

Mr. GALE JONES spoke at some length in favour of Mr. Hunt.

On Thursday, about half-past three, as a party were coming up to vote for Sir Francis, with a band of music and colours in the usual style, at Richardson's Coffee-house they were met by a party armed with large bludgeons, said to be friends of Sir M. Maxwell; these latter rushed in between the band and the voters, and prevented them from proceeding. At the close of the poll, the numbers were—Romilly, 3362—Burdett, 3140—Maxwell, 2898—Hunt, 73.

Before the poll was exhibited,

Mr. RICHARDSON entreated that they should hear all parties. Their enemies would thank them for any violence. Pickpockets alone could have committed the outrages that had been committed; and they were against all pickpockets, whether there or in the State. (Applause.)

A Gentleman, who sat on the front seat of the opposite hustings, called out for some one to speak in favour of that amiable character, Lord Castlereagh. Is there none to speak for Castlereagh, Reynolds, Oliver, and Co.? (Loud applause.) I am ready to speak or vote for Sir F. Burdett. (Three cheers.)

Mr. ELLIS said, he came to declare a message from Sir M. Maxwell. Neither Sir F. Burdett, nor Sir S. Romilly, could refrain from reprobating the outrage upon Sir M. Maxwell's person. (Applause.) He was persuaded that there was not one among them who did not disapprove of the outrage which had occasioned his illness. (Very general and loud applause.) He was convinced that even the very man who had struck him must now repent of his conduct. Indeed he was sure that he was not an Englishman. (Immense applause.) What offence had Sir M. Maxwell committed? (Great confusion and hisses.) He had come forward at the request of several most respectable electors, to be candidate for the representation of Westminster; for this he had been treated with great insult and undeserved violence. (Hisses.) He now alluded to the naval officer—judgment and discretion, an honest and upright heart—but the uproar became so vehement that we could hear no more. When silence was again obtained, he said, that it would be a melancholy day when men of rank could not be asked to exercise their elective franchise. (Great uproar.) The most respectable citizens had voted for Sir M. Maxwell. (Much hissing.) He had only further to add, that the moment of his recovery would be the moment of his return as one of their representatives. (Cries of "Never, never.")

Mr. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD said, however kindly disposed he believed them to be to listen to him, he hardly knew how to discharge his duty. The sight of a constable's staff among the mob, introduced too, as he thought, unnecessarily, deprived him of the power of addressing them as he could wish. (Applause, mixed with the cry from Mr. Hunt and his friends of, "Whom do you call a mob?") He would tell them what he meant by the expression. A mob, as he understood the word, meant nothing more than a great collection of individuals; he was proud to consider himself as one of them, and he would add, that a mob had achieved a greater victory in the cause of freedom than all the persons in court dresses in Europe. (Loud applause.) Was it, even supposing that the term was wrong, from the quarter whence the criticism proceeded, that they ought to take their notions of politeness of Nation? (A laugh.) Sir Murray Maxwell was now on a sick bed, and this fact guaranteed his character from the charge of being concerned in the foul insinuations which had been circulated, he would not say by his own friends, but certainly by their enemies. These insinuations were conveyed in placards, which stated that assassination had been attempted. Did those who made such an assertion understand their own language, or had they forgotten it in their voyage to the east? If they were truly sensible of the meaning of the word, they would know that it was descriptive of a crime which did not belong to the character of Englishmen. (Applause.) Assassination necessarily implied secrecy both of design and execution; it was not perpetrated in open day, or in the face of assembled multitudes. The success of the cause was progressive, but its friends were sometimes too confident as to the result, and played with their own interest. They waited to march up in bodies, instead of coming to the poll without a moment's delay. He should not have obtruded himself that day on their notice, had it not been for the absence of Mr. Bruce, a gentleman who deserved all the admiration which was due to generosity of heart, to constancy of principle, and to fortitude under misfortune. (Applause.)

Mr. STURGEON, having several times had the honour of proposing Sir F. Burdett, felt it impossible to restrain himself from congratulating them on the glorious events of the last three days. An Hon. Gentleman had told them, that if all the candidates had been there, Sir M. Maxwell would have been heard without insult. He joined in regretting that Sir M. Maxwell was not present, and heard with patience by all of them. But he had spoken to them by advertisements. An advertisement had appeared under his name, and there was one thing in it, which, if meant for a joke, was a very bad joke; if serious, could not fail to excite a laugh by its absurdity. He said, he had been "engaged in a glorious cause." (Laughter.) What was this glorious cause? Was it not the cause of those who had taken away the liberties of the people by suspending the Habeas Corpus, and exposed every man to arbitrary imprisonment at the pleasure of the Minister? (Great applause.) Sir M. Maxwell was engaged, and, he doubted not, heartily, in the cause of Lord Castlereagh and Co. (Applause.) Sir M. Maxwell was said to have come forward in order to "restore the ancient independence of the city of Westminster." He was old enough to know something of the independence of Westminster. It was but three months short of 50 years since he had taken an interest in the politics of Westminster. At the time he first knew its situation, and long after, it was as completely dependent on the Court and two great families, those of Northumberland and Newcastle, as any rotten borough in the kingdom. (Immense applause.) The result of the poll proved that they could maintain their independence without Sir M. Maxwell's assistance. (Applause.) It had been his intention to speak little, especially after the excellent things that had been addressed to them by an Hon. Gentleman; but one thing he had to say, that they should exert themselves as if they were in a minority, and that every one should vote for their beloved candidate, till he should be at the head of the poll. (Applause.)

Mr. WISHART, as one of Sir S. Romilly's friends, expressed his hope, that the cause of independence would triumph, by their votes placing two honest candidates at the head of the poll. Their late excellent representative ought to be at the head. (Applause.) He hoped they would persevere till corruption was put down.

Mr. HUNT came forward, but was obliged to stand silent for a long time, in consequence of the uproar of disapprobation. He had a higher object in view than to stand high on the poll; he had come there to watch the proceedings, and to record to his countrymen the events which took place. (Cries of Oliver, Hunt, and Co. and Where is your wife?)—Mr. Hunt turned towards the hustings, and cried out, "Let some friend of mine go and learn that scoundrel's name."—(This occasioned a great tumult within the hustings; Mr. Hunt rushed in, and remained there for some minutes; when he returned he was heard with more attention.) The cowardly scoundrel had been protected in the High Bailiff's box. Was that fair play? He would not even give him his name, but he knew his person, and he had seen him active every day of the poll, as the friend of Sir F. Burdett. After the election they would soon be convinced that what was done there was of little effect. He cared not which of the three candidates were returned. He had before told them that no good could arise from what was done in the House of Commons. Their forefathers had fought for their liberties, and the day would soon come when they must turn out and fight for their liberties. (Great confusion, and loud cries of "off, off.") He would stand there till the last moment, unless his life were taken. He would speak on while they protected him. Without their protection, no man was safe. He had asked no man's vote, and yet upwards of sixty had manfully come forward and voted for him.

Mr. GALE JONES followed, as the advocate of Mr. Hunt.

On Friday, a few fresh placards were held up for the respective candidates. Those for Sir Murray Maxwell were generally invitations to the electors to subscribe not only to defray the expenses of the election, but also of a scrutiny. A placard against Mr. Hunt was posted up, and received with continued laughter:—"Q. Why is Hunt like a louse?—A. Because he is a disgrace to the poll."—Sir F. Burdett's friends had posted up a placard, expressing their detestation of the outrage committed on Sir M. Maxwell, and containing the following recommendation:—"Electors—Give Sir M. Maxwell a patient hearing—give Sir M. Maxwell your pity;—but give Sir F. Burdett your votes."

At the conclusion of the poll the numbers were as follow:—Sir S. Romilly, 3,655—Sir F. Burdett, 3,333—Sir M. Maxwell, 3,146—H. Hunt, Esq. 73.—Mr. Hunt did not poll one this day.

Mr. ELLIS then came forward, declaring that his object was to represent the state of Sir M. Maxwell's health, which he deeply regretted to say was not materially improved. For many years the practice of the electors of Westminster had been to select one of their representatives from the naval profession. (Cries of, "They were of different principles.") They might also depend on Sir Murray Maxwell appearing in person before them as soon as he was able, and on his persevering in the contest to the last. — (Loud disapprobation.)

Mr. BRUCE stated that the present state of the poll was ominous of success; that day might be considered as their weakest. (Applause.) To-morrow they would, however, resume their former strength, and on Monday advance with such superior numbers to the poll as would necessarily decide the contest. (Cries of no, no, from Sir M. Maxwell's friends.) They would then see their illustrious favourite Sir F. Burdett placed where he ought to have long since been, at the head of the poll. In alluding to the last Parliament, he should candidly state to them his own opinion of it; and that was, that a more corrupt or infamous Parliament had never disgraced the history of this country. (Applause and hissing.) It had followed up the close of long and sanguinary wars, in the course of which 500,000,000 of the public money had been spent in pulling down the Bourbons, and about as much in setting them up again, by treating every Petition for economy and retrenchment with contempt, and by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. They had invaded one by one every right and liberty of the people, even the liberty of the press itself, justly regarded as the palladium of them all. Had there existed any necessity for these proceedings? or was not their only cause to be found in that general and glowing enthusiasm for reform, by which all ranks were beginning to be animated, and which Government thought its only safety consisted in extinguishing? (Applause.) Then commenced the system of employing spies and informers, with whom a British Minister, Lord Sidmouth, was not ashamed to associate himself, whose object was to incite the people to rebellion, in order to justify the tyrannical measures of their masters. (Applause.) Many innocent men were immured in dungeons; and a few expiated, he would not say their crimes, but their imprudence, on a gibbet. It had been the language of that illustrious statesman, Mr. Fox, when similar measures were adopted on a former occasion, that such measures ought to be resisted; that resistance was not a matter of duty, but of prudence, under such circumstances. The punishment which had been inflicted on a few miserable individuals ought rather to have fallen on the heads of Lords Sidmouth and Castlereagh. (Applause). The cases of those individuals had been treated with the most indecent ridicule by a Minister of the Crown—he ought perhaps to say, by the Merry-Andrew of the House of Commons. This should never be forgotten, but if possible a starling should be taught to repeat the expression of “the revered and ruptured Ogden” continually in the public ear. (Applause). He congratulated them on the certainty that their cause would be victorious, if they did not stop short in their exertions. That victory they would then have achieved over all the influence of Government, the arts of the aristocracy, and the deceits of churchmen. Royalty and smooth-faced courtiers would have been defeated, and that sort of spirit manifested which had led to every thing that was great and glorious in the national character. (Applause).

Mr. WISHART expressed his hope that they would to-morrow succeed in putting an end to the Election, by the triumphant return of Sir S. Romilly and Sir F. Burdett.

The Hon. Mr. BENNETT was received with loud approbation. He was accompanied by the Marquis of Tavistock, Mr. W. Smith, and several other Members. Although it was the first time of his coming on those Hustings, his heart had been throughout the Election with them. Having carried his own Election in another part of the country, he now came voluntarily forward, in aid of the cause of Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir Francis Burdett. (Applause).—He should be ashamed of Westminster, of which he was an Elector, if they could be so lost to all sense of their own interest and duty, as to return a Court Candidate, after the experience of the last 20 years. With regard to Sir S. Romilly, no man was ever turned from his door on account of his inability to pay for the assistance of Counsel. His whole life had been engaged in supporting the rights, the liberties, and the properties of the people. He had fought side by side with Sir Francis Burdett, always forming one in his minorities, however small. They would recollect that they had two Representatives to elect, and all he asked of them was, to bestow that honour on one who had so well entitled himself to it by an active, honourable, and useful life. (Applause).

Mr. D. KINNAIRD was surprised that the Hon. Gentleman had, in enumerating Sir S. Romilly's services, omitted to say a single word upon what ought alone to interest them in the conduct of that election—he meant with respect to his opinion on Parliamentary Reform. (Cries of, “They are well known.”) If they knew it well, he wished them joy, but he had not been able to discover it. He was sure, however, that his cause had been insulted by the support of Sir M. Maxwell's friends. (Cries of, “he can't help that.”)—If such votes had not been counted, they were at least very unfortunate for the cause of Sir F. Burdett. No fewer than 1700 votes had been split between them. They would not do their duty, if, seeing this, they did not place their illustrious favourite, Sir F. Burdett, high at the head of the poll. (Applause).—Unless they did so, and for this purpose it was necessary to give plumpers, they would soon hear it asserted that the cause of Reform was no longer popular in Westminster. After some further remarks, Mr. Kinnaird alluded to an outrage committed by a person named Caleb Baldwin against one of the friends of Sir Francis Burdett, in consequence of which he had that day procured his arrest. He appealed to Sir M. Maxwell's Committee, whether their advertisements were not grossly injurious, in charging the friends of Sir F. Burdett with being the instigators of such disorders. These insinuations must now recoil upon themselves; and indeed all the lamentable occurrences might be ascribed to the endeavours of Government to carry the Election against the sentiments of the public, and to the undue influence exercised against the free suffrages of the Electors.

Mr. BENNETT, in explanation, said, that Sir S. Romilly had voted in support of every motion for reform last Parliament, with the exception of the last, brought forward by Sir F. Burdett, in which he found it impossible to concur.

Mr. HUNT made a few observations, during which there was much clamour.

At the breaking up of the meeting, as Mr. Hunt's vehicle was dragged along by his friends, some of the foremost fell down; those next to them were unable to stop from the violent impulse communicated from behind, and thus the landau was driven over several persons. One had his leg broken, another his skull fractured, and others were seriously hurt.

REQUISITION TO SIR FRANCIS BURDETT, AND HIS ANSWER.

LETTER ADDRESSED TO SIR FRANCIS BURDETT BY A NUMEROUS BODY OF THE ELECTORS OF WESTMINSTER.

Westminster, June 20.

SIR,—We, the undersigned, electors of Westminster, feeling the utmost anxiety for the success of the cause of reform, and having no doubt that the same feeling is common to us and the great majority of our brother electors, consider it to be our bounden duty to address you on the present occasion, and to represent to you that the support which is given to each other by the two factions which have so long oppressed the state, together with the unfortunate disunion which has arisen amongst some of the best friends of reform, have placed us in circumstances of peculiar difficulty.

You have, on all occasions, used your utmost exertions to defend the rights and liberties of the people of England: the whole nation has confidence in your character and integrity, and we are deeply impressed with the opinion that your return to Parliament is of the utmost importance to the interests of the whole people.

We are happy to inform you, that the differences which had arisen amongst ourselves are at an end, and that all our efforts are now united in support of the cause of which you have so long been the ardent and faithful leader; but the exertions of our enemies have given them advantages which will require extraordinary exertions on our part to counteract; and in order that success may be ensured, we are most anxious to have your personal assistance.

You, Sir, in the modern times of corruption first raised a public voice in England. It began in Westminster, and soon spread over the whole country. That voice, the honest fruits of your honourable and courageous labours, the factions have united to destroy, even in the cradle which gave it birth; and now it is in the heat of the contest, and amidst difficulties and dangers never before contended with, that we earnestly and respectfully call upon you to lend your powerful aid, not for the purpose of securing your own seat, which we know to be a matter of indifference to you, any otherwise than as it is connected with the public cause; but to secure the expression of public opinion, in the only place where it can be expressed, and where it certainly will be expressed, in the moment that you are seen as the guardian and supporter of it.

The enemies of the cause have calumniated you, by stating that you had deserted the people—that you would refuse to serve them, even if called upon to do so. We entreat you, Sir, to contradict these statements—to appear personally upon the Hustings, and let the world see that you are the same friend of liberty, the same ardent supporter of popular rights, which we have always known you to be.

We ask you, not for your sake, or for our own, but for the sake of that cause, the success of which can alone secure the happiness of the people of England.

We have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,

Sir, your most obedient servants,

(Signed by a very numerous body of Electors.)
To Sir Francis Burdett, Bart.

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT'S ANSWER.

Saturday Evening, June 20.

GENTLEMEN,—My esteem for the understanding and independence of the Electors of Westminster, and the grateful sense I entertain of their handsome conduct towards me on every occasion, make it my duty as well as my inclination to use every exertion in my power, at all times, to serve them: but highly as I estimate my duty towards them, and anxious as I am to fulfil it, there is still a higher duty to perform towards myself, and which, if neglected, would be alike prejudicial to us both, as it would strip me of all personal consideration, and therefore of all means of discharging my debt of gratitude to them.

This first duty, the foundation of every other, is self-respect: it can only be preserved by fair and honourable dealing, and consistency of conduct: to offer it a sacrifice, together with public principles, on the altar of expediency, in order to obtain a seat in the House of Commons, would be a wretched and mistaken method of attempting to advance the public cause.

I am free to confess, that upon every occasion like the present, whether as a candidate, or proposed without being a candidate, my object has been not to find a seat, but a public: my endeavours have been used to rouse that public, to give it an opportunity of displaying itself in its fairest light; to show virtue her own image, for the purpose of securing the esteem of the wise and good, thereby advancing in the most irresistible manner the public claim to universal freedom.

I am not aware of any selfish motive, either of avarice, vanity, or ambition, having ever tainted my mind in this pursuit. The patriotism, spirit, and intelligence of the Citizens of Westminster, have long presented to the creatures of corruption an object that "seared their eye-balls;" they started at it "like a guilty thing upon a fearful summons." Such was the effect produced by your spontaneous and spirited exertions, unparalleled before in the history of elections. It was the grand and imposing spectacle of a people who knew their rights, and knowing, were resolute to obtain them.

The reverse of this picture would be a sad spectacle to exhibit to the eye of an expecting world: if, however, the people of Westminster are unequal to the task of sustaining the noble attitude they have taken—if it is but a semblance of patriotism and virtue that has been assumed, I am the most unfit person upon earth, by any compromise of those principles and professions upon which we have so long acted, to strive to uphold a cheat. If a mask, as is continually hinted at in the public prints, has been worn, I am desirous that it should be made evident to all the world that it has not been worn by me; and in my opinion, by whomsoever worn, the sooner it falls off the better.

If there are those who, ignoble by nature, have nevertheless put on the lion's hide only, "doff it for shame, and hang a calf's skin on those recreant limbs." The great question now at issue in Westminster, is not whether this or that individual should be returned; therefore, I say nothing of any candidate; but whether reform, or no reform, shall take place; whether, as far as the citizens of Westminster are concerned, corruption and despotism shall be countenanced, or the rights and liberties of the people of England restored. The important point is to prove, not the influence of any individual, of any name, or the effects of any personal exertions, still less of any electioneering tricks or cajolings, but the force of principles; to prove the people of Westminster at least superior to the former, and equal to the latter; to throw in the great weight of example, preaching practically, more eloquently "than angels trumpet-tongued" in support of the public cause.

These, and not indolence, nor luke-warmness, nor want of due respect towards the Citizens of Westminster, have been the motives (and I trust they are fair and honest ones) of my conduct: nor can I now repent it, or be induced, though so urgently pressed by those whose requests would, in ordinary cases, operate as commands, to change it, for the sake of obtaining, by inconsistency of conduct and compromise of principle, so paltry an object as a mere seat in the House of Corruption. A seat in the House of Commons has no value in my eyes, but inasmuch as it can be made conducive to the recovery of the People's Rights. How far any man's being placed therein is a matter of any importance, it is now your province to judge: should you think it of any, you will perform your easy duty, by walking to the poll, and electing for your representative whomsoever you confide in.

As to myself, whether in or out of Parliament, I shall at all times be ready, zealously to co-operate with my fellow-citizens of Westminster, and the rest of my countrymen, for the purpose of checking that system of fiscal spoliation and political corruption, which takes his due reward from the poor, his inheritance from the rich, and liberty from all; and must finally terminate in the establishment of despotic power. It is against this formidable enemy we have buckled on our armour, and I trust we shall keep our "harness on our backs," until we have obtained the people's inalienable rights, recovered their fair and reasonable share of the Government, the appointment of their own guardians in a House of Commons freely and constitutionally chosen by themselves. More than this they ought not to demand—with less they cannot be satisfied.

I remain, Gentlemen,

Your very grateful and very obedient humble servant,

(Signed)

FRANCIS BURDETT.

To the Electors of Westminster, in answer to the Requisition, &c.

CITY OF LONDON.

Tuesday being the last day of the election, every part of the Hall was crowded to excess. The polling was carried on with great rapidity; and from the opening, Alderman Thorp began to gain lost on Sir William Curtis. About half-past 11 o'clock it was announced that he was again a head of Sir William. This intelligence was received with loud cheers. At one the majority, 42, was carried round the table on a poll, appended to the following inscription:—"I AM VERY WELL CONTENT WITH THINGS AS THEY ARE."—Extract from Sir W. Curtis's speech on Reform. This was received with loud huzzas, and cries from the crowd of, "Bilby, how do you like it?"—"All over, Bilby."—"You must get Dr. Stop (alias Dr. Stoddart) to write your epitaph." About two Sir W. Curtis withdrew from the hustings, acknowledging that he was beaten. At the final close of the poll, the following were the numbers:—

Alderman Wood, 5715—Mr. Wilson, 4846—Mr. Waithman, 4617—Alderman Thorp, 4349—Sir William Curtis, 4239—Alderman Atkins, 1693.

Mr. Alderman Wood, on the numbers being put up, addressed the Livery. He need not tell them that this was a most glorious day for the people. What a change in public opinion had they not now seen? Their cause had that day fully triumphed. He did not say this with the view of exulting over those gentlemen who had lost their election, but on public grounds. The Livery had placed him precisely as he at first imagined they would—at the head of the poll. He had been told before the election that he should not be returned; but he knew that they would do their duty; and, therefore, felt it to be impossible they should neglect a man who had done his. (Applause.) He hoped they would watch his votes in the new Parliament, and in doing so he was confident that they would not find cause to complain of his neglect of duty. He concluded by expressing his heart-felt thanks to his friends and the Livery, for whose support he should ever cherish esteem and gratitude.

Mr. Wilson was not able to find expressions by which he could thank them, but was determined to show his gratitude more by deeds than by words. He should be extremely happy to agree with them on all questions; but when he stated that he came forward on the principles of real independence, he must claim the right of judging for himself whether he ought to support or oppose Ministers. He would pledge himself, however, that he would never vote in servility to their will. If he should not do all the Livery wished, he hoped they would attribute his failure to error in judgment, or to want of ability, but not to want of integrity.

Mr. Waithman observed, they had that day witnessed the greatest triumph ever obtained by the Livery of London, or by any other public body of Englishmen. It was true that the contest had been most arduous. Some of their late representatives had been considered so strong as to be invulnerable to every attack, and therefore the Livery had long been deterred from undertaking any contest against them; and when it was recollected that the men they opposed had been for a series of years the supporters of Ministers, and had been in the habit of receiving and distributing favours, which was of itself alone sufficient to give them extraordinary influence, it was really astonishing that the independent part of the Livery should have been able to stand up successfully against so powerful a phalanx. But when all other means failed, the Livery had a lesson read to them by persons who took upon themselves to give them advice. They had now, however, given these persons a salutary lesson in their turn, and they would be cautious how they insulted the Livery in future. In fact, they had by their exertions on that day overturned the great Goliath. (Loud cheering.) They now once more had possession of their own independence, and he trusted they would assume a dignified attitude, and never again suffer their rights to be encroached upon. This was not a triumph over the feelings of individuals, but a victory gained in the cause of truth, justice, and freedom. It would be his endeavour to represent the opinions and feelings to which he should always consider himself bound to conform, when they were expressed by them legally assembled for that purpose. (Loud applause.) The Livery had seen their own rights, and the rights of their countrymen, suspended, and their Petitions disregarded; they had seen secret committees appointed by Ministers, upon the reports of which the liberties of the country were voted away; they had again seen committees appointed by Ministers, and their partisans, recommend a Bill of Indemnity for those Ministers, and all the spies and informers they employed; and finally they had seen that recommendation adopted without any inquiry. These, and such things as these, had wrought on the feelings of the people, and had at last roused them to stand up against all the power and influence he had described. It was under this view, that in proportion as the individual who had been their instrument in the contest was insignificant, their victory was rendered, in the same proportion, of the greater magnitude. (Loud applause.)

Mr. Alderman Thorp observed, that in Parliament he would endeavour to redeem the pledge he had given the Livery, not by words but by acts. They would find him always at his post. He would watch over the rights and privileges of the City, as well as endeavour to do his duty by a vigilant attention to the general interests of the country. He was sensible that he had been supported by the Livery, not on his own individual merits, but from their attachment to principles.

Here the business ended, and the crowd dispersed.—For the last three hours the crowd outside Guildhall exceeded any that we ever recollect to have seen collected there. As soon as the tide appeared to have set decidedly in favour of Alderman Thorp, they all appeared in the highest good-humour, nor was there from that moment till their final dispersion, the least symptom of violent triumph. While, however, the matter was in doubt, especially at the critical period when the difference between Curtis and Thorp amounted to not more than half a dozen, the impatience of the populace broke out into some partial extravagancies; they tore in pieces the placards, and broke asunder the poles which were carried about in favour of Sir William Curtis. When, at about a quarter before four, the final state of the poll was announced, an universal shout of joy rent the air, but soon subsided into a quiet satisfaction. The candidates then left the hall, and were severally received with the most animating cheers.—Mr. Alderman Wood went first. His horses were taken out from his carriage, and he was slowly drawn along through the crowded streets, and proceeded to his house in South Audley-street.—Mr. Alderman Thorp was the second. He was drawn along in the same manner, and took the direction of St. Paul's and Ludgate-hill. Mr. Waithman went third. He was conveyed in the same style of popular exultation, and was several times almost pulled out of his open carriage by the exceeding eagerness of the passers-by to shake hands with him.—Mr. Wilson, who had taken a different direction, had no reason to complain of the partiality of the populace.—As an instance of the quiet disposition of the people, it may be mentioned, that thousands of well-dressed women were abroad in the very thick of the crowd without the slightest inconvenience. The shutting of the shops, the fineness of the day, the gay clothing of many, and the good humour of all the spectators, gave the scene the appearance of a general holiday.

On Thursday, a Common Hall was held for the purpose of the return of the Members being stated, &c. The numbers, which had been subject to the usual scrutiny, were stated as follows, which will be seen to differ a little from the first announcement:—For Mr. Alderman Wood, 5,700—Mr. Wilson, 4,829—Mr. Waithman, 4,603—Mr. Alderman Thorp, 4,335—Mr. Alderman Curtis, 4,224—Mr. Alderman Atkins, 1,688.—[It is a curious coincidence, that the numbers of Alderman Atkins mark the year of the revolution.]

The first four were then declared duly elected. They all returned thanks.—Thanks to the Sheriffs for their conduct during the election, were then voted.—The whole number which polled on the election was 7,978.

SOUTHWARK ELECTION.

On Monday, when the multitude assembled as usual, about 10, it was announced that Mr. Barclay had declined, and that consequently Mr. Calvert and Sir Robert Wilson were chosen as the Representatives of the Borough. The most enthusiastic applause followed this announcement.

Mr. CALVERT expressed his deep sense of gratitude for the proud situation in which he was placed. He then adverted to the Mint votes, which were now allowed to be good, although an attempt had been made, not by Mr. C. Barclay, but by Mr. Florence Young (the magistrate) to disfranchise them. It was right the saddle should be laid on the right horse, and he conceived Mr. Florence Young had, by this attempt, destroyed all his influence in St. George's, where he would never, on another canvass, attempt to appear again. He concluded by assurances of pursuing the same course of conduct which had obtained him the honour he now enjoyed.

Sir R. WILSON then addressed the electors: his feelings were so agitated by various emotions, that he was quite unnerved, and more disposed to shed tears than make a speech. He was overpowered almost as much as he had once seen a veteran French grenadier, on the retreat from Moscow, who was sitting with other comrades over the embers of a burning hovel, and surrounded by dead bodies of men and horses. Some of this wretched band were employed in picking and eating the flesh off the back of a corpse, half consumed. Sir R. Wilson, exhausted by fatigue, hunger, and cold, was obliged to stop, and whilst stopping, a Russian soldier gave him a piece of bread. The veteran, whose eyes were glazed with death, threw a wistfulness into them that was irresistible, and Sir R. Wilson gave him the bread. He seized it, and was about to devour it, when he placed his hand to his heart, as if checked by some agony, and at last articulated, "I cannot brave it; I was prepared for any thing but so much kindness." In a moment he fell, and his troubles ceased for ever.—He was not afraid of maintaining the principles he had professed. There he could command his conduct; but he was fearful expectation might be too highly raised, as to his ability to support the cause; still he trusted that the love of country with which he glowed, and the spirit of liberty which animated him, would rouse those powers which had in all times enabled the defenders of freedom to encounter its adversaries. He should go to the House of Commons without any personal interest; and he would never suffer a sense of private wrongs to prejudice the public welfare. He would also carry there no attachment which would divert him from the cause he conceived to be most beneficial to the public. He had esteemed friends amongst public men, who, notwithstanding calumny, were entitled to public confidence by their virtues; but his connexion with them was no restraint on his independence; and his ties of regard were not shackles of bondage. He had always held the same language to them as he had held on the hustings. He was a friend to the King and Constitution; but whilst he did not wish to encroach on the executive and aristocracy, he professed himself to be the champion of the popular interests. He should discriminate between licentiousness and liberty—subordination and servitude; but as servitude was the obedience of a broken spirit and abject mind, wanting its own free will, he would never submit to it, and he was sure the electors would support him in that determination. Every elector who had voted for him might say—

"Thy spirit, Independence, let me share,

"Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye;

"Thy form I'll follow with my bosom bare,

"Nor heed the storm which scowls along the sky."

He did not know what good he could do in the House of Commons; but he would always protest against any wrong he could not prevent, and claim every right, although he could not recover it; that, in short, he would act in concert with his colleague, who had proved his fidelity. He again declared he would resign his seat whenever it was wished, and assist the return of a successor agreeable to the majority; that he should ever consider himself but a servant during pleasure. He concluded by thanking those electors who had been unavoidably prevented from coming to the poll, but who had assisted him by their good wishes; and whilst he felt confident that the children of those electors who had polled would refer to the poll-books as memoirs of their fathers' honour and disinterested patriotism, he hoped they would never refer to them as proofs of a confidence unworthily bestowed.

Mr. HALL adverted to the merits of the electors and their representatives. In the course of this speech, he alluded to the contest in Westminster, recommending support to be given to Sir S. Romilly and Sir F. Burdett, which recommendation was unanimously cheered. The poll was then closed.

Sir R. Wilson was then followed from the hustings to Westminster by an immense multitude of applauding friends.

MIDDLESEX ELECTION.

BRENTFORD, FRIDAY, JUNE 26.—The sheriffs arrived a few minutes before ten, and took their station in the hustings, constructed for a contested election, and the business of the day immediately commenced. The concourse of people was very great. Just as the necessary preliminaries were reading, the crowd became most vociferous in abuse of Mr. Mellish. They at last called so pertinaciously for his appearance, that he felt it necessary to present himself. In return he received such a volley of abuse, as induced him instinctively to withdraw himself from view. "Why don't you show us the Corn Bill, the Suspension Bill, the Indemnity Bill, as proofs of your character?" was the mode of catechising adopted on the occasion. The previous formalities being finished,

Mr. WHITBREAD (when his name was announced, it was received with the most enthusiastic applause) spoke to this effect:—"Gentlemen, electors, and freeholders of Middlesex, we are assembled to exercise one of the noblest privileges of Englishmen. It is evident that the duty we have to perform ought not to be performed lightly, for our dearest interests are at stake. (Applause.) In making the selection of gentlemen to represent us in Parliament, we have to look for men of honest, free, and independent principles, who will not forsake their duty for any selfish motives. (Great applause.) I felt diffident—young and unknown as I am—to address you on this occasion; I rely, however, upon my name, to which I know I owe the reception which you have given me (shouts of applause), and come before you to propose one for your election whose name speaks for itself. (Applause.) When I propose George Byng, Esq. I need not say that your interests are safe in his hands. (Great applause.) For eight and twenty years his honour, integrity, and independent conduct have been under your observation; he has been ever watchful of your interests; and he never will forget his constituents to serve himself. (Loud applause.) I should not have spoken so decidedly, if I did not know that Mr. Byng was most highly valued by one whom duty, affection, and principle compel me to honour and love. For 30 years Mr. Byng went hand-in-hand with my father, in the cause of civil and religious liberty. (Great applause.) a cause which he never can forsake but with his existence." (Immense applause.)

Mr. TRAPAUD felt great pleasure in seconding the proposal of a man, whom they knew and approved.

Mr. WOOD said, with their indulgence, he came to nominate William Mellish, Esq. to be one of their representatives (the yell here set up was furious in the extreme: when the uproar seemed inextinguishable without special interposition, Mr. Sheriff Desanges came forward, and called upon the electors to hear every body and decide afterwards, not to decide in the first place; but all was in vain; the din increased, and "Hoo, off, off," made the air ring again.) He nominated (vociferating with his utmost might) William Mellish, Esq. to represent this great county in Parliament.

Mr. IRVING seconded his nomination.

Mr. CLARKE said, he had to thank them for the distinguished honour of having so much as bestowed a thought upon him as a fit person to represent this great county. (Applause.) Reform had seemed so elated with what she had done with the election of Wood, Waithman, and Thorp (Bravo, bravo, bravo,) and with the triumph which she was about to obtain in Westminster, by the election of her favourite child and champion, Sir Francis Burdett (Great applause); she seemed so elated with these triumphs, that in a frolic, in a playful mood, she said, "Let us make the experiment to elect poor, humble, honest Tom Clarke for Middlesex." (Immense applause.) He could only now thank them for their intention towards him. (Cries of "Offer yourself.") He should now say something of the two candidates proposed. Mr. Mellish was what they called a thick and thin man for Government. ("Most true.") He was afraid he must also say, that he was a thick and thin man against the people. (Great applause.) Mr. Byng belonged to what they might perhaps call one of the great factions, or parties (for he would use no hard names) in the state; he belonged to the great political denomination called the Whigs of England. The Whigs had not acted so well as he could wish (applause), but he wished that every gentleman in England were not only a Whig, but such a Whig as Mr. Byng. They, the reformers, wanted not so much a reform of, as a reform in, the House of Commons. The Whigs would be content if they could oust their opponents from the Treasury Bench. They, reformers, were at issue with them on that point. He agreed with the great and illustrious Jacobin of former times, the Right Hon. William Pitt, that "No Minister could do any good, and that no honest man could continue Minister, without a reform." (Shouts of applause.)

Mr. BYNG and Mr. MELLISH were now declared to be duly elected.

Mr. BYNG said that, let who will be Minister, if he should ever sacrifice their interests to his own dirty ambition, he should expect and deserve their execration; but while he conscientiously performed his duty, he was sure to live, not only in their voices, but in their hearts. He had only further to thank them most cordially for their votes and suffrages. (Loud and unanimous applause.)

Mr. MELLISH requested to be heard. (A tremendous vociferation of every term of dislike.)—His conduct had been vilified; he knew his friends approved of his conduct, but he wished to make a few explanations. (A great uproar.)—He had never had a contract in his life from Government. He had acted from conscience, and feared not to be asked any questions.—The confusion and uproar was vehement during the whole time of Mr. Mellish's address.

The return was then announced: at Mellish's name the crowd vociferated "No, no." At the end of Brentford, next London, a large party of boys and girls arrayed themselves on both sides of the street, armed with large quantities of mud, and most plentifully bespattered all who wore the light blue riband (Mr. Mellish's badge) with mud. Several gentlemen had their hats, coats, and faces much disfigured. The knowledge of this difficult pass having been communicated to those friends of Mr. Mellish who yet remained in Brentford, the colours were speedily changed, and many of them were heard to cry out eagerly (in self-defence), "Byng for ever."

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JUNE 28.

It is now confidently repeated, day by day, that the Allied Sovereigns are to meet at Aix-La-Chapelle,—to settle of course some more destinies, and see what is to be done in order to keep every thing but their promises. Even the pettier Kings, who were not admitted to the last meeting, are now, it is said, to go. There is so awful an interval of silence in France before the departure of the Allied troops,—the Court of Spain is so poor and at such variance with it's restorers,—Portugal is in such a strange colonial situation,—Italy and Saxony so discontented,—Europe in general so much so,—and America so flourishing and contemptuous in the North, and so likely to follow and spread the example in the South,—that, it is supposed, a general muster of the opposite interests of the few cannot but take place. Several places however have been announced and given up again before this; and it is possible that the eyes of Aix-La-Chapelle may not wink with the lustre of their Majesties' divine-right faces, especially as it is discovered that the city has been much beautified and adorned with public walks by NAPOLEON, and that he is a great favourite with the senseless inhabitants, who have the grossness not to prefer their former want of accommodation.

Nothing farther has transpired respecting the alleged visit of the sailor at St. Helena; but a natural question has been started,—whether this report is to precede some further magnanimous resolutions at the Congress. BONAPARTE is now said not to have given up exercise altogether, but to confine it to the precincts of his house, and to the earliest time of daylight. This early rising, more than any thing else, will enable him to do without a wider range. It is perhaps the readiest begetter of health and spirits, of any recipe in the philosophical materia medica; though in an over artificial system of life, like that of society at present, so many things conspire to render it difficult, at least as a regular practice. Dr. JOHNSON was making resolutions to get up early to the last part of his life; and THOMSON, who cries out in his poems,

“Falsely luxurious! will not man awake,”— not only seldom got up before noon, but is said to have given as a reason that he had “no motive.” Both of these excellent persons were rendered inert, no doubt, by bad humours of body, which the practice would have done away with; and doubtless all might return to much more natural habits than are in use, if the majority would think at all, and the rest would not think too much to baffle action itself. BONAPARTE's talent lies on the side of action, and therefore he goes to it at once. A Scottish King, JAMES the 1st, who was prisoner in this country (fairly kidnapped when young by his brother legitimate), attributes the alteration of his feelings from wretchedness into comfort to this sole practice. The passage is in a beautiful poem he wrote in his captivity, called The King's Quair or Book:—

“O happy early exercise,

“By thee came I to joy out of torment.”

He afterwards made one of the best and most accomplished sovereigns in the annals of royalty.

The Westminster Election has taken a new and glorious turn. BURDETT, freed from the accompaniment of a Candidate with whose zeal and talents the Electors had not become sufficiently acquainted, suddenly shot above his court antagonist, and remains next in the poll to Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY. Had he made his appearance on the hustings, there is no doubt he would have been equally above Sir SAMUEL. The government papers, which said at first that they would rather see Sir SAMUEL elected of the two, now affect to think that the open “absurdities” of Sir FRANCIS would be less mischievous. The truth is, they have been prodigiously angry with each of them, according as one or the other seemed likely to oust the Court Candidate; and now they fall upon both, and accuse them of absolutely hiring people to pelt and beat Sir MURRAY MAXWELL. A word or two of plain speaking on this unfortunate subject. The Courier, with an instinctive knowledge of the possible cause of these outrages, called their perpetrators “poor deluded men,” but having neither the wisdom nor the temper to stick to this, it afterwards denounced them as wretches and ruffians, and every thing that was vile. Now we have some right to arbitrate on this subject, because we never vindicated any species of violence in itself, against whatsoever party directed; which is a thing that these expostulating and horrified Gentlemen cannot easily shew for their own parts. We say then,—let them do one of two things;—either let them bring forth the offenders, and enquire into the causes of their conduct,—or let them confess in the mean time what may be the possible extenuation of it, as well as the probable atrociousness. Is the question always to be begged against offenders among the people, and no indignation—no names of wretch and of ruffian to be bestowed upon the possessors of power? The person or persons that struck Sir MURRAY MAXWELL may be very vile and ruffianly,—but they also may be what the Courier at first called them, “deluded men,” or rather “poor deluded men,” in the common extenuating sense of the terms. The person who hit him the blow on the temple, for instance, may be, and perhaps is, a common ruffian,—a miserable wretch in the worst sense of miserable,—vicious and fierce, ready for any violence and mischief that comes uppermost. If he is also a hireling, he is still worse; though who but the Courier supposes Sir FRANCIS BURDETT and Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY capable of hiring ruffians to way-lay their oponents? and what does this opinion say for the Courier itself? But the assailant of Sir MURRAY may, in times like the present, be a wretched half starved individual, unable to get work enough to support his family, or himself;—he may be one, hurt by the times, hurt by the Government, hurt by its emissaries, hurt by the taxes that go to add superfluity to wealth, hurt by hard masters connected with power, hurt by the sight of extravagant gorgeousness and possessions, hurt by the barbarous taunts of the time-serving, hurt by wars, hurt by campaigns, hurt by the sight of gross and unfeeling corruption, hurt in body and health, hurt in mind and spirits, hurt to his heart's core, which bleeds drop by drop every day, and leaves his cheek lank, and his brain half bewildered. He may be such a man;—and this man, standing in a hot irritating crowd, with the representative of that system to which he attributes all his misery raised conspicuously before him, may, for the first time in his life, feel power in his hands; and not having had temper enough left in his blood, or sense in his brain, to know how to use it, he may be suddenly and desperately impelled, when the other comes near him, to collect all the force of his misery into his unhappy hand, and dash it at his head.

We can say, with equal sincerity, that we are sorry for Sir MURRAY MAXWELL. His courage and apparent good temper deserve a better situation to shew them in; and what a situation have his employers got him into, when even this good temper is rendered equivocal,—when necessity usurps the place of its forbearance, and awkwardness of its dignity! We wish to Heaven, for his own sake, that he were a thousand miles off, on his proper element, with the salt water, instead of his fellow-creatures, spitting in his face. It would be better for himself, for his employers, for the Reformers, for every body, friend or foe,—unless indeed he met a foe in his way.

We have spoken of the London and Southwark elections in another place. We omitted however to allude to a scandalous trick which was attempted to be played off against Mr. WATTHMAN, when the Corruptionists were threatened with his success. It was a charge against him of having suffered his own mother to be in want;—a very shocking one certainly, and which, if substantiated, might reasonably have injured his pretensions to legislate in the cause of his fellow-creatures. He utterly denied it however, and dared his accuser to come forward;—nobody came, and it recoiled on the conscience of the inventor. Since this circumstance, we have heard an anecdote of Mr. WATTHMAN, from a quarter totally unconnected with him, which we are happy to relate. A Gentleman happened to meet some time ago with a relation of Mr. WATTHMAN's, who was in some difficulties, and who abstained from applying to him, from a feeling that his applications had already been numerous. The Gentleman, however, much to his honour, measuring the propriety of another application by the real necessity of it, and the good conduct of the necessitous person, went himself to Mr. WATTHMAN; and the latter, after stating that he was not so wealthy as was supposed, but that he would still do what he could, took a little time to enquire into the matter, and on a second interview gave his kinsman, in addition to former sums, a hundred pounds. This is not like a man who would, or could, neglect his own mother.

We have too much reason to believe that charges of this nature, thrown into the teeth of a man who stands opposed to inhumanity and trickery in general, are made with the greatest impudence and hypocrisy by those who most deserve such accusations themselves. It is, unfortunately in one sense, not possible to charge ourselves with any neglect of a parent; but as a specimen of the calumnies directed against those who engage the worldly by differing with them, and who will practise neither their want of charity towards others nor their gross and exclusive indulgence towards themselves, we lay before our readers the following extraordinary accusations. We do not know whether our contempt of their falsity would have allowed us to do this had they been mentioned to us in a different style; but we think we can perceive that the writer of the letter on the subject is really a well-wisher, and we will give an answer to a single honest and kind person; which we might deny to thousands of malignant accusers and unconscious flatterers, like the Quarterly Reviewers,—miserable gabblers behind walls,—who take care at once to accuse and to exempt,—to endeavour to injure, and to save themselves from the consequences of their falsehood. Our Correspondent, after saying that the Editor of this paper must be astonished—but he had better publish the whole letter at once.

Sir,—If your character really is such as the readers of the Examiner imagine it to be, (and that is the only source from whence I can form a judgment), you must certainly require a key to understand the illiberal attack that is made upon you in the last number of the Quarterly Review: and to enable you to do so, I inform you that report speaks of you as a perfect tyrant in your family, and your wife as the most abject of your slaves. (Of course not a willing one), that you are so entirely devoted to the gratification of your passions, and so completely given up to sensuality, that no female of your acquaintance is secure from your addresses, for not any ties are considered by you as sacred, if they come in contact with your inclination; and that a sister of Mrs. Hunt's resides with you, who is the mother of at least one child, of which you are the father. When I heard this account, my first thought was to send it to you instantly, in order that I might judge, by the notice you took of it, whether it was true: my second, dismissed it altogether, as a vile fabrication; nor has it ever occurred to my memory since, till I read the article in the Quarterly, where the writer so evidently accuses you of these things, which, if you are innocent of, you certainly cannot comprehend his meaning, that in justice I have been induced to send you every information in my power to enable you to repel and prove his accusation false. In the hope that you can, and will do so, I remain your sincere

WELLWISHER.

An assailant of all the women that came in his way! A tyrant to his wife! And the father of children by her sister!—Really, the Editor of this paper never knew his prodigious effect on the bigotted and the worldly-minded till now! He was prepared for, and has borne a good deal of calumny, both real and imaginary, in differing with them; and he has always let it run silently from off him, like rain from a bird's wings. He must give the present shower a shake,—if it is only to oblige his well-wisher. He says then, that the whole of these charges are most malignantly and ridiculously false, so as to make those who are in habits of intercourse with him alternately give way to indignation and laughter. He knows several ladies whom he respects, and admires, and even (with permission of poor GIFFARD) likes to see happy; but he believes they are no more afraid of him than of the light at their windows; and as to being a tyrant to his wife, and the father of nieces and nephews,—whatever may be the charity of his opinions, the charge is really a little too ludicrously uncharitable towards them, under all circumstances. He looks at his wife, and his family, and shakes his shoulders and their own with laughing,—which by the way is rather an insidious custom of his. It might as well be said of him, that he had Mr. GIFFARD's temper, or used his grandmother's shin-bone for a switch.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

At the close of the poll yesterday, the numbers stood thus:—

Romilly	- - - - -	3789
Burdett	- - - - -	3513
Maxwell	- - - - -	3361
Hunt	- - - - -	74

When the poll was declared, Mr. ELLIS (we believe) stepped forward, and spoke some time in favour of Sir M. MAXWELL; but the interruptions were so frequent, and the noise so great, that we could collect nothing that he said.

Mr. STURCH made a brief and sensible speech. Alluding to the state of the poll, he remarked, that Sir F. Burdett's friends had not been able to attend to-day in numbers. This was the last day in the week, when those who chiefly voted for the worthy Baronet (the middle class, who had more patriotism and more virtue than either of the other) were necessarily engaged in their private concerns. He knew this, for he had himself canvassed many that morning; and they assured him they would come up on Monday for their best friend. And then (said Mr. Sturch), whatever hopes Sir Murray Maxwell's friends may have entertained, they will be totally dissipated.—(Applause.)—Some of the Electors had stated their difficulties as to whom they should give their votes. He advised all who wanted information, just to look upon which side Lord Castlereagh voted, and then to give their voices to those who had voted exactly the other way—and they were sure to be right.—(Much applause.)—He himself had voted for Sir F. Burdett and

Sir S. Romilly; and he advised them all to do the same. Sir M. Maxwell was sent by Castlereagh and Co. and he admitted that he wanted no Reform, but Sir Samuel had been a friend to it these 30 years. Vote, therefore, for their former beloved Representative and Sir Samuel.—(Great applause.)

Mr. CLEARY said, the poll books showed that many of the Ministerialists voted for the Court Candidate and Sir Samuel Romilly—the friends of radical Reform therefore should give their votes to Sir Francis, as they were in fact combatting two to one, as it were. He had no distaste to Sir Samuel, but it was the peculiar duty of the Reformers to place Sir Francis at the head of the poll.—(Much applause.)—Mr. Cleary then entered on various statements relative to some charge brought against him and the Westminster Committee by Mr. Hunt—but we could not well hear what he said—nor could we collect Mr. Hunt's reply, the noise was so great.—We understand, however, that Mr. Cleary challenged Mr. Hunt to fight—which the latter declined.—Mr. G. JONES followed at some length in Mr. H.'s behalf.

THE HON. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD.

The following is a copy of the letter sent by the Electors of Westminster to this intrepid and patriotic individual:—

Committee Room, Piazza Coffee House, June 20, 1818.

SIR—We the undersigned Electors of Westminster, in notifying to you that it has been judged expedient to withdraw your name from the poll, think ourselves bound to convey to you, at the same time, our sense of the highly distinguished and generous conduct which has marked the whole of your intercourse with us, from the day of your nomination to the last communication which has passed between you and the Committee appointed for the conduct of your election.

We feel it to be our duty to express our unfeigned regrets, that circumstances which it was impossible to foresee, or to counteract, have deprived us of the support, both to ourselves and to the great cause of REFORM, which we hoped would be obtained by returning you as the Colleague of Sir Francis Burdett, for Westminster.

We feel it to be equally our duty to assure you, that we fully appreciate the magnanimity with which you stated, at once, your opinions on the great subject of Reform, without any of those reserves and subterfuges, which are the selfish resource of less courageous politicians.

We must confess our obligations to you for the generous offer of sacrificing your own nomination to the general advantage of the Cause, a sacrifice which shews that we were not mistaken in selecting you for a Representative, who would at any time forego his private gratification to advance the public good.—We have the honour to remain, Sir, your very obedient servants,

*(Signed by a body of between four and five hundred Electors.)
To the Hon. Douglas Kinnaird.*

TO THE ELECTORS OF WESTMINSTER.

Who is Sir MURRAY MAXWELL? He is the Government Candidate. That is enough to determine your choice. A Government Candidate to represent the people is a contradiction in terms. Will this Government Candidate say as you say? No. Will he think as you think? No. Will he act as you feel to be right? No: but he will say what the Minister says; will think as the Minister thinks; will approve what the Minister does; and if you give him your votes, he will vote with the Minister against you, in every instance whatever. If you want a fit person not to represent you in Parliament, choose Sir MURRAY.—Look at this Government-Candidate, this Sir MURRAY MAXWELL. Lord CASTLEREAGH might as well have sent a stuffed figure with a suit of regimentals to the hustings as a Candidate. Do you suppose, that a person like this, who depends for all he is and all he is to be on the Crown, has any eyes to see with but what the Government lend him, any ears to hear with but what they allow him; that he has a heart to feel your interests, or a tongue to vindicate your rights, any more than a puppet-show figure? Will you have a Government automaton to represent you,—a thing to be turned and wound as the Minister pleases? Give him your purses to take care of, and he will hand them over to the Ministers, to take care of for you: trust him with your rights and liberties, and you will hear no more of them—but you will hear that this Captain Sir MURRAY MAXWELL, for this piece of good service done the Minister, in conveying away your rights, and stifling your opinions, is made Lord Admiral MAXWELL—a right honourable Lord. That is what he aims at. It is your business to prevent him. If your object in choosing a representative is the same as his in being chosen, to deprive yourselves of a voice in Parliament—if you wish to prostitute the character, the spirit, the independence and freedom of the City of Westminster, as stepping-stones for the Government Candidate to walk over to the height of Government honours, raise him to the head of the poll with plumpers—otherwise, not another vote! You had better at once make over your elective franchise to Lord CASTLEREAGH, that he may carry it about with him in his pocket, as your proxy.

The issue of the present contest will serve to shew how much venality, sinister influence, bullying and wheedling, cowardice and want of public principle there is in Westminster; how much trimming, pettifoggery, cant about character, and saving of appearances; how much common sense and common honesty.

A WESTMINSTER ELECTOR.

The National Intelligencer, noticing advices from St. Helena, mentions that BONAPARTE, on receiving intelligence of the death of the Princess CHARLOTTE, was overwhelmed with grief, as he calculated that, on her ascending the throne, he should be released. It is added, that he had in consequence closeted himself a long time.

On the return of Sir MURRAY from the Hustings on Tuesday evening, he and his friends were assailed by execrations, and about half way between the Hustings and the Committee-room, at RICHARDSON'S hotel, he was struck by a stone on the chest: just on reaching the house, he received a second blow on the left side of the head near the temple: after this, he was supported into the house, when being completely exhausted he was put to bed, and he was obliged to receive the attentions of the medical gentlemen. His Committee have issued a placard respecting the assault, offering a reward of 100 guineas for the apprehension of the man who struck him. The following is their description of him:—"A tall athletic man, about six feet high, apparently a blacksmith, from his face being blacked by smoke and dirt; short black curled hair, and dark eyes; he struck Sir MURRAY MAXWELL on the left temple, about three yards from the west end of the Piazza."

For these two days past circulars have been issued by the Superintendent of the Board of Works to all the Government tradesmen, to vote for Sir Murray Maxwell alone.—Evening paper.

A Correspondent says,—"Should your Boa Constrictor Correspondent favour the public with any more anecdotes, I would advise him to relate possibilities, and not of Serpents "arriving in England on board the ship Alceste, under the command of Capt. Sir M. MAXWELL," when the said ship was lost in the Indian Seas." The Boa Constrictor and the Ourang-Outang belonged to a Merchant at Java, (consequently never could be on board the Alceste), who paid for their passage to England on board the Cæsar, in which ship Capt. WESTMORLAND.—On Tuesday next, the grand struggle will commence between the aristocratical and popular parties. Mr. BROUGHAM made his second entry into Kendal on Saturday evening, and was received by many thousand people; whom he addressed at great length: the enthusiasm of the people in his cause is indescribable. He canvassed Kendal on Monday, and his success, we are assured, even exceeded the expectations of his friends.

LIVERPOOL.—CANNING, 1654; GASCOYNE, 1444; SEFTON, 1280.—CANNING and GASCOYNE are returned.

NOTTINGHAM, THURSDAY.—BIRCH, 2146—RANCLIFFE, 1782—SMITH, 1757.

Mr. HARVEY has gained his election for Colchester; Mr. WILDMAN is his Colleague.

Mr. W. SMITH and Mr. RICHARD GURNEY were on Wednesday week returned for Norwich; Mr. HARBORD having retired from the contest.

The contest for Carlisle terminated on Saturday week, when Mr. CURWEN and Sir JAS. GRAHAM were declared duly elected. Mr. CURWEN and Mr. PARKINS were however the candidates who were chaired. Should the charge of bribery be established, Mr. PARKINS will yet be the sitting member.—The following is the final state of the poll: J. C. CURWEN 250—Sir J. GRAHAM, Bart. 225—J. W. PARKINS, Esq. 49.

LORD C. S. CHURCHILL'S LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

The Right Hon. Charles Spencer Churchill, commonly called Lord Charles Spencer Churchill, a son of the Duke of Marlborough, has thought proper to commence various actions against the Newspapers, for having, in their account of the late calamitous accident in the King's-road, attributed it to the hard driving of this young Gentleman. This is their offence, and such is the mode adopted by his Lordship to clear himself from the charge!

His renowned Ancestor, as our readers well know, took a different method to distinguish himself. He did indeed commence many actions, but then they were public and glorious ones; and he obtained large damages, which, we venture to predict, will not be this young Gentleman's fortune. Our King's Bench Hero, too, differs with the Conqueror at Blenheim in this—that whereas the victorious fighter's practice was to bring his enemies at once to close quarters, while, on the contrary, our legal combatant prefers following the discreet example of Mr. Aeres, who delighted to bring his opponents down "at a long shot:"—for it appears that three out of four of the Newspapers selected for punishment have been served with processes, which cannot be noticed even for these five months.

There are some indeed who attribute these lively proceedings to the General Election. This young Gentleman most graciously offered to represent the good people of St. Albans in the next Parliament; and a contest arose—for some of the Electors were of opinion, that a wiser person could have been found for the office. Now, at such a crisis, to be charged with being unable to guide a tilbury, when his Lordship wished to be deemed capable of assisting to conduct the vehicle of the state, was a very fearful thing. Then again, how could the Electors be expected to raise their voices in favour of a young Gentleman, whose name had reached them only in ugly connexion with "Hard-driving" anecdotes and details of "Accidents and Offences?" The matter therefore must have a different turn given to it; and, above all, the press must be silenced for a time.

All this is possible; but others are inclined to suspect, that his Lordship does not happen to be blessed with a discreet adviser; and they imagine that he may have therefore consulted his groom on this occasion; or peradventure, in the confusion of the moment, may have resorted to some amateur lawyer or wrangling Marquis. However this may be, the young Gentleman, it is clear, has followed very shallow counsels; for he may rest satisfied, that in the end he will obtain nothing from the law but a Solicitor's bill of at least a yard long,—(to us a fearful object)—and probably the loss of a Seat in the House of Commons; which Seat, as his Lordship's Noble Father may have informed him, possesses, among other advantages of a more dignified nature, this peculiar one, that it shields its Honourable Holder from all arrests for debt.

Whatever trifling errors may have crept into the newspaper reports of the accident, this, we are informed, will be proved to have been the fact—that his Lordship was not, as he affirms, driving at a moderate pace, but that it was his immoderate course, and his wanton determination to pass Mr. Tooke's chaise, which was moving gently before his Lordship's tilbury, that caused the accident, and occasioned the Death of Miss Sherwin. Upon Mr. Tooke's chaise being overthrown, this unfortunate Lady got entangled in the reins, when she was dragged nearly 200 yards—the consequence was, that her body was frightfully lacerated, and her head was absolutely beaten to pieces!

As for the Lawyers' artful talk about accusing his Lordship of the crime of murder—which of the newspapers said anything of the sort? Who could suppose that any human being would sally forth with a determination to occasion the death of an entire stranger? No; what he is charged with is this: that owing to his impetuous driving, one Lady has been much terrified; a Gentleman has been a good deal hurt; and a third individual, Miss Sherwin, has lost her life under the most shocking circumstances. And now, instead of appearing touched and softened by the catastrophe, his Lordship assumes a threatening attitude, and even seems inclined, by bringing actions for damages, to turn the fatal occurrence to good account!—Really, the whole business, as it strikes us, is of a very disgusting description, and one which, we cannot but believe, when his Lordship arrives at years of discretion, he will look back upon with mortification and sorrow.

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

33, Virgin and Child—COREGGIO. Earl of CARLISLE Proprietor.—We select this smallest picture in the Gallery, though it is much decayed in colour, because it elucidates in a great measure the beautiful principle, which made its inventor the head of a great class in painting, and because its painter is, in our judgment, the next greatest named in the Gallery Catalogue after M. ANGELO and RAFFAELLE, whose Cartoons here have been so feelingly described in the Examiner by Mr. HAYDON. He is so, because to this beautiful invention he adds an additional fervour of poetical conception, shines in expression, is sometimes grand, always graceful, and adorns his invention, his conceptions, his grandeur and grace, with the charm of a bright, an unsurpassed, and fascinating colour, accumulating a larger portion of what is praiseworthy, than any of the other Painters. The beautiful principle which chiefly gave COREGGIO an unapproached superiority over his great predecessors and successors, was harmony of chiaro-scuro, "the medium," says the poetical Professor of Painting, FUSELI, in speaking of COREGGIO, "which by breadth of gradation unites two opposite principles, the coalition of light and darkness by imperceptible transition. The bland central light of a globe, imperceptibly gliding through lucid demi-tints into rich reflected shades, composes the spell of COREGGIO, and affects us with the soft emotions of a delicious dream." This renders his performances more particularly charming in youthful objects, like the one before us, because here it is of the very essence and element of their character. This, in connection with his winding line of beauty, his countenances of cordiality and innocence, looking from finely proportioned features, and the roseated and lilyed freshness of health, almost makes us doubt whether we do not prefer his to the more refined females of RAFFAELLE himself, because their beauty and health and look altogether are more of our own flesh and blood species, though of an exquisite and choice kind, and consequently our feelings sympathise more with them. RAFFAELLE's, for the most part, have rectitude of look, which is rather that of the soul incapable of defect than of frail mortality. His flesh is, in comparison, untouchy, impalpable; CORREGGIO's is such as we see in sprightly, robust, handsome young people. RAFFAELLE's are of a more spiritual, CORREGGIO's of a more earthly character. The one, were they actual, would inspire the profoundest esteem; the other the passion of love. We should be placidly happy with the former, from their greater purity of nature; vivaciously existent with the latter, from their sprightliness and animal spirits. We should in fine admire RAFFAELLE's most as of a higher description, as his genius in fact is higher; but we suspect that we should be better pleased with CORREGGIO's, as more in accordance with our own mixed physical and incorporeal natures,—

“Connexion exquisite of distant worlds.”

Perhaps there are fewer genuine CORREGGIO's in England than of any other Old Master, but the neat and free pencilling in The Virgin and Child, the style of the forms, and the Painter's broadly-told principle of light and shade, hardly raise a doubt of its genuineness. Compared to this principle, the sudden sparkle in the vigorous, richly-coloured, and contiguously-placed picture by GEORGIONE, of Gaston de Foix, 38, is, according to the keenly-discerning eye of Mr. FUSELI, “a flash of discordant abruptness” (but what an interesting flash) and the “effects of L. DA VINCI little more than the dying ray of evening.”

COURT OF CHANCERY.

TEMPEST v. ORD.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that this was a matter which came before him upon two Petitions; one by Lord Stewart, praying that the Report of the Master might be confirmed; and the other by Mrs. Taylor, praying that the Report might not be confirmed. This Report had found that it was a fit and proper marriage, and the question was not whether it was an eligible marriage, but whether it was fit and proper. His Lordship, after some recapitulatory observations, proceeded to state the four objections to the Report, and answered them in their order. With respect to the first objection, Mrs. Taylor stated, that the age of Lord Stewart was 40 and that of her niece 18, and that his habits were dissipated and irregular, and ill suited to promote the happiness of domestic life.—He should not enter into an examination of the reasoning in the Report, as to the advantage of a young lady having a husband of mature age; for his own part he could not think disparity of age was any recommendation. Although it did not follow, that because a man was 40 years of age, that he was therefore of mature judgment, yet it seemed a fair inference of the Master, that Lord Stewart, having spent his life in the attainment of every honour that every country in Europe could confer on him, was entitled to be looked upon as a person who had well conducted himself, and as a man of sound judgment and high character. The second objection was with respect to Lord Stewart's having a son, who might intercept the honours of the family. If this was a marriage on which the affections of the lady were engaged, was he to say, merely because her son could not have a British peerage, that therefore it was an improper marriage? On this point, therefore, he was not justified in saying that the Master's Report was erroneous. He now came to the 3d objection, that regarding character. It was stated by Mrs. Taylor, that “his disposition and habits are dissipated and irregular, and are very ill suited to promote the happiness of domestic life.” In answer to this accusation, Lord Stewart pledged himself upon his oath that the whole was fallacious, and challenged the whole world to state a single fact upon which such an assertion could be founded. If character was to be attacked by anonymous witnesses, and no opportunity was given to meet that attack, there was no safety for any individual in existence. He could not, therefore, as a just man, as a father, or as a judge, lay stress enough upon this allegation to act upon it as a good objection. The next objection is, that hereditary diseases exist in many parts of the family, and particularly of the mind. The only instances of the nature alluded to are two. Lady Caroline Wood, by extremely bad management in child-birth, I believe by bathing in the sea, had her mind affected by a temporary derangement. That it was a temporary derangement only, I understand from the evidence given before the Master. The other instance, and upon which evidence has been given before the Master, is that Lady Londonderry in 1788, now nearly 40 years ago, was afflicted by a derangement; whether temporary or hereditary was a question in dispute. Certain it is, she was deranged; but that is also accounted for precisely in the same manner as the last case. Lord Stewart had made affidavits upon this part of the case also, and had mentioned the Noble Lord who had been alluded to by Mrs. Taylor in her statement of facts. He was confident no man of honour would have made that affidavit, if he had any doubt as to what the opinion of that Noble Lord was. There was, in addition, this very strong fact, that this intercourse had ended in the union of the son of the Noble Lord with a lady of the family of Lord Stewart, (we understood this to allude to a marriage which had lately taken place between Mr. Law, son of Lord Ellenborough, and a sister of Lord Castlereagh.) When he considered that a mother had given her consent, who was also one of the guardians, he could not forget the transaction of the spring of 1816; and he must weigh the value of that consent, regard being had to that circumstance, and to the other circumstances connected with the case. Mrs. Taylor had repeated that it was a plan and concert between Lady Antrim and Lord Stewart, and other persons, to get possession of the fortune of Lady Frances; and circumstances did certainly appear in this business which it is incumbent on Lady Antrim to account for. He had read the papers on this subject over and over again, and he was of opinion, that although Lady Antrim did intend to make an union between her daughter and Lord Stewart, yet the latter was not implicated in the transaction, excepting in so far that he should have thought it would have been better if the proposal had not been quite so hastily made, and if Mrs. Taylor's opinion had been asked before the offer had been given. This was the general view he had taken of this subject, but there were still some points, with reference to which he wished to avail himself of a few hours' consideration. Whether he should or should not direct further inquiries to be made, he had not yet determined. He should think it incumbent, to have another private interview with Lady Frances Vane Tempest, to state all the objections that had been made with all the force with which they had been stated to him; and he should call upon her to consider these objections, with such assistance as he could give the young lady by the reflections he might make upon them, in order to ascertain her final inclinations. All he could say in conclusion was this, that he had been influenced neither by favour or affection, excepting that which belonged to an honest man, and an honest judge; if he had erred, he had the satisfaction of knowing that there was an opportunity of having that error set right in another tribunal; at least he hoped he should not be accused of wilful error. To-morrow or Wednesday, therefore, he would let the parties know what he should further order upon the subject.

Wednesday, June 24.

TEMPEST v. ORD.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, at ten o'clock, sent for the agents on both sides into his room, and explained to them the difficulties under which he laboured respecting some of the points. He conceived it would be better for him to postpone judgment for a short time, in order to give them an opportunity of stating farther information; for he felt it impossible in the present state of the case to give a judgment at all satisfactory to his own mind. This was agreed to by the Solicitors; and his Lordship, on coming into Court, said to Mr. Hart, “I have put into the hands of the agents on both sides, the points which I think should be enquired into. That is all that I can possibly do in this case at present.”—Judgment postponed.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Monday, June 22.

JOHN YOLLAND v. W. J. CLEMENTS.

This was an action for a libel published in the Observer newspaper of April. The pleas were, not guilty, and a justification, that the alleged libel was a true account of what passed in the Insolvent Debtors' Court.

Mr. SCARLETT observed, that the libel in question was one of the most false and malicious attacks that had ever been made upon a private individual. It purported to be a correct account of what had passed in one of our public Courts, and this pretence rendered it infinitely more injurious. Faithful reports of proceedings were of great benefit to the public; but unfaithful and garbled statements were equally injurious. The plaintiff had been for 30 years steward to the Earl of Morley (late Lord Boringdon.) In 1803, his Lordship purchased a large tract of land, and a part of it consisted of a farm occupied by a person named Curswell. Curswell was in arrears, and he was selling his stock and disposing of his corn: it became, therefore, the duty of his steward, to take steps to secure the interest of his employer, and as Curswell had made off, he had the good fortune to succeed in arresting him. After various proceedings, Curswell transferred himself to the King's Bench, and applied for his discharge in the Court over which Mr. Sergeant Romington presides. A question there arose respecting the certificate of the party, and a part of the libel referred to this circumstance: in short, on the face of it, any person not present would have supposed that the plaintiff had been there proved to be one of the most oppressive and atrocious characters that had ever appeared, and that he had used this unfortunate farmer with the most persevering cruelty. The fact, however, was far otherwise. The whole proceeding in the Insolvent Court, as reported by the defendant, was garbled and false; matters were inserted that never occurred, additions were made to the speeches of Counsel on one side, while the addresses and evidence on the other were wholly omitted or misrepresented.

Mr. James Boys had attended the Insolvent Debtors' Court: he did not consider the libel as a faithful report of what passed; a great deal was omitted, and it seemed entirely an ex parte statement. The whole was exaggerated.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH here intimated that the justification had been falsified. The proprietors of newspapers were at least bound to be impartial; but here it seemed clear, that important points had been omitted, and others inserted merely as volunteers.

Mr. GURNEY said, that he should be able to prove that the account given was faithful.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH.—Mr. Gurney, when you have got the length of showing (if you do get that length) that what your client has stated is what actually occurred, you will still have to obtain for your justification the sanction of a larger Court than has yet decided the point, that that justification is good, and that you are therefore discharged from all responsibility. I know what is the opinion upon this point of a great number of individuals, but I have no difficulty in stating my dissent. If what is false or calumnious passes in a court of justice, the proprietor of a newspaper cannot claim exemption from liability, because it did actually occur; if he injure the fame of any man by his publication, he is responsible.

Mr. John Hughes could state that the account in the Observer was not impartial or correct.

Mr. GURNEY, for the defendant, insisted that what was now charged as a libel was a fair and accurate statement, without exaggeration, and if that were the case, the justification was made out. If the Jury should be satisfied that the alleged libel contained nothing but a fair relation of what passed, their verdict would be in his favour.

Mr. Edward Edmonds gave a report of the proceedings to the Observer; the alleged libel was printed from his statement; it was a true and faithful account. Some part of this proceeding the witness had taken in short-hand. He might have seen Mr. Heath's brief before he wrote the account: it was not uncommon for gentlemen in the Insolvent Court to show their briefs to persons attending to take notes: most likely he had had possession of Mr. Heath's brief—he could not state positively—he certainly never took the brief out of Court—he had had it in Court.

Samuel Emery had been present, and saw the Observer afterwards. He believed that the substance of the statement was correct. He was an agent to the Insolvent Court. The witness gave the brief to the last witness, who asked him to allow him to look it over; he lent it him for two minutes, and when the witness returned into Court, he could not find Edmonds, and did not get the brief back for a week.

Mr. Bassel deposed, that he had been counsel against Curswell. It was not a faithful report: the words, "it is his constant practice to detain for rent and buy the stock himself," were not used, nor that Lord Morley had paid 1,000*l.* for his steward.

Mr. SCARLETT replied, and

Lord ELLENBOROUGH charged the Jury, repeating the opinion, that a party publishing what passed in a court of justice did not discharge himself from liability, by showing that the report contained only what in fact occurred.

The Jury consulted for a few minutes, and found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 100*l.*

BANK NOTES.—BROOKES v. WARWICK.

An action for damages, grounded upon the following circumstances:—The plaintiff, a pawnbroker in Holborn, in the course of his trade, received a forged Bank of England note for 1*l.* His shopman endorsed, "Mr. Gaubold, 4, Tavistock-street," being the address given him by the person from whom it was taken. The plaintiff paid it away to a Mrs. Bull, and soon afterwards the defendant, or Bank Inspector, called upon him, and, stating that the note was a forgery, begged to know from whom the plaintiff obtained it. The plaintiff's shopman recognized his own hand-writing, and said, "Mr. Gaubold, 4, Tavistock-street." In the mean time the plaintiff obtained possession of the forged note, which had been stamped as usual in red ink by the Bank, and he refused to give it up to the defendant; but having paid Mrs. Bull a good 1*l.* note for the bad one, he insisted upon keeping it as his property. The defendant threatened the plaintiff with a prosecution, for having a forged note in his possession knowing it to be forged, but without avail: he then procured a summons from Mr. Baker, of Marlborough-street, in consequence of which the plaintiff attended at the police-office, but still refused to give up the note, stating that he wished to keep it for the sake of comparing it with good notes. As he would not submit, a warrant was made out for his commitment to Coldbath-fields prison, on the charge of having a forged note in his possession, &c., Mr. Baker being of opinion that such a proceeding was warranted under the strict words of the statute. The plaintiff was accordingly sent to gaol, where he remained until the next day, when he consented to put the forged note into the custody of the Magistrate. This offer was accepted by Warwick, and from that date it had continued in the hands of Mr. Baker.

Mr. SCARLETT observed, that it would be quite clear that there was neither reasonable nor probable cause for the charge made by the defendant, and in the absence of it, malice was to be presumed. It was evident that there could be no pretence for the accusation of felony, and for the confinement of the plaintiff among felons for 24 hours.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, very early in the cause, recommended that the matter should be compromised, by the plaintiff accepting a verdict for 40*s.* damages, which would carry costs; and Mr. SCARLETT was willing to consent; but Mr. TOPPING, on the part of the Bank (who defended Warwick) would not acquiesce, hoping to persuade the Court that there was no pretence for this action! His Lordship added, that it was clear that both parties had been in error—the plaintiff in insisting upon keeping the note, which as a forgery was a public nuisance, in which Lord Mansfield had decided there could be no property—and the defendant in preferring a charge of a criminal nature, for which there was no pretence. As, however, the Bank would not agree to the suggestion he had made, his Lordship should leave it to the Jury to decide whether the plaintiff was not entitled to some compensation for the injury he had sustained.

Mr. Baker spoke to what had occurred at Marlborough-street; he had signed the warrant for the commitment of the plaintiff, under the persuasion that he was warranted by the act in so doing.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH expressed his conviction that the worthy magistrate was completely mistaken, and that the statute of the 45th Geo. III. had reference to the criminal mode in which the forged note had come into the hands of the party accused. "Really, (said his Lordship,) the question comes to this—whether we are to expunge all the rights of the public, rather than find that a clerk of the Bank has committed an error in judgment. It seems crassa ignorantia indeed, to say that because a man retains that which he thinks his own, he is to be deemed guilty of a felony! Such a doctrine would almost put a halter round the neck of every man who takes a bank-note in the common course of trade." His Lordship then observed, that as the note had been stamped with red ink by the Bank, there could be no danger that it would again get into circulation.

Mr. GURNEY observed, that ingenious methods had been discovered of effacing the stamp denoting that the note was forged.

Mr. TOPPING argued that it was impossible that they should find malice in the conduct of the defendant in preferring this charge: he was warranted by the opinion of the magistrate, which was a reasonable cause on which he might proceed.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, that if any thing had been done by the plaintiff to lead to the slightest suspicion that he kept the note for a criminal purpose, there might have been some excuse for the charge and commitment; on the contrary, he had done all in his power to enable the defendant to find out the party from whom it had come into his hands: he had besides undertaken that for any purposes of prosecution it should be forthcoming. Having obtained it, if there was no probability of its coming again into circulation, he had a right to keep it until some authority of law deprived him of it, and no such authority had been seen in this case. His Lordship had wished that the cause should have arrived at an earlier termination, because all discussions of this kind, more or less, tended to injure the credit of the Bank of England, or at least to diminish the confidence placed in the paper which they gave into circulation. The plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, with such reasonable damages as would compensate him for the injury he had sustained.

The Jury gave the plaintiff a verdict with 50*l.* damages.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH then remarked, that he had put his name upon the note, and that it was given in evidence before him, so that it could not possibly again get into circulation.

The plaintiff with some earnestness requested that it should be given to him; but Lord ELLENBOROUGH observed that the demand indicated more heat than he had expected.

We believe that the forged note was returned to Mr. Baker, who had produced it before the Jury.

It may be right to add, that when the Lord Chief-Justice expressed his decided opinion that the rights of the public were not to be sacrificed, in order that a Bank-clerk might not be found in an error, some expressions of approbation escaped from a very crowded Court.

[In the case of Jackson v. Jones, for a breach of promise of marriage, the record was withdrawn.]

Thursday, June 25.

THE KING v. THOMAS GILL AND BERNARD HENRY.

This was an indictment for a conspiracy. The two first counts charged that the two defendants, well knowing that a certain instrument called a hydrometer, made by Gill, was of little or no value, and not saleable, had conspired together to induce certain instrument makers to purchase a number of them; Henry giving the order to the opticians, who bought of Gill, and Henry never afterwards calling to take the hydrometers away. The two last counts charged that the defendants had combined together to defraud certain opticians, &c. by inducing them to buy a number of Gill's hydrometers on the order of Henry; Henry never afterwards paying for them, but leaving them on the hands of the opticians, &c.—After evidence had been heard, the Jury with very little hesitation pronounced a verdict of Guilty.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, DUBLIN.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

A curious case of breach of promise of marriage was tried in the Court of Common Pleas on Saturday week, before Lord Norbury and a City Jury. The plaintiff was a widow lady, about 50 years of age, of the name of Hawkins, and the defendant, a gentleman of the name of Kelly, sufficiently far advanced in life to be a grandfather. His age was stated to be at least 65. The lady had been married early in life, when she was very beautiful, to Mr. Blosser, and after his decease had married Mr. Hawkins. Subsequently to the death of the second husband, a long courtship took place between her and the present defendant, and a marriage was agreed upon between them. He borrowed 50*l.* from Mrs. Hawkins for the purpose, as he assured her, of purchasing the wedding clothes; and when he received the money set off to Limerick, and there married a Mrs. Hamet. Upon the present action being commenced, the defendant wrote the plaintiff a letter, in which he threatened, that if she went to law, he would prove that she had permitted him to take the greatest and grossest liberties with her. This letter was stated to be couched in terms so exceedingly improper, that the Counsel, to use the words of the Noble and Learned Judge, in his charge to the Jury, "dropt a curtain of decency upon it," and waived the reading in Court, but sent it up to the Jury. No proof of the truth of the allegations contained in this letter was given.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, 250*l.* and costs.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

On Saturday week, about one o'clock, information was received, that after Lord Castlereagh had polled for Sir Murray Maxwell, he had been attacked by a mob, with great violence. Vickery, Ruthen, and the officers, and a number of constables, ran off to the assistance of the Noble Lord. On their arrival in St. Martin's-lane, they found a mob, to the number of about five hundred, assembled round a draper's shop, in which his Lordship had taken refuge. Mud and various things had been thrown at him, but his Lordship received no material injury. Under their protection his Lordship went on, and took refuge in the Admiralty, the mob following him, and using the most foul language and threats. The alarm having reached the Horse-Guards, the officer on duty turned out his guard, the horses being in readiness for mounting, but they proceeded no further than their parade between the gates. Lord Castlereagh went from the Admiralty through St. James's-park, to his house in St. James's-square, and left there about 3 o'clock for Ireland.—In consequence of the attack on Sir Murray Maxwell, the different men of the Westminster and Sun Fire-offices were collected at Bow-street, the stone having been suspected to have been thrown by a fire-man: the men, however, were discharged for want of evidence.—Six more pickpockets were committed, making 23 in two days.

Mr. Kinnaird on Friday obtained a warrant against Caleb Baldwin and three of his gang, for intercepting and violently assaulting a party of Byrdett's voters, on their way to the poll on Thursday afternoon.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

EXECUTION.—On Monday morning, at eight o'clock, John Demott, for the murder of Jane Rogers, was executed before the Debtors' door, Old Bailey.

Saturday, as Sir Mathew Bloxham was driving a chaise down Ludgate Hill, the horse fell, and threw Sir M. out upon the pavement, by which several of his ribs were broken.

A serious accident happened on the 23d instant, to Captain Corey, of Mile-end-road, as he was driving Mrs. Adams, of Chigwell, an airing towards Woodford-wells; the horse took fright, and nearly precipitated the lady out of the chaise. Capt. Corey seeing the danger to which she was exposed, immediately attempted to save her, but unfortunately fell, and received a severe contusion of the head, of which he now lies dangerously ill at the above lady's house.

BIRTHS.

A woman, aged 43, and who had not had a child for 10 years previous, was delivered on the 20th, in the rue des Martyrs, of three daughters, who, with their mother, are doing well.—Paris paper.

MARRIAGES.

TO THE ELECTORS OF WESTMORELAND.

PEOPLE OF WESTMORELAND,

You who think all the rest of your fellow-creatures of more consequence than one family,—

The noise of the triumphs which English freedom is gaining here in the metropolis, has of course reached you. It has gone into every ear in the country; and wherever the heart has been a truly national one, it has gone into every heart. It burst on all sides down every road, like some new and glorious sound splitting suddenly in the air;—it rode after the horseman, it spun merrily into the coach wheels, it streamed along with ribbons, it sparkled on in faces, it harked forward in horns, hurrahs, and laughter; it went rippling to the heart's-blood at every border of the country, like the pleasant waves and summer airs that meet it as it came.

Electors of Westmoreland, the metropolis expects proper echoes to this glorious sound;—from some quarters it cannot, of course, expect them yet; from others it is receiving them; but from none does it listen for a firmer and louder one than from you. From one quarter it receives the grateful news (grateful, in every sense of the word) that an old Yea and Nay man is thrown out of Parliament; from another, that a new one has not been able to get in; and intelligence has arrived from long abused and indignant Ireland, that the creature CROKER has been rejected in his pretensions at Dublin. We are waiting impatiently, Electors, to add the name of Westmoreland to those of Dublin, Southwark, London, and Westminster.

You are too well acquainted with the great merits of the question now before you, to need any recapitulation of them from me; neither is it necessary to remind you of a thousand circumstances, which must be exercising your enthusiasm at this moment. Mr. BROUGHAM is in the midst of you, and has fully shewn you that as far as any man can tell his own story and work his own open way, and as far as his countrymen wherever he goes can hear and become acquainted with him, he brings not only his best recommendations, but most powerful and triumphant ones. The LOWTHERS are in the midst of you also; and they shew, with equal fullness, that they can do nothing of all this. The contrast would tell you at once, if nothing else did, who is the man that deserves to be sent to Parliament. BROUGHAM speaks and speaks eloquently; the LOWTHERS cannot speak. BROUGHAM shews that he can be personally active in Parliament; the LOWTHERS shew that they can just sit there, and no more. BROUGHAM is audible and visible to every body, and has truly seen the county which he aspires to represent; a LOWTHER only makes his appearance when he cannot help it, and then, for aught any one knows, is not worth being seen.

BROUGHAM, one of the few surviving representatives of the old gentry, whom wars, courts, and town habits have swept away, is recognized at once with admiration and sympathy by his fellow-countrymen; they feel indeed that he belongs to their county; that he is one of their natural leaders; that he has an interest in their welfare compatible with their old liberties, and that he has qualities enough to enable him to be content with that manly ambition;—the LOWTHERS, of an old family also, but merged into mere courtiers and boroughmongers, are only felt through the medium of tax-gatherers, tithesmen, attorneys, and every species of humiliating intercourse, not excepting that which looks kindest; they are aristocratical usurpers and dictators of the county, not leading gentry of it; their sullen and arrogant exactions,—their maxims of "He that is not with us, is against us,"—shew that they alone think themselves a proper counterpoise to the whole value of Westmoreland;—and their common-place qualities, when they are brought to the test, form at once the best and worst excuse for their mistake, explaining how it is that they cannot afford to do without their pompous nonsense, and why their insulted countrymen have no reason whatsoever to put up with it.

Electors of Westmoreland, you have a peculiar duty to discharge on this occasion. I say peculiar,—not in the sense or rather the nonsense of the word as used by CASTLEREAGH and his political fops, when with dipping shrugs and a sort of retiring affectation of voice, sipping the air, they talk of "peculiar pleasure"—and "peculiarly flattered,"—and all that; but a peculiar one, as belonging most ostensibly to yourselves, and one on which the eyes of all England are turned. Dublin, for instance, has had to shew, whether a creature of one of the creatures of Mr. PITT, both of them at once Irishmen and aliens of Ireland, could tamely be suffered to come into its bosom, and not be dashed back again; and it has shewn it as it ought. London has had to shew, whether the lessons of the times were to be lost upon it, and an old servant of the Ministers to be retained against a new and intelligent candidate, merely because the former was a jolly caricature of a citizen; and it has shewn it nobly. Southwark has had to shew a still more exemplary sign of the times,—whether another servant of Ministers was to hold his seat against a representative of the chivalrous gentry of old, or rather against a practical champion of the many against the few; and it has also shewn it nobly. Westminster's fresh triumph has likewise come, as was expected; and the bare idea of both its candidates being dictated to it by Government or their creatures would have made the very buildings shake their sides for laughter. Now the task of Westmoreland is to shew whether a county, because it is distant from the great sphere of popular action and influence, is on that account to be governed by a sort of hereditary Court vassal, like an Eastern island, and to be kept perpetually bound in all the petty and private terrors resulting from that kind of subjection,—or whether a descendant of one of its ancient families, still remaining among the democratic part of the aristocracy, is to find it still open to an honest old English ambition,—a field in which tried industry and talent shall at once reap their reward, and secure the freedom and harvest of the soil for their rewarders:—in short, whether various families are to represent Westmoreland, or whether Westmoreland itself is eternally to represent one family.

Electors, this question is a miniature portrait of all that is now going on in the European world. No, it is not a portrait; it is part of the living thing, and no mean part; for the movements of one limb of England are like the stirrings of Atlas. There is a great political question now pending between the lucky yet still untaught conquerors of NAPOLEON, and the people who enabled them to conquer;—it is, whether things shall be restored to their old arbitrary and arrogant footing in favour of the few only, or whether they shall be made to keep their promises, and acknowledge in deed as well as word that they are the servants of the many. Nor is this question to be settled as it used to be of old, by those who happen to have the mere physical power in their hands;—it is enough, that opinion will withdraw from the unjust part of authority, and that the world will outvote the extravagant claims of the Allied families, as you yourselves can do those of the LOWTHERS. In this comparison, you may read a thousand volumes out of your thoughts.

Electors, the news of the commencement of the Westmoreland poll has just reached and gladdened us. The papers already overflow with accounts of the proceedings,—with the excellent speeches of BROUGHAM, and—what shall they be called?—the bye-words contending with them. We congratulate you most heartily on the shew of hands in favour of the former. I see that a poet, who is one of your countrymen, and who will do both you and himself more honour some day or other, when his politics and their changes are less thought of, has publicly taken part against Mr. BROUGHAM, and calls him a Jacobin. It is curious to see, what a passion old Jacobins have for transferring their former title to people who do not go a twentieth part so far as they did. I can only say, for one of these people, that I am no Jacobin, and yet if I have any fault to find with Mr. BROUGHAM, it is, that although he is much less of a lawyer in his politics than any other, he does not go quite far enough in his notions of Reform; and it is for this reason that I would rather see him the representative of your county, where the question of reform is not so completely at issue, than of Westminster for instance compared with Sir FRANCIS BURDETT. But he is still quite reformer enough to be very formidable to the violators of the Constitution, and to worry their advocates, especially the inconsistent ones. He is also a strenuous champion of general knowledge and freedom, as you had good proof of the other day in his admirable efforts respecting the schools;—and he is the man of all men fitted to maintain this particular struggle now going on in Westmoreland, being at once of an ancient family of gentry, and having all the activity, knowledge, and benevolence of a citizen of the world. The LOWTHERS, Men of Westmoreland, can represent none, but themselves, and the tax-gatherers. BROUGHAM will represent you. He has sides enough in his brilliant talents to reflect you all. He has industry to represent the industrious, spirit to represent the spirited kindness for the kind, wit for the witty, scholarship for the learned, matter of fact for the plain, knowledge of the country for the country-people, knowledge of town for townsmen, gravity for the serious, hilarity for the gay, family for the gentry, liberality for the commonalty, sympathy for all.

In the full expectation that you will all flock to have your respective qualities and talents represented in Parliament by a countryman so truly fitted for the purpose, I remain

Your sincere well-wisher, and brother Englishman,
THE EXAMINER.

GENERAL ELECTION.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

At the final close of the poll on Monday the numbers were declared to be:—For Sir S. Romilly, 4,006—Sir F. Burdett, 3,819—For Sir M. Maxwell, 3,550—Mr. Hunt, 76.

Mr. ELVIS addressed the populace, but, during a considerable part of his speech was quite inaudible. It gave him pain to communicate that Sir Murray Maxwell's health was not in so favourable a state that day, as when he had last made a representation to them on that subject. Little doubt could be entertained as to the final success of the cause, and he sincerely congratulated them upon the prospect. (Here the scoffing and hooting became general.)

Mr. RICHARDSON lamented the disgraceful manner in which Sir Murray Maxwell and his friends had been treated. This violence had, however, been shown by their adversaries in an equal degree; and on that very day a cart, occupied by the friends of Sir F. Burdett, had been covered with dirt at Charing-cross.

Mr. STURGEON had to congratulate them on the present state of the poll, and of the security which it afforded to them of a final triumph over the enemy. (Applause.) When he used the word enemy, it was in a peculiar sense. His fears were not excited by the gallant Captain, but by those who brought him there—by Lord Castlereagh and Co. (Loud applause.) These were the foes against whom they had to contend, and over whom they might now expect a glorious victory.

Mr. P. WALKER observed, they would not fail to recollect, that whatever Sir M. Maxwell might be in other respects, he was, as a candidate for their favour and confidence, no other than the nominee of a dungeons, gagging, and torturing administration. It was said that he had been invited to come forward, but his name had not been heard of till about five or six days previous to the election. Since that time all the clerks in public offices had been compelled to write, or signify their disposition to vote in his favour.

Mr. W. SMITH, M.P., said, the only reason for his not having previously offered himself to their notice, was, that he had been engaged in another part of the country, in asserting, and successfully asserting, those popular principles of which he had always been the advocate. (Applause.) He felt a proud satisfaction in reflecting that he had been returned by a popular body as one of the representatives of the people. He came there to give his vote for Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir Francis Burdett, and lamented to observe the endeavours made for disjoining them. (Applause.) It was in his opinion a serious misfortune to the common cause in which they were engaged. Each had strong titles to their esteem, and whatever points of difference might exist between them or their respective adherents, they were points capable of amicable settlement and easy understanding. In their main principles there was no difference. They were equally opposed to the enemies of all reform. He had himself not always agreed in opinion with Sir F. Burdett; but he thought he had distinguished himself as a friend to the public cause, by many and great services. To him was due the credit of having caused the introduction of limited service in the army, and the abolition of the disgraceful system of flogging soldiers. (Loud applause.) He had always voted with Sir F. Burdett on those questions, and rejoiced in the success which had attended his exertions. He looked upon them as of the greatest importance to the character not only of the army but the country. He could not quarrel with the author of such benefits for a slight transgression; and when he saw him associated with such a man as

Sir S. Romilly, he could not but hope most earnestly, that no error of judgment, the only operative cause of which he could allow himself to suppose the existence, would bias their conduct, or induce them to take a partial view of this great contest. (Applause.)

Mr. CLEARY, although he could not congratulate them to the extent he wished on the state of the poll, was still happy to join them in their assurance of a final victory. (Loud applause.) With regard to the numbers gained by their adversaries, the means adopted by them for the purpose should be considered before the circumstance could be fairly understood. He had himself seen a letter addressed to Sir M. Maxwell's Committee, offering votes at one guinea a head. Much had been said on the subject of splitting votes; he was himself ardent in his wishes for Sir S. Romilly's return; but it was right to state, that it was only by the means of 1,600 plumpers that Sir F. Burdett had attained his present station on the poll. Had those votes been divided with Sir S. Romilly, he would have been 2,000 a head of Sir Francis; and would that have been a becoming situation for their established friend to be left in? Had not Sir Francis Burdett encountered every peril, endured every wrong, sacrificed every connexion, in the performance of his public duty? (Applause.) He had now two enemies to engage, and it was somewhat disgraceful to the cause of Sir S. Romilly that his friends should have recourse to dinners and breakfasts as a mode of procuring assistance. The voters for Sir F. Burdett were content to come with empty stomachs, and too many with empty pockets, to secure his election. (Applause.) He found it necessary now to say a few words upon a subject personal to himself, but upon which he felt himself already acquitted in their estimation. A foul attack had been made by Mr. Hunt upon his character, by ascribing to him language and feelings, which, if they belonged to him, would justify them in tearing him to pieces. He had been charged with writing that he would rather go down to Derby to hang the rioters, than to assist them. He had now in his hands a copy of the letter which was represented to have contained this expression, and he would read it to them. Here Mr. Cleary read the following letter amidst general acclamations:—

"London, Oct. 10, 1817.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Before I had the pleasure of receiving your letter, West called on me to consult on what was best to be done to afford assistance to the unfortunate Derby men. We had a meeting on Wednesday evening last, of a few friends, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, which ended in adjourning without doing any thing. Difficulties so great presented themselves that it has, upon consideration, been thought most advisable not to attempt a public subscription for the present. The Major has strong reasons against it. We Reformers are far from wishing to countenance or identify ourselves with any men guilty of murder, robbery, or riot. Had it not been for acts of this kind, the people would, by this time, have been united as one man, in demanding their rights in a way the boroughmongers would have found irresistible. Instead of this, what a situation are we brought to by the foolish, not to say wicked, conduct of violent and imprudent men! It makes me mad when I think of it; particularly after all the prudent council and constitutional knowledge which had been rung in their ears almost daily, and by none more anxiously and indefatigably than yourself. By them, and them only, has our friend Cobett, our stay and pillar, been expatriated. By them, and them only, have our lives and liberties been taken from the protection of the law, and placed at the mercy of the most vile, and wicked, and abandoned men that ever cursed a country, or that God permitted to plague mankind. I could almost hang them myself for playing the game of the tyrants so well, so convinced am I of the irreparable mischief they have done; yet I would not like to see a political hanging of men for a crime they have not committed, to serve the bellish objects of a faction, to enslave the people; and upon this ground I should most willingly afford every co-operation in my power to forward your benevolent desire, if there was any way in which I could be of service; for I have not that personal delicacy now, unfortunately so much in vogue. I think the Whigs feel some anxiety about the issue of the present trials;—an acquittal would afford them excellent matter for speechifying against Ministers, and therefore it is, I fancy, they would readily assent if an application was made to them. Something of this kind is partially under consideration; but the time is so short, that I am afraid it will not be of any benefit to the poor prisoners. Here we are actually worn out by subscriptions; and that to pay Harmer his bill, who behaved so well, hails considerably, and will probably become an abortion. I would have written before, but had no thing satisfactory to communicate. — goes to Derby to report. He told me he would speak to —, who he expected would give something. I have been thinking of asking — to write to some of the Whigs, and as I am just going to dine with my best friend, the kind and honest Major, I shall speak to him on the subject. His bill is printing, and will be out in a few days. What are you doing in Bristol, in petitioning by twentys? I find it generally approved, but not much active exertion as yet. To me it appears, under the circumstances, an admirable plan, if extensively adopted. With sincerely hoping that we shall, after all, at no distant period, see our enslaved country restored to its rights, laws, and liberties, I remain, with great truth, my dear Sir, most faithfully and truly yours,

"7, Alfred-place, Bedford-square.

"THOMAS CLEARY.

"I forgot to say — expresses himself sorry for any hasty expression he might have used to you, and will take the first opportunity of saying so personally.

"To Henry Hunt, Esq. Middleton Cottage, Andover."

The following is a copy of the letter of Sir Francis Burdett, written to Mr. Hunt, in answer to his application to the Baronet to attend him, to present the first Spa-fields Petition to the Prince Regent:—

"Brighton, Nov. 19, 1816.

"SIR,—I have not received any authentic account of the Petition you mention—I therefore can come to no determination respecting it: but this I am determined, not to be made a cat's-paw of, and not to insult the Prince Regent.—I remain, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

"FRANCIS BURDETT.

"To Henry Hunt, Esq."

Mr. Hunt after this attempted in vain to procure a hearing. He therefore retired from the hustings.

At the close of the poll on Tuesday, the numbers were announced in the usual form:—Romilly, 4221—Burdett, 4059—Maxwell, 3784—Hunt, 80.

Mr. HUNT entered into various details respecting the riot on the former night. Mr. W. Smith had refused to vote for him, because he was not a Whig, but a sincere and earnest friend of the people.

Mr. BURDETT stated, that Sir M. Maxwell had always been the enemy of disorder and confusion. It was from an apprehension of these evils that he avowed himself to be decidedly against the principle of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. At the same time he could assure them, that he disapproved most strongly of the practice of impressing seamen, and intended, if he should become their representative, to propose in Parliament the substitution of a system of voluntary enlistment. These opinions he had entertained for the last fifteen years, and still continued to regard as infamous the system of forcing men to serve against their wills.

Mr. D. KINMASTON entreated them to stand by their own character, to bear and forbear, and to guard against the various artifices employed against them. Let them only restrain, as they had done under the most galling and provoking circumstances, the irritabilities to which all were subject, and the cause of reform must be successful. (Applause.) The introduction of the military before the poll was concluded could have originated only in the most deliberate wickedness, or mistaken alarm. He was not ashamed to say, that he felt the highest admiration of the steady and orderly conduct of the citizens of Westminster, under the provocation which they had received. This disposition on their parts had probably prevented terrible effects,—had prevented the appearance of the soldiers during their exercise of the elective franchise from being attended with bloodshed. (Applause.) They, however, would not cast the blame on the poor soldiers, who had English hearts, and English families, and suffered severely in their feelings from the painful duty which they were called upon to discharge. (Applause.) They ought to view the whole matter, however unconstitutional, with perfect indifference, and as harmless parade. He could assure them, that there were men both in and out of Parliament, who would not lose sight of this subject; and that the chief ornament of that House, to which he trusted they were about to send him, Sir F. Byrdett, would in his place formally protest against it. (Applause.) In 1741, the House of Commons passed a resolution, in consequence of a similar proceeding, declaring, that the introducing the military during the progress of a Westminster election was unconstitutional, and destructive of the liberties of the people at large. He would state to them his reason for calling on them to give plumpers for Sir Francis Burdett. He had a great respect for Mr. Sturch personally, but not much for his powers of calculation, when he represented that to split their votes between Sir F. Burdett and Sir S. Romilly, was the way to place the former at the head of the poll. Only 250 votes had been divided between Sir F. Burdett and Sir M. Maxwell, and it was to about 2,000 plumpers that the friends of Sir F. Burdett had to ascribe his present situation on the poll. The whole number of plumpers given to Sir S. Romilly was about 350, the rest being divided with Sir F. Burdett or Sir M. Maxwell.

Mr. WISNART said, it was their sincere wish that Sir Francis Burdett should be at the head of the poll, and he trusted to see that object accomplished to-morrow. (Applause.) By the return of Sir S. Romilly and Sir F. Burdett, whoever had the numerical superiority, they would show their attachment to the principles of the Revolution of 1688. He had been an inhabitant of that city 68 years, and never would submit to dictation. Sir F. Burdett had, unfortunately, come forward on this occasion with a mill-stone round his neck, and this alone had endangered his election. He had resisted every attempt, since he had formed one of the great body of electors, to force a candidate upon them; and it was in the same spirit that he now recommended to their choice Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir F. Burdett, as the known advocates of freedom and reform. (Applause.)

Mr. G. JONES spoke, but met with an indifferent reception.

The aggregate numbers at the conclusion of the poll on Wednesday were—Sir S. Romilly, 4436—Sir F. Burdett, 4298—Sir M. Maxwell, 4053—Mr. Hunt, 81.

Mr. HUNT congratulated those who heard him, on the state of the poll, by which it appeared that Sir Francis had lost, in respect of his majority, 31 votes. (General hissing.) On Saturday last, his friends had promised a great effort, and assured them that Sir M. Maxwell would be overwhelmed on Monday. Monday and Tuesday had now passed, without any such victory being obtained. (Here the speaker was interrupted for some time by an universal outcry, expressive of the strongest contempt and reprobation.) He asked only for fair play, and would retire, if they wished to hear any other candidate, or friend of a candidate, in preference. He wished to call their attention to the conduct of Sir Francis Burdett on the occasion of the Derby trials. (Loud exclamations of "What has all that to do with this concern?") He knew there were many about him who did not like any reference to that affair; but he had letters in his hands, one of which was from Dr. Watson, which fully proved that Mr. Cleary and Mr. Wooler had declined to make any exertion for their assistance. Why was Sir Francis Burdett, who had such large estates in the county of Derby, absent? Why had he not been on the Grand Jury; and why had he not prevented the packing of the petty juries, who had condemned unfortunate and innocent men to death? (Loud hissing, mixed with some applause.) He had, it was true, gone for a laudable purpose to Ireland; but that purpose was accomplished long before the trials at Derby took place. (Here a voice exclaimed, "Who was the cause of Cushman's death?") Instead, however, of returning instantly to Derby, he had gone to a public meeting; assembled to discuss the Catholic question, and had there stated, "that he was a Protestant by profession, but a Catholic in his heart." (Loud hissing.)

Mr. ELLIS said, Sir Murray Maxwell's friends felt much satisfaction at the result of this day's poll. He would always be found the advocate of their constitutional rights, but was of opinion that there were constitution-mongers as well as borough-mongers, men who were prepared with a system of government adapted to any society or number of individuals. The contest would certainly be maintained on their side to the last, and with the fullest assurance of final success.

Mr. STURGEON observed, he was astonished to find on this, the 12th day of the election, that no attempt had been made on the part of the gallant Captain to make known any intelligible grounds upon which he rested his claims to their support. All that he had heard amounted to this—that he was a Captain in the navy, and had for the last fifteen years entertained a scheme which he had kept a profound secret. (Laughter.) Other men who had made discoveries, or who looked forward to legislative improvements, communicated in some manner their thoughts to the public; but the gallant Captain had kept it all in his own head. (Laughter.) Let him take, therefore, 15 years more to digest his plan, and then come forward with such a title as it might give him to their favour. (Laughter and applause.) He ought at least to make some report of his progress, before he demanded their suffrages on the credit of its result. It was too much for an individual, situated as he was, to oppose two men whose abilities and whose characters were so well known to them

all. (Applause.) He did not wish to detain them after the fatiguing and unseasonable interruption which they had experienced, and should conclude by reminding them that their exclusive object ought to be, to keep down the Court influence, and keep out the Court candidate. (Loud applause.)

Mr. WISNART returned thanks for the kind exertions made that day by the friends of Sir S. Romilly. It gave him pleasure to see the little divisions of opinion which had prevailed gradually dying away, and that they all agreed in recognizing Sir S. Romilly as the supporter of the principles on which our ancestors acted in 1688, and as the consistent friend of a reform in Parliament.

Mr. WALKER complained of the artifices adopted by the adherents of the ministerial candidate. It had been discovered that various officers of the revenue had been displaced upon a promise of being again restored, in order to qualify them to vote for Sir M. Maxwell. (Cries of "Shame, shame.") Their names, however, were well known and should be made public. With regard to what had been said of the Derby trials, he could assure them that none of Sir Francis Burdett's tenants had been called upon to serve on the juries empanelled on that occasion. He concluded by recommending to their attention the writings of the great man on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. CLEARY stated, that he had just returned from an active canvass, in which he had discovered that the general sentiment of the people of Westminster was decidedly favourable to the cause of Sir F. Burdett.

Mr. G. JONES made some observations, in the course of which he complained that he was ill-treated by the daily press. (He soon abandoned his post in consequence of the temper manifested by his auditors, and addressed a multitude assembled in Norfolk-street, as on Monday last, from the top of a hackney-coach.)

At the close of the poll on Thursday the numbers were—For Sir S. Romilly, 4789—Sir F. Burdett, 4648—For Sir M. Maxwell, 4394—Mr. Hunt, 81.

Mr. HUNT understood that Sir Francis Burdett had that day gained 84 votes more than Sir M. Maxwell, but he was still considerably below that famous Whig, Sir Samuel Romilly. The Hon. Baronet's friends had often told them, that they would do nothing unless they placed him at the head of the poll. They had as yet then done nothing, and were but at the commencement of their work. This struggle had been a neck and neck race, and he expected that on Saturday it would be nose and nose. There were thousands of electors yet unpolled, and the election was yet anybody's. (A cry of "Except your own.") He believed that was true, and that he must except his own case. (Laughter.) But they would recollect, that in Sodom and Gomorrah there were found but two honest men fit to save the State; now he could show that in Westminster there were 81. (Loud laughter.) He was as proud of his 81 unsolicited suffrages, as others could be with all the numbers they had been at so much pains to assemble; and it would be a curious thing, if in the result it should appear that the second votes of his plumpers would have been decisive of the success of the other candidates. As Mr. Walker had recommended to them the study of Mr. Cobbett's writings, he would now acquaint them with the manner in which Mr. Cobbett had been treated by Sir Francis Burdett, Major Cartwright, and Mr. Walker. A meeting had been called by Mr. Bryant, of the non-resident electors of Coventry, in order to propose Mr. Cobbett as a candidate for that city. He was a friend of Mr. Cobbett as well as that gentleman. Mr. Bryant wrote to Sir Francis Burdett, Major Cartwright, and Mr. Walker, to learn whether they were willing to subscribe towards the expenses of the election. The two latter sent no answer; but he had been told that the reading of Sir Francis Burdett's would be of service to his cause. The letter was as follows—

"St. James's-place, June 12:

"Sir;—I am sorry that a fit of the gout should have so long prevented my returning an answer to your letter, and I am sorry at the same time to state that I cannot, as an honest man, support Mr. Cobbett.—Your humble servant, "F. BURGESS."

Sir F. Burdett had subsequently sent 20 guineas to a subscription in favour of another person, in whose support Major Cartwright and Mr. Walker also exerted themselves. He should now produce to them the red book, and read to them an account of a few signatures as they existed in the Court of Chancery, and none of which had Sir S. Romilly or Sir F. Burdett attempted to abolish. (The rest of Mr. H.'s speech was listened to with impatience on the part of the multitude.)

Mr. JONES was willing to accept the suggestion of a gentleman hear him, and announce to them frankly, that the state of Sir M. Maxwell's health was that day better, and the state of the poll considerably worse. (A laugh.) He was glad to see a spirit of greater good humour prevailing than had hitherto marked the progress of the election. The contest had been severe, and he hoped it would be concluded without asperity. (Applause.) He wished to say a few words on the reasons that induced Sir M. Maxwell to come forward. He had been solicited to do so; and if, in accepting the offer of support he had over-rated his own qualifications, if they should reprove him for a want of diffidence, let them give him credit at least for conscious integrity. (Applause.) If they looked for a man equal to Sir Francis Burdett for legislative talents or parliamentary experience, they must look far enough. (Applause.) But he could assure them, that the subject of impressing seamen was one on which Sir M. M. had long felt an anxiety to see some legislative alteration, and had always acted conformably to those ideas in the discipline of his seamen, and his mode of recruiting their numbers.

Mr. STURCH said, he had the pleasing task of congratulating them on the success which he had anticipated the preceding day. They had triumphed at once over the artifices, the corruption, and the threats of their adversaries. He had to complain not only of the discharge of revenue-officers under promises of restoration to their places in order to qualify them to vote, but of the direct interference of Peers, as well as of offers of money—(Cries of shame, shame.) Notwithstanding all this, the cause of liberty had advanced with a steady progress. Lord Castlereagh's Captain might now go back to his employer, and Westminster might reflect with pride that it had chosen for its representatives two of the best and ablest men that ever, in this land so renowned for its great men, had maintained the principles of freedom and humanity. (Loud applause.) He doubted not the gallant Captain had always done the best for himself and his employers; that when he lost his ship, it was because he could not help it; and if he should lose his election, it would also be because he could not help it. (General merriment.) His friends surely did not mean to say that he was unfit for any thing but to do the Ministers' dirty work in the House of Commons. It reminded him of the fate of a gentleman who was placed in an attorney's office, but not being very likely to rise to the head of the law, his friends purchased him a commission in the army. Here it was soon discovered that there was no probability of his becoming a hero, and it was then resolved to put him in the pulpit. (Laughter.) In this station, however, he made a worse figure than before; and what did they imagine was his next destination? His father having some influence in a rotten borough, concluded by making him a Member of Parliament (laughter); and in Parliament he remained till the act was passed for excluding clergymen. The striking difference between this case and that of the gallant Captain, was, that Westminster was not a rotten borough. Let the gallant Captain get for himself a larger ship, or a patent for the scheme which,—and he (Mr. Sturch) was utterly ignorant of what it could be,—he had been meditating for the last 15 years; but let him leave the glory of representing Westminster to the two men, whose shining talents had been uniformly exercised in maintaining the rights and liberties of the people. (Applause.)

Mr. BRUCE complained of the artifices employed by their enemies, and that even ladies had forgot, on some occasions, the gentleness of their sex, and compelled their tradesmen by threats to vote for Sir M. Maxwell. All they knew of this officer's public services was, that he had taken out Lord Amherst and Mr. Ellis to China, and had also brought them back. (A laugh.) He had heard of a French army, which, after marching up a hill, marched down again, and that this was the substance of its exploits. He would do well to the cause of Sir S. Romilly, for he respected his character, whilst he despised the insinuations of his underlings; but it was their duty to place Sir Francis Burdett's name at the head of the poll. He had himself been attacked for his sentiments on the subject of resistance. Some had called him a conspirator, and a Catiline, and asserted, that, having violated the laws of another country, he was disposed to invade those of his own. Now he had seen the consequences of despotism, and had always understood that the right of resistance to an iniquitous government was the key-stone of our Constitution, and the principle upon which Magna Charta and all their privileges depended. It was the principle asserted by Pym, Hampden, Russell, and Sydney, and it was a principle naturally condemned by Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Canning, and Lord Sidmouth—men who, compared to the former, were as "satyrs to Hyperions," and whose political characters were already

"Damned to everlasting fame."

When he was at Aleppo, he had actually seen, after a successful siege of the place, the Pacha enter at the head of a body of executioners, and summarily strike off seven or eight tradesmen's heads, for non observance of the regulations he had issued, and in order to shew the vigour of the government. So debased were the people by their subjection, that they looked upon this as a measure that indicated a laudable energy; and such were the certain consequences of every system of despotism, whether exercised under the Turkish government, or introduced here by the present Ministers.

Mr. WISHART was happy to see the strides by which they were advancing to a complete and splendid victory. Another equally active canvass would put down all opposition, and bring the contest to a close to-morrow. It would be bad taste in him to answer the farrago of calumny and falsehood by which one of the candidates had endeavoured to injure the cause of Sir S. Romilly, who had ever shown himself the steady friend of retrenchment, economy, and reform. To mention two instances would be sufficient: Sir S. Romilly had opposed the institution of the Vice-chancellor's Courts, and had supported the bill for abolishing sinecures. A house divided against itself must fall; and he had heard, with much regret some of the expressions made use of by Mr. Bruce. He was himself, no underling, and he would, however unequal to that gentleman either in natural or acquired advantages, repel the imputation. He was but an humble individual; but he had received no reward during a long life, except what was derived from the kindness and friendship of his brother electors. (Applause.)

Mr. BRUCE acknowledged that his observations had not been intended to apply to Mr. Wishart, for whom he entertained much respect.

On Friday, at the conclusion of the poll, the following numbers were exhibited:—Sir S. Romilly, 5,118—Sir F. Burdett, 4,985—Sir M. Maxwell, 4,608—Mr. Hunt, 82.

Mr. HUNT first presented himself, and his appearance was the signal of the usual uproar. He began by alluding to a horse-whipping scene which had been acted on the hustings that morning, in which he and Mr. Dowling were the principal performers.—(See Police Report.)—The course of his narrative was interrupted by the loudest cries of "Off, off!"—He was ready, he said, if any of those hissing cowards would come forward, to meet him in a ring amongst them all. (General hooting.) If they did not give him fair play, he would stand there, till he could obtain it. He should now enter into a story of Sir F. Burdett's refusing to present a petition of Mr. Bryant to the House of Commons. (Here the interruption was so long and general, that the case of Mr. Bryant was omitted.) They had been told that he had been horsewhipped that morning; they saw him now, and could see whether he bore any marks of such a castigation. Mr. Dowling, however, who had laid a whip over his head whilst his back was turned, had received from his brother and himself what he would carry with him to his grave.—(Groaning.)—He would now read them a letter from Mr. Cleary to himself, with regard to this same Mr. Dowling, and which they would receive with that degree of belief that belonged to the evidence of one Irishman against another. (A loud outcry.) This letter, which was dated October, 1817, was in substance as follows:—"That he, Mr. Cleary, understood from Mr. Funnerty, on the authority of persons who had heard them, that Mr. Dowling had used threats that he would horsewhip Mr. Hunt whenever he should meet him. That Mr. Dowling had also added, that it was the knowledge of his intentions which had kept Mr. Hunt from attending a Common Hall in the city of London." (In the midst of the uproar which followed the reading of the letter, a stick was thrown at Mr. Hunt, who observed, that it could only come from some Irish bully.) Had Mr. Cleary now become the brother bravo of Mr. Dowling? He himself had been called a spy of the Government. If he was so, it was strange that he should have incurred the enmity of another spy, and it was still stranger that he was the man who gave evidence on the trial of Dr. Watson, against the agents of Government, among whom was Mr. Dowling. (Here Mr. Hunt read another letter, which, he said, was one written by Castles to Lord Sidmouth, for money to enable him to redeem his wearing apparel, in which Castles informed his Lordship, that he believed he could make a dupe of Hunt, who was very seditious.) The remainder of his speech consisted of a challenge to the friends of Sir F. Burdett, to point out what he had ever done for the people, or what he was likely, or had promised to do, and terminated by a solemn assurance that he would at least be a spy on the conduct of the Hon. Barnet, and wherever he appeared, be there also.

Mr. ELLIS said the number of suffrages given for Sir M. Maxwell fully acquitted him of the charge of presumption in coming forward. Sir Murray Maxwell would consider it to be the proudest circumstance in his life, whether ultimately successful or not, that so many of the electors of Westminster had honoured him with their votes. No greater tribute could have been paid to the integrity of his character, than the respectable support which he had received. The final triumph, if it should belong to the other side, would be witnessed without any asperity of feeling on theirs. (Applause.)—During the whole of this speech, Mr. Watson vainly end avoured to procure a hearing, apparently for the purpose of adding his testimony to some of Mr. Hunt's statements.

Mr. STURCH, in a short but animated speech, exhorted them to renewed efforts on the succeeding day, not for the purpose of victory, which was already theirs, but for that of rendering it illustrious and complete. (Loud cheers.) With regard to the questions put respecting the merits of Sir Francis Burdett, no consideration should induce him to take the slightest notice of any thing that came from that quarter. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. WISEMAN returned thanks on the part of Sir S. Romilly's friends, and mentioned his hopes of meeting them on those hustings again, at the end of the next three years.

Mr. CLEARY, in the course of his speech, stated as a fact, that a foreign ambassador, the representative of a despotic government, had been engaged, together with his lady, in actively soliciting votes for Sir M. Maxwell. (The crowd here generally vociferated "Name, name.") He could not, in common discretion, comply with this call, but had no doubt it would be canvassed in the proper place. As Mr. Hunt had thought proper to read a private letter written by him, (Mr. Cleary) with a friendly feeling towards himself, he might be allowed to read a letter from Mr. Cobbett respecting it is firebrand among freemen. (Loud applause.)—(Mr. Hunt now stepped forward, and seemed for some time determined to prevent the reading of the letter, but was at length compelled to retire.) The letter, which was dated April, 1803, contained the following expressions:—"All the gentlemen whom I have seen are loud in their praises of Sir Francis Burdett; his late motion on the cashiering of officers has procured him many valuable friends. It will be impossible for the two factions by any calumny to injure our cause, provided we take care to prevent men of bad character from mixing with us. There is one Hunt, a Bristol man, who rides about the country with a wife, the wife of another man, having deserted his own; he is a sad fellow, have nothing to do with him." At the conclusion of the letter were the words, "I repeat it, beware of Hunt."

The shouts of laughter, accompanied by outcries of every description, which now broke from the multitude, appeared to demonstrate one universal sentiment, which was still more unequivocally expressed by Mr. Cleary's adoption of Mr. Hunt's mode of ascertaining the feelings of his friends. The waving of his hat was a signal obeyed in all quarters of the prodigious crowd, and left no doubt of the impressive effects of Mr. Cobbett's epistle.

WESTMORLAND ELECTION.

APPLEBY, JUNE 30.—To-day, at nine o'clock in the morning, the election for the county commenced. The freeholders had assembled in greater numbers than yesterday, and accompanied the respective candidates whom they intend to support, from their lodgings to the hustings, preceded by their flags and music.

After the Candidates (Lord Lowther, Col. Lowther, and Mr. Brougham) had been proposed and seconded, the two former addressed the assembly briefly, and Mr. Brougham made a long harangue, which was received with repeated shouts of applause. In the course of it, he alluded to the attacks made on him by the apostate poets, Southey and Wordsworth. He said "It had even been attempted to be circulated, that he was not a freeholder of the county. The Wordsworths and the Southey's, who gave currency to this story, and who now made the smallness of his fortune their principal objection to the success of his election, did not stop here. They had so far forgotten themselves as to call the freeholders of the county who supported him paupers. It did appear to him marvellous, and even with all his allowance for human passions and frailties, incomprehensible, to hear this application of the word pauper from such persons; it showed him how completely party spirit could destroy every recollection and every sentiment that became them, and that their animosity, worse than a paralysis, which generally left one eye and one side with the powers of life, rendered them insensible to every feeling of propriety. (Great applause.) He would not say how poor they once were, or by what means they had now bettered their situation. He respected them in that honourable poverty which had not destroyed their principles, and wished he could respect them in their affluence, which had been more pernicious than their poverty; but the only return he now received was to see them opposing him, on the ground of his approaching near that situation from which they had risen, leaning themselves with a party whose loud and only cry was riches—riches—riches! and declaring that a man of moderate fortune could not be honest. (Great applause.) Mr. Brougham subsequently noticed the foul arts of his opponents, and gave some striking instances:—"Some time ago," says Mr. Bousfield, a merchant in London, in a letter which he held in his possession, "my name appeared in the list of the Lowther Committee in London, and my approval of their parliamentary conduct, which I positively declare was done either without my consent or knowledge." In addition this, there had been a direct attempt to bribe three voters by an offer of 50*l.* for a vote; the letter proving this he held in his hand; the writer of it was a naval officer, and it was dated Chatham. He had given orders to his agents to serve this officer with an indictment, and had written to Lord Melville at the head of the Admiralty, requesting him to give orders to prevent him from sailing; that he might be forthcoming on trial; and that Noble Lord had answered, much to his honour, that he would be sent on no service that would place him beyond the reach of the law when he should be called on. He was sorry for the gallant officer, who, deceived by others, had thus ignorantly got into a scrape; but it was necessary to make an example of him, to prevent the election of the county from being carried by a long purse. Mr. Brougham here read the following letter, suppressing the names:—

"Chatham.

"MY DEAR UNCLE,—I this day received a letter from my friend Lonsdale, requesting I would get you and my relations to vote for him and his sons in the ensuing election. If you will be so good as to do so, I will answer for my brother Edmund, whose lands you hold, that he will at all times do every thing to promote your interest. I will, instantly that I hear of your having given your vote to Lord Lonsdale, remit you 150*l.* sterling, as a mark of my regard and love for you and my cousins. I dare say you will remember me when I mention that I am the second son of your brother; and that I was under your protection some time when at Dr. Waller's school, at Appleby. It is my intention to come and visit all my relatives in that quarter shortly, when I hope to find you in good health. Hoping to hear from you by return of post, and complying with my request, believe me ever to remain your attached nephew —"

The polling commenced at eleven, and continued till six in the evening, when the state of the poll was as follows:—

Mr. Brougham	280
Lord Lowther	262
Colonel Lowther	252

The declaration of this state of the poll was received with the most lively acclamations. Mr. Brougham and the other two Candidates severally addressed their friends. Mr. Brougham, in making a quotation from Shakspeare, said, he was quoting the words of a great poet—not the poet of the lakes; and pronounced an eloquent contrast between the character of Shakspeare's mind and that of Mr. Wordsworth.

The Lowthers are supported on the hustings by many gentlemen of the county. Mr. Brougham was accompanied by Sir F. F. Vane, Mr. Wakefield, Mr. Wyburgh, Lord Molineux, Mr. Lambton, and many other gentlemen. Nearly five hundred freeholders have already polled, and at the present rate of polling they would all be polled by Saturday night.

BOSTON.—The Hon. P. R. D. Burrell and Mr. W. A. Madocks have been again returned for the borough of Boston, after an arduous struggle with Henry Ellis, Esq. an avowed ministerialist. The battle was long contested, and the event at times doubtful, but the victory is the people's.

LIVERPOOL.—For Mr. Canning, 1614—Gen. Gascoigne, 1444—Earl Sefton, 1280—Total number of freemen polled, 2876.—The numerical superiority of the ministerial candidates arose from the splitting of votes, as more men polled for Earl Sefton than for either of his opponents. Never did the losing candidate in any electioneering contest retire from the hustings attended with such marks of popular triumph, as did Lord Molyneux, the representative of his noble parent. He was also, on leaving Liverpool, escorted to the boundaries of the town by about 20,000 persons on foot and more than 400 gentlemen on horseback.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.

DUBLIN, JUNE 27.—We congratulate the College, and the country not less than the College, on the triumph of Mr. Plunket over as base and impudent a conspiracy as ever disgraced a lettered or unlettered community. He was on Thursday evening, about half-past eight, declared duly elected, having had a majority of four voices, even though the Provost persevered in refusing the votes of the old scholars, and thus thinned the ranks of the independents by no less than NINE. How truly honourable to arrive thus at the post after all that has been done to impede his progress—notwithstanding all the plots and intrigues, all the bribery and corruption, all the menacing and treachery!—The Election Hall was opened at an early hour, and it became instantaneously thronged to such a degree, that not only locomotion, but breathing itself, was almost impracticable.

Mr. PLUNKET delivered a speech remarkable for eloquence and energy. He asked what he had done that he should be deprived of the honour of representing the College, which had but a few years ago been unanimously conferred upon him. If any part of his conduct had been improper, let his accusers stand forth and define their charges.—If he had erred, if he had committed faults, let him be arraigned in open day, but let him not be robbed of his rights—let not his privilege and his reputation be pilfered from him by an underhand and dark and base conspiracy. Mr. Plunket now detailed the whole of the secret manoeuvres put in practice by his opponents, for the purpose of preventing his return, and adverted to the letter of invitation sent to Mr. Croker, with that gentleman's double answer, &c.

Mr. CROKER next addressed the assembly. He had the advantages of a good voice and considerable fluency, but his language was of very humble pretensions, and the poverty of his matter was extreme. His oration disappointed the auditors generally, and surprised many, who had conceived a very favourable opinion of his talents, from the perusal of the writings attributed to his pen. Nothing could be more striking than his inferiority to Mr. Plunket. The qualities of the men are indeed different, but the contrast would not be so exceedingly remarkable, if they were not placed face to face on the same hustings. Mr. Croker denied that he had written any second or private letter in answer to the invitation of Doctor Lloyd. Nothing could be more fallacious than the reasoning of the Right Hon. Gentleman, when he asked what he had done, that he should lose the representation of the College, and when he alluded to his faithful and zealous, and able services. When the Right Hon. Gentleman had opposed the former member for the College, Mr. Foster, would not Mr. Foster have been equally justified in putting the same questions, and urging the same claims to a continuance of the favour of the electors? (Loud cries of "No! No!" "He would not!" "Not No!")—At a subsequent period of the day, in the course of his speech, Mr. Croker paid Mr. Plunket some compliments on his talents as an equity lawyer; but said, he seemed on the present occasion, to play the part of a criminal lawyer, criminating every one on his (Mr. C.'s) side, and with a success that threatened to rival a learned gentleman whom he had in his eye.

Mr. PHILLIPS, who was sitting at the hustings, and towards whom Mr. Croker appeared to be looking, asked whether he was meant?

Mr. CROKER said, there could be nothing humiliating to the learned gentleman in a comparison with Mr. Plunket.

Mr. PHILLIPS said, there certainly would be no humiliation in a comparison with Mr. Plunket. Of the expressions which had been used he thought very little, but for the source whence they came he had much contempt.

Several speeches were made in the course of the day. Cries were constantly heard of "Plunket and Freedom!" "Independence of Trinity College, and Plunket for ever!" "No Croker!" "No Corruption!" "No Bribery!" "Purity of Election and Plunket for ever!" &c. &c.

Nothing could equal the anxiety to ascertain the state of the poll, which continued to be evinced from the moment polling commenced. Every variation and vicissitude was communicated with telegraphic celerity to all parts of the University, and plaudits or groans were heard in all quarters, marking the announcement of a vote for or against Mr. Plunket. About the hour already mentioned the polling ceased, and it was proclaimed that there were, of what were called legal suffrages,—

For the Right Hon. W. C. Plunket, - - - 34

For Mr. Croker, - - - 30

Majority - - - 4

Now the chawing commenced—and, as Cobbett would say, it was indeed chawing. Not chawing effected by a ragged multitude, or by a handful of hirelings, but chawing in which no one was concerned who was not in the garb of a Gentleman, or who did not fill a distinguished or respectable station in society. The peculiarity, indeed, of this election was, that the entire auditory consisted of persons of this class—it comprised every man in the city eminent in the literary, political, legal, or mercantile world. We will not attempt to describe the enthusiasm of this singular and truly interesting throng. It is quite beyond description. We shall only say, that it conducted Mr. Plunket to his house in Stephen's Green, receiving cheers and congratulations at every step, and left him about nine o'clock, in the bosom of the happiest family in the island.—In a few seconds after he was housed, he appeared at one of the windows in a state of considerable exhaustion, as the reader may guess. He could speak only a few words, but his countenance and gestures expressed his feelings with sufficient eloquence. He was heard to say, amid the shoutings, "the hearts of the people were with me, and to this I owe every thing."—Weekly Freeman's Journal.

OUTRAGE ON MR. GRATTAN, &c.

This day (June 30), the Election for the City of Dublin came on. Mr. Grattan was proposed by Mr. Latouche, and Mr. Shaw by the Lord Mayor. There was no opposition; and scarcely forty electors present.—Both Gentlemen made speeches, and were very ill received by their audience.—We regret exceedingly to state, that the populace broke out into acts of open outrage against their Representatives. A chair of considerable value, highly decorated, was prepared for the Representatives, but from the moment they appeared, they were received with hisses and groans. They had not proceeded twenty paces up Henry's street, when a violent assault commenced. The flag-bearers, in the front of the car, were attacked with great fury, and were obliged to convert their flag-staves into weapons of defence. The battle, however, was short. Missiles began to fly in all directions, and we have to state, with a mixture of indignation and horror, that Mr. Grattan received a confusion in the forehead; he was obliged to descend from the car, which was instantly torn into atoms. The Right Hon. Gentleman took shelter in a house in Mary's street, and Mr. Shaw retired also.—The people in immense multitudes, continued to collect around the house of Mr. Preston, (where Mr. Grattan took refuge)—assuming every moment a most determined and ferocious appearance.—Mr. Guinness, Mr. Grattan, jun., and others, addressed them from the window, but it appeared to produce only the tranquillity of a moment. Lord Charlemont, and a number of other Gentlemen appeared at the window, when Mr. Phillips was recognized in the street by the multitude, who immediately insisted that he should address them. He was accordingly admitted into the house, and he, Mr. Guinness, and Lord Charlemont stood together upon the platform beneath the window. When silence was restored, Mr. PHILLIPS spoke in substance nearly as follows:—"My Fellow-countrymen, you know well what I feel for the humblest man amongst you—(Cries of We do, we do)—and you know also what I feel for my country, (Cries of Bravo) In the name, then, of the character, not merely of that humblest man, but of that country also, I call on you to redeem both from the stain which this day's abominable turpitude has cast upon it. You have wrongs, and I know them—I feel them—but, in the name of God, wreak these wrongs upon your enemies, and not upon your zealous and indefatigable friend. Remember, he it was that gave you a Constitution—and remember too, if all were like him, my poor countrymen would still have a country. (Applause.) Here do I, one of yourselves, address you, in behalf of yourselves—in behalf of the Man of the People, and standing by the son of that glorious Charlemont, whom I emphatically call the Nobleman of the People. (Here then was an universal burst of applause, and Lord Charlemont repeatedly made his acknowledgments.) Remember 1782. Remember the period of the abominable Union! and prove by your conduct now, that you do not forget those times. (We will, we will.) There is only one way of doing it. Do not insist on Mr. Grattan's being brought forth; feeble, as his Surgeon tells me he is, with the dust and heat of this immense multitude—(Shouts)—prove the necessity of his enthusiasm by acts, not words. Come, give him three hearty cheers, and then let every man go peaceably home."—This address happily produced its effect. The whole multitude gave three distinct cheers, and in a few minutes there was not a trace of the frightful uproar which had so terrified the neighbourhood.—Mr. Grattan retired, quite exhausted, to his carriage, which waited for him at the extremity of Abbey-lane. He was attended by Mr. H. Bushe, Mr. Grattan, jun. Mr. Guinness, Lord Charlemont, &c.—Dublin Evening Post.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JUNE 27.—During the year 1817, 310 persons have been drawn out of the river, of whom 83 had voluntarily drowned themselves.

M. Chateaubriand has brought an action of calumny before the English tribunals against the Editor of the Times, for some imputations of a nature the most serious, as well as odious, directed against him, and inserted in that paper under the head of "Private Correspondence."

The celebrated sculptor Canova is now at Naples, where he has gone to superintend the cast of the bronze horse, of which he has made the model, for the equestrian statue consecrated by the filial piety of the King to the memory of his august father, Charles III. The dimensions of this monument surpass those of all others of the same kind which have been raised in modern times.

NORTH AMERICA.

CHARLESTON, JUNE 2.—We have conversed with several officers lately from the army; they state, that the two British emissaries captured at St. Marks and Suwannee, Arbuthnot and Ambruster, both accomplices of the notorious Woodbine, have been tried by a court-martial, of which Gen. Gaines was President, and being found guilty of exciting the late Indian war, were executed on the 27th of last month; the former was hanged, and the latter shot. Arbuthnot had been a Captain in the British service, was about 40 years of age, of genteel appearance, and met his fate like a soldier. When the executioner was fixing the rope around his neck, he desired not to be handled so roughly; observed he was a gentleman; and some say, spoke of his death being avenged: his property he requested should be given to his son.—Ambruster was young, not exceeding 25: at first he was insolent and contumacious, but as death began to look him in the face, he lost his composure, and died more like a woman than a man. The evidence against both, we understand, was clear and strong. Letters, advising the enemy of the movements of our army, and how to act, were intercepted. Documents were also found, proving beyond doubt that a criminal correspondence had been some time kept up by them and the Governor of New Providence, with the Indians and renegade negroes in Florida: but how indignant must every one be, when informed, that the prophet Francis, who was hanged a little before, had in his pocket a new commission of Brigadier-General from the British Government, supposed to have been given to him during his late visit to England, whence he had not long returned. As a scrutiny, we are assured, will develop the blackest perfidy toward this country, Great Britain will likely be disposed to let the matter rest where it is.

A Schoolfellow's communication shall appear next week.

The notice respecting another schoolfellow, Mr. N. (of whom we were very glad to hear) unluckily came too late to hand.

A. O. C. shall be inserted.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JULY 5.

THE Paris papers are very barren of news this week. The Duke of WELLINGTON is said to be successfully engaged in settling the disputes between the Courts of Madrid and Lisbon. We can very easily believe it; and for this simple reason, that kings just now know well enough they cannot go to war with impunity. They have broken too many heads, credits, and promises. "War is a game," says the poet,

"Which, were their subjects wise, kings would not play at."

Their subjects are wiser than they were; and kings are accordingly in no haste to gamble with men's bones.

Another commander celebrated in the late Allied wars has died,—Baron WINZINGEROE, General in the Russian service. His death was preceded but a very short time by that of Count BARCLAY DE TOLLY; and both are supposed to have been exhausted by the fatigue of campaigns. Other Allied Commanders of eminence are drinking waters for liver and other complaints, generated by toil and anxiety; but the Sovereigns themselves, we believe, are all well, with the exception of those who draw the steel too much against beef and chickens. What a constitution must BONAPARTE have, who after hurrying and being hurried from temperate to frigid zones, from frigid to torrid, and from the height of human power to captivity, outlives both friend and foe, and is even yet the most formidable object in the world to its sovereigns. Oh, had he never been provoked or educated to desert the best interests of liberty, what a truly grand conqueror he might have been,—beating tyranny and injustice to pieces like the Iron Man in the poet, and preparing the world for the calm voice of philosophy!

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

Yesterday, at three o'clock, the poll closed, when the numbers were announced to the expecting multitude, who received the account with prodigious shouts of approbation. The final state of the poll was as follows:—

Romilly	5339
Burdett	5233
Maxwell	4803
Hunt	84

As soon as something like silence could be obtained,

The HIGH BAILIFF said a few words (chiefly, we believe, for the noise was great) respecting the necessity of maintaining order, and urging them to abstain from the improper practice of destroying the hustings, which, he said, was his castle, and ought not to be violated.

Sir S. ROMILLY then presented himself amidst the approving shouts of the multitude. He thanked the Electors for the high honour they had done him in choosing him as one of their Representatives. He had abstained from appearing before them during the proceedings; but now that he had been chosen as the Representative of the great, populous, and enlightened City of Westminster,—the highest honour he thought that could be conferred in a free state,—he gladly tendered his heartfelt acknowledgments.—His friends had spoken too favourably of him in his absence—he had no pretensions, except that he had endeavoured (unsuccessfully indeed) to serve the people to the utmost of his abilities. But the proper mode of shewing his gratitude would be by deeds and not words—not by professions there, but by actions in his place in Parliament.—(Much applause)—by a vigilant attention to the liberties of the people—by shewing himself a watchful guardian of the liberty of the press, and the trial by jury—by combatting for a Government of law and justice, instead of one of spies and informers.—(Great applause)—by resisting all attempts to impose on the nation another Income Tax—by endeavouring to obtain a more equal Representation of the People, and Parliaments of a shorter duration.—(Shouts of applause)—and by a determination to uphold Civil and Religious Liberty. Such were the duties of a Representative of the people; and he trusted in God, that when the proper time arrived, he should be fully able to render a fair account of his conduct to his Constituents.—(Sir Samuel then retired with Lord Howard, and other of his friends, amid general plaudits. He left the hustings bowing to all around him, and apparently highly gratified by the reception he had met with from the people, a number of whom following him home, whither he was driven in a barouche and six horses.)

Mr. STURCH followed Sir S. in addressing the multitude. He congratulated the Electors, he said—for they had well fought the battle, and had gained the victory.—(Applause)—They had gained it over the entire power of the Court; and had gloriously sustained the high character of Westminster, by returning two distinguished individuals as their Representatives, who were both advocates for Reform.—(Immense applause)—men who would serve them ably and honestly, and who would do the business of their Constituents, and not their own. He hoped he should long see the names of Burdett and Romilly connected as the friends of humanity and freedom.—(Applause)—Mr. STURCH trusted that the Electors would use their victory and triumph with good temper. There could be no wish to hurt the feelings of individuals. They had very properly opposed the machinations of a corrupt Administration, and they would do well always to oppose them. As for Sir Murray Maxwell, personally, he believed that he was an honourable man and a good sailor. Lord Castlereagh indeed had had no sort of pity on him, when he sent him to Westminster, to “restore their independence”—(Shouts of laughter)—and he hoped they would never again there hear of the gallant Captain. Westminster did not want him, for they now possessed two Representatives who had both the will and the ability to serve them well; and they deserved to be so served, for they had shown themselves the supporters of order, liberty, and truth, and had given no countenance to the friends of universal confusion and anarchy.

At this termination of Mr. STURCH's speech the friends of Mr. HUNT caused a considerable clamour.—After this had lasted a good while, Mr. HUNT addressed the multitude, but such was the noise that we cannot trust ourselves to repeat a word of what he said.

There was no sort of violence. The people, being satisfied and happy, speedily retired, and in a few hours the hustings were levelled to the ground, and the timber removed, by the orders of the High Bailiff.

The Committee who have conducted the election of Sir FRANCIS BURDETT have given notice, that an early day will be announced to the Electors for celebrating the triumph of Reform, by charring their beloved Representative.

Sir F. BURDETT, we understand, on being informed of the result, said that he was highly gratified by the attachment and support of the people of Westminster.

Further intelligence from the East Indies informs us, that on the 20th of February the troops of BAJEOROW were dispersed by General SMITH, after an action in which GOKLA was killed, twelve elephants, with 57 camels, taken, and the enemy broken and discomfited. Nothing new is said of the PRISHWA: but it is certain that General PRITZNER has closely invested the fort of Singhur, where a considerable mass of treasure is said to be deposited, many of the wealthy Bramins from Poonah having taken refuge in it before the surrender of the capital. Three mortar batteries had opened on the fortress, and from the vigour with which the siege was carried on, it was supposed that Singhur, with its garrison of 1,500 Arabs, would speedily fall into the hands of the besiegers.

The accounts just received from Ceylon come down to the end of February. They confirm the opinion we have already given upon the state of affairs in the Candian country, and completely contradict the statement contained in the former Ceylon Government Gazette, viz. that the insurrection was confined to the dregs of the people. It seems, that when the last accounts came away the whole of the territory of Candy was in a state of open rebellion, and the Governor himself, we understand, has at last been obliged to acknowledge, that he can only depend upon his troops. Lady BROWNRIDGE and all the English ladies were about to come from Candy to Columbo for protection, and every soldier that could be spared, either at Columbo or Galle, had been sent for to Candy, for the purpose of keeping open, if possible, the communication between the different stations in the island. EHELAPOLLA, the brother-in-law of the Dessare of Ovin, who was always known to be a secret favourer of the Insurgent cause, has at last taken an open part, and, as is reported, is gone over to his countrymen.—We cannot help repeating, that the convention which the Governor of Ceylon entered into, and which, it is generally understood, has produced the present disastrous state of affairs, should be fully inquired into by Parliament as soon as it meets.—Times.

The following (says The Times) having been transmitted to us from good authority, we have thought it our duty to give it publicity—either with a view to the correction of the abuses stated; if they really exist; or to the refutation of unfounded charges, if the statement is erroneous:—"Papers of Holland, as well as those of this country, announced the arrest of the Spanish Colonel, VAN HALEN, and his imprisonment in the Spanish Inquisition. This Officer, to whose talents and courage was owing the surrender of Lerida, Monzon, and Mequinenza, has arrived in this capital, after having suffered six months' confinement of the most inhuman kind. We were in hopes that the horrible practice of using the torture was abolished in Spain; but we learn with pain and abhorrence, that it was inflicted on Colonel VAN HALEN, to force from him the discovery of some secrets with which he was supposed to be acquainted; but neither the disgraceful cruelty exercised on him, nor the offers personally made to him by the King, could induce VAN HALEN to compromise the honour and safety of those whom it was wished to involve in a supposed conspiracy. The Inquisition at length despairing of making any use of VAN HALEN, he was on the point of being secretly put to death in the dungeons of that sanguinary tribunal; when, employing all the efforts that despair could suggest, he succeeded in escaping, bringing with him the key of his prison. Thus, although VAN HALEN finds himself in perfect safety in this country, he is at the same time banished from his own, to which he rendered the most important services during the war against NAPOLEON BONAPARTE. We will not shock our readers by giving a description of the species of torture said to be inflicted on VAN HALEN, who, besides having suffered considerably in his health, has nearly lost the use of his right arm, from the last torture which was given to him, and which lasted five minutes."

A decree of the King of DENMARK of the 10th of June prohibits, under severe penalties, the printing of any thing which contains offensive expressions respecting foreign Sovereigns who are upon terms of friendship with Denmark, even though it should be taken from foreign works or newspapers.

The dissolution of Parliament has turned loose upon the country six hundred and fifty-eight Gentlemen, and half as many Noble Lords, with two millions sterling in their pockets, to throw away by handfuls amongst the populace;—no, the free and independent electors,—for that, we are told, upon the best newspaper authority (the Courier), is to be the price paid for a new Parliament, by those who shall offer themselves as candidates for seats in it. What, are Parliaments bought in this country? Yes, and sold too, or they are most villainously belied. It would be a curious question in political arithmetic, and perhaps a profitable exercise for the talents of any school-boy financier during the midsummer holidays to find an answer to it:—"If a Parliament be bought of John Bull for two millions—for how much would it be sold to the First Lord of the Treasury?" Under what rule this sum might be wrought, it is not easy to say, but we rather think that practice would most readily resolve it. Well; but this will be thought brave news for Britons, that those very persons who have been taxing them these six years are about to spend two millions,—two millions of sovereigns among them, in promoting their health and their morals,—exalting the authority of the laws, securing the liberties of the subject, and exemplifying the purity of the constitution,—during a general election! That indeed were most excellent; and patriots might exclaim at the approach of such a consummation,—"O thrice and four times blessed people of these isles!"—Sheffield Iris.

WESTMORELAND (COUNTY), Second Day.—Lord LOTHIAN, 605—H. C. LOWTHER, 585—H. BROUGHAM, 559.

THE NEW CITY MEMBER.—"Had it been possible, he would have declined all mention of politics; he disliked them on many accounts; they soured the intercourse of social life; and he must now frankly tell them, that he would rather be considered by them as a commercial than a political Representative. He certainly was attached to the Constitution, and wished to support the Government; but it would be his duty to distinguish the Administration from the Constitution, and to support the former when moving in consistency with the latter. It was his wish to consult the interests of his constituents, and equally to avoid a needless opposition and a servile compliance."—From a Speech of Mr. Wilson, at a dinner on Thursday.

On Tuesday Sir ROBERT WILSON and Mr. CALVERT, the two successful Candidates for the Borough of Southwark, were chaired. Each was seated in a barouch drawn by six horses, preceded by flags. After the ceremony, which was conducted with great pomp, Sir R. WILSON proceeded to dine with his friends at the Horns, Kennington; and Mr. CALVERT, to the London Tavern.

POPULAR VOICE.—"As a portion of the people have expressed a desire that the form of civil government in this State should be revised, this highly interesting subject will probably engage your deliberation. I presume that it will not be proposed by any one to impair our institutions, or to abridge any one of the rights and privileges of the people. The State of Connecticut, as at present constituted, is, in my opinion, the most venerable and precious monument of republican government existing among them. With the exception of less than two years from its first settlement, embracing a period nearly coeval with the revival of civil and religious liberty in Europe, all the powers of government have been directly derived from the people. The Governors and Counsellors have been annually, and the representatives of towns semi-annually, elected by the freemen, who have always constituted the great body of the people. Nor has the manifestation of the power of freedom been confined to the elections. They have ever been accustomed to public consultations and deliberations of intricacy and importance. Their meetings have been generally conducted with the same order and decorum as those of this assembly. No instance is known in which a single life has been lost in consequence of any mob, tumult, or popular commotion. The support of religion, elementary schools, paupers, public roads and bridges, comprising about 8-10ths of the public expenses, has been constantly derived from taxes imposed by the votes of the people; and the most interesting regulations of our police have ever been, and still are, enforced by officers deriving their powers from annual popular appointments."—Extract from the Speech of the President of Connecticut, May 16, 1818.

A French paper states, that the Bashaw of EGYPT has sent agents to Europe, to engage artists and skilful manufacturers to settle under his Government. He is fond of botany, and purchases exotics at a large price. He subscribes for the periodical journals of Paris, and has lately given an order for about 600 volumes of French works. He has particularly desired that all accounts of the Bell and Lancasterian methods of instruction should be sent to him, as he means to apply that system of education to the Arabs. The Parisians call him the Pacha liberal.

A few days ago DAVID TORRINGTON, a labourer in the London Docks, made a bet with one of his fellow-workmen that he could drink two points of rum in an hour, and still be able to do his work. He accordingly drank the rum, and immediately fell into a slumber, out of which his companions could not rouse him; and he was carried in a state of insensibility to the hospital, where he remained in that situation for three days. At last he became sufficiently sensible to inform the surgeon he had drank the liquor; but an inflammation of the bowels having taken place, he died on Thursday.

CASE OF LADY EMILY VANE TEMPEST.—Yesterday morning, contrary to general expectation (it being the day for receiving the Monthly Report of his Majesty's health), the Lord Chancellor took his seat in Court, when, after some business had been transacted, the Counsel and Solicitors in the above Case having come into Court, the Lord Chancellor proceeded into his private apartment, where, it is said, his Lordship delivered judgment; but the proceedings having been conducted with the utmost secrecy, we cannot now give the result.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

Extract of a letter from Dover, dated June 29:—"Last evening, about nine o'clock, the Prince and Princess of HESSE-HOMBURG arrived from Brighton, in an open carriage, under a salute from the guns at the heights, and the huzzas of the spectators. A guard of honour of the Rifle Brigade was drawn up in front of Wright's Hotel. In the course of the night, the Royal Sovereign yacht came round from the Downs into the Roads, the barge of which was rowed up opposite to the Hotel. The attendants having been previously embarked in the Custom-house-boat, their Highnesses descended the steps into the barge (which was covered with an awning of green silk) at 11 o'clock, and the instant the Royal standard was displayed at the main, the guns fired a salute. Upon the Royal party reaching the yacht, the yards were manned, the sails unfurled, and she soon moved majestically over the waves; but from there being no wind, it is feared they had a long passage.

Wednesday morning, the Duke and Duchess of KENT arrived with their suite in four carriages at Claremont, the seat of the Duchess's brother, Prince LEOPOLD, who was in readiness, with his attendants, to receive his Royal Sister and the Royal Duke.

The following is a letter from Dover, dated June 30:—"This morning the Royal Sovereign yacht anchored in the Roads, from France, with the Duke of KENT and his Duchess, and at 11 o'clock the barge brought them into the harbour, under a salute from the heights. Immediately on landing, their Highnesses got into their travelling chariot and drove off for London. The Princess appeared a tall genteel figure, and was affable to all by condescendingly bowing out of the coach-window to the many cheers which greeted her from all ranks."

It seems after all, that the marriage of the Duke of CLARENCE with the Princess of SAXE-MEININGEN is to take place. Viscount KEITH, it is said, the Treasurer and Comptroller of his Royal Highness's household, has set off for Dover, there to receive her Serene Highness, who will be conveyed, with her ladies and attendants, from Calais in the Royal Sovereign yacht; and their arrival, it is even added, may be expected on Sunday or Monday.—Daily paper.

Sir W. CURTIS gave a grand dinner on Tuesday, at his house, Southgate, to upwards of fifty persons of distinction, amongst whom were—The PRINCE REGENT, the Duke of YORK, the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, the Prince of HESSE, the Grand Duke MICHAEL, Baron FAGEL, most of the Cabinet Ministers, and a numerous list of Nobility.—Evening paper.

MR. WORDSWORTH AND THE WEST-MORELAND ELECTION.

In this contest between sycophancy and independence, a number of election squibs are of course put forth by both parties. A certain Poet is said to have taken part in the literary drudgery of the patronage side of the question, and in the division of labour, with a view to that of the spoil—to have taken upon him to find out and expose the bad grammar of his rustic and less classical opponents.

By the bye, Mr. Wordsworth (to drop the incognito) at one time considered the rustic and the classical in language as the same thing, and preferred the uninformed idioms of his native county to the poetical diction of Pope's Homer. His antagonists retorted on our lyrical hypercritic, that what they wanted was not grammatical niceties, but the diminution of taxes, which they did not think a dependent on a lordly boroughmonger would labour hard to promote. This was the common sense of the question, at which no doubt the poetical distributor of stamps would sneer in his sardonic way. But they might have answered him in his own way, and not left him one gibe "to mock his own grinning." In Mr. W.'s Letter to Mr. Gray, of Edinburgh (the dullest and most contemptible prose-composition in the language) is the following passage:—

"Whom did the poet intend should be thought of as occupying that grave over which, after modestly setting forth the moral discernment and warm affections of its poor inhabitant," it is supposed to be inscribed that

"Thoughtless follies laid him low,
And stained his name."

Who but himself—himself anticipating the too probable termination of his own course?—P. 27.

Who but Mr. Wordsworth, a person triumphing over the slips of the pen in an electioneering placard, would have put to the press such a sentence as this? We leave it to his friend Mr. Coleridge to extricate him from this grammatical scrape, unless Mr. Coleridge, since the publication of the first number of the Encyclopedia Metropolitana, has conceived as unconquerable an aversion to his favourite study of grammar as he has (from a similar failure) to the principles of jacobinism. Or if Mr. C. should decline to interfere, perhaps Dr. Stoddart (who corrects the press for Mr. Coleridge, making double nonsense of what he writes) may undertake the same friendly office for Mr. Wordsworth, and translate the above passage into legitimate English. Since the stoppage of his Correspondence with the Duke of Leeds, this professional gentleman has a great deal of disposeable controversial and "excellent senseless" matter lying on his hands.

DRURY-LANE.

THE Season closed here on Tuesday night with the following Address from Mr. HENRY JOHNSTON:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—This evening being fixed upon to terminate the Season of Dramatic Performances at this Theatre, permit me most respectfully to return you thanks for that share of your patronage you have so kindly condescended to bestow on our zealous endeavours to merit your applause. I can truly assert, that the efforts of the Drury-lane Company, both collectively and individually, have been most liberally honoured with the approbation of a generous and discriminating public, always their most gratifying reward. I now, Ladies and Gentlemen, for myself and the Company in general, beg leave once more to offer our sincere thanks, and to assure you, that although the success of the present has been, from the peculiar circumstances of the times, less in point of emolument than that of some preceding seasons, our exertions will not be relaxed during the recess; and we hope with confidence to meet our patrons with a prospect of the success it will ever be our most anxious study to deserve at your hands; and we most respectfully take leave all the next season.

We trust that this anticipation will turn out to be well founded. The great failure of attraction in Drury-Lane last season, compared with Covent-Garden, has always been a mystery to us; though, to be sure, the public taste had been so vitiated for many years by compositions which it at last learnt to reject, that it could not be expected to go from bad to good in an instant; and accordingly, it has seemed to put up in the mean while with the mere impression which the actors had left on it's mind, and to delight in going to see MUNDEN, LESTON, and others, in any new thing provided it was not of the former species. Now it has been unfortunate for Drury-Lane that MUNDEN during the late season has been kept back with the gout, while LESTON and a new favourite singer, Miss STEPHENS, have always been in readiness at Covent-Garden. LESTON returned, it seems, only for a few nights, and though retaining a great deal of excellence, was found to have fallen off in some respects; and KEAN, whose generous and inflexible attachment to the theatre which first brought him into reputation begets feelings amounting to the affectionate, could not always be acting. There is one thing very honourable to the Drury-Lane management, and one thing far from honourable to the public, both of which, we think, conspired to hurt it: the first was, the performance of the elder comedy, though not the oldest;—and the second, a report of its being much poorer than Covent-Garden,—a fearful thing in these money-getting times. And yet we should rather say, that it was something in the mode of performing the productions alluded to,—which hurt the theatre, rather than the revivals themselves; and it will be worth while the serious consideration of the managers, how far they can venture as they did in putting such very middling actors into good parts. It is in vain that they alledge, as they justly may, the excellence of some of their comic performers, or even the superiority of some of them to those of Covent-garden, the female for instance. The vanity of modern audiences has been so pampered in various ways, chiefly by the ridiculous flattery of writers, that while they have learnt to despise these very writers, without yet getting at a proper sense of what is better, they are much quicker to be offended with badness in a performer, than to be pleased with goodness; and as long as Covent-garden takes greater care not to offend in this respect, the more ambitious or what are called classical attempts of Drury-lane will be foiled by it's suffering a greater contrast of good and bad in the performers. Nor is this contrast, abstractedly considered, without heavy objections to it; so that the latter theatre, we hope, will take great care next season, and at once do justice to itself and leave the taste of the public without an excuse for not amending. We own we have a great regard for that cheerful house, celebrated for it's associations with comedy, with liberality of all sorts (one late uncomfortable proposal excepted), with the name of the last genuine dramatist, and with that of the greatest living performer, who is also a generous-hearted man. We have shewn an interest for it's welfare under these circumstances, which we might not otherwise have done; and will even say, with more regard for the theatre than self-love, that we trust and believe it will not be shown in vain!

FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVINGS.

To those whose imaginations are alive to the impressions of that beauty which more or less appears in almost every object in the material world, portraiture of every kind, ably performed, is recommended even in its least interesting view of private or unknown individuals. Attitude, air, effect, drawing, afford matter of pleasing attention. What a number of VANDYKES are there of this kind. But when these executive beauties are the medium by which a public character is presented to us, the pleasure is greatly enhanced. There is perhaps hardly any species of curiosity more keen in its appetite than the desire to see the face and form of any one rendered conspicuous by his knowledge, his genius, his virtue, or his vice, or any extraordinary circumstance. For these reasons, we are glad to possess one of the portraits which has just now appeared, from Mr. WORTHINGTON'S graver, of Mr. STOTHARD, especially as it will form so suitable an accompaniment to the beautiful print, after Mr. STOTHARD'S celebrated picture of the Canterbury Pilgrims, which beautiful print we have hung up in our room in emulation to blank walls, our admiration of genius, and our regard to our own pleasure. It is faithfully executed from an excellent portrait by Mr. HARLOWE, in which every one who knows Mr. STOTHARD must instantly see his express look, his capacious forehead, his full features, where benevolence and solid thinking are striving for the mastery in noble expression. In this practice of hanging up in our rooms the portraits of the eminent in the Polite Arts, we compensate to them in some degree for the want of that still greater encouragement to genius practiced by the Greeks, when they raised statues of them in the view of the public, and did them other public honours.

Another large portrait, just published, of WELLINGTON, is engraved by Mr. BECMLEY, after Sir T. LAWRENCE, with fidelity to the original, which is considered strongly resemblant of the life. Besides the drawing, which is by an Engraver who designs well himself, it is to be praised for its possessing Sir THOMAS'S peculiar style of pencil, &c. This knowledge and practice of drawing, together with the just taste the Engraver has been ever distinguished for, has enabled him to give a more than an accustomed portion of painter-like suavity of manner to his touches, and especially to his sculptural grain, which, even in most fine prints, is laboured, and inexpressive of the object represented.

R. H.

ON THE TREATMENT OF BONAPARTE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—Seeing a paragraph lately in the Courier, which stated that a sailor had climbed up the rocks of St. Helena and obtained an interview with the Ex-emperor Napoleon, I beg leave to call your attention to the great improbability of such an occurrence having really taken place. There are but two places in the whole Island, where this circumstance could have happened, and both of them are under the eyes of centinels. The distance at which the Ex-emperor resides from the shore, the line of centinels surrounding the house in full view of it during the day, and drawn close around it at sunset, are precautions fully sufficient to prevent the approach of any intruder without his being observed. It cannot be supposed that the soldiers were wilfully remiss in their duty; and if they were not, it is plain that the whole is a mere fiction. It seems to me, that some fresh restraints may have been contemplated by the amiable gaoler of the great man in question, and that this modern Sinbad has mounted the cliffs to furnish an excuse for it. Unless the story was merely a hoax, played off by some Jack tar on his comrades, I shall ever be of this opinion. The Courier and its flagitious patrons know how to turn these incidents to their own ends. The attempt said to have been made to correspond with Napoleon, by means of newspaper advertisements, mentioned by Lord Bathurst in the House of Peers, occasioned the denial of the opposition newspapers to Napoleon, as if they alone were likely to insert such dangerous articles! This latter tale, invented by the editor of an obscure weekly paper in London, at present employed by the French police to answer the attacks of "Dominie Stoddart"* and his ultra-royalist correspondent, was sufficient to alarm our sapient Cabinet into this restriction. I am not at present inclined to dispute the policy of keeping Napoleon a prisoner, at least for some years; but, for the sake of the national honour, I must protest against the mean and cowardly way in which it has been done. We have a Ministry in all its parts so remote from greatness of character, so much the reverse of wise, liberal, and enlightened, so innately conscious of its weakness and its crimes, that it governs in fear of every moving thing. A few rioters occasion the suspension of a fundamental law; military forces are kept ready to act in case of a trifling tumult, at every wake, fair, or election in the country; but the fear of a man of talent and capacity, though imprisoned 6000 miles off on a barren rock, and guarded by regiments on land and a squadron at sea, gives it sleepless nights and all the cold shiverings of spectre-struck womanhood. If it is much more alarmed, we may expect to hear of a dungeon of cast iron, and the chains of Trenk, being sent out to the rock of St. Helena for the prisoner. Such are the effects of the moral ascendancy of elevated character and genius, over infantine understanding and grovelling intellect!

I much wonder no notice has been taken of the reasons for the appointment of the amiable Sir H. Lowe to the command at St. Helena by the public prints. Most probably he was fixed upon, because he was known to be obnoxious to the Ex-emperor, on account of his former intimacy with the Comte de Lisle (now Louis le Desiré), and from his having been Colonel of a regiment of Corsican renegades,* in our service, relative to the raising of which some curious facts might be related. Between such an officer, and the French Commissioner, as he is called, residing on the island, there are no doubt habits of strict intercourse; and perhaps frequent communications with the Government of the latter country may take place, of which even our keen Ministers can know nothing. While there are so many distinguished officers in our Navy and Army (as Sir G. Cockburn for instance), who have the claim of wounds and long active service to back them, who know how to do their duty strictly and yet like gentlemen, wonder is very naturally excited at the appointment of the present Governor, a man of repugnant manners, and apparently incapable of that nice feeling proper for the office he holds.

When Ministers passed the extraordinary act for sending Napoleon to St. Helena,—as if he could not have been securely guarded in England,—some means should have been taken to regulate every thing regarding the prisoner by Parliament itself. The mere ipse dixit of the Governor is the only information to be obtained relative to Napoleon, and this must pass the office of Lord Bathurst. The Governor denies that Napoleon has been subjected to any privations; General Bertrand contradicts the Governor; and the word of the latter, to any impartial man, is as good as that of the former. Indeed the character of the latter calls for the admiration of every thinking man, and will be a theme of eulogium in future history. Were George III. banished to a desolate rock, like the late Emperor of France, it is my firm opinion not one of his Ministers would follow him to his exile, not even my Lord Liverpool, his purse-keeper. They are too like the Janissaries of the unfortunate Selim III. With them the point of honour was not attachment to their Sovereign, the defence of the holy standard, or the sacred interests of their country, but only the preservation of their own kettles and their own porridge pots.

If, Mr. Editor, we regarded our own interests, we should keep Napoleon in safe custody only, and in every other respect treat him as a great man who had been ruler of a great country, and whom the reverses of fortune had thrown into our power. Of this magnanimity, however, our rulers are incapable. The time may come when his existence will be essential to our interests; and the dictates of humanity urge us to treat him with a proper consideration of who he is and what he has been. After the confessions of Maubreuil, to which he who writes this was an auditor, (who has been permitted to escape from France, because they dared not deal with him according to the laws, for fear of his further disclosure), we are doubly bound to protect as well as guard Napoleon, who would undoubtedly fall a victim speedily, if the influence of some could prevail in regard to his treatment.—I am, Mr. Editor, yours, &c. W. X.

CRUEL EXHIBITION.

MR. EXAMINER.—In the shop window of a chemist, at No. 7, Baker-street, Portman-square, are two glass vessels, in which snakes are kept, and fed upon live frogs.

I observe that the snakes sometimes lie in a dormant state for a considerable time after a frog is put into the vessel, so that, in addition to the dreadful and lingering death which the wretched animal suffers when seized by a snake (and which I and many others have seen with shuddering), it is made to undergo the horrors of cruel and protracted apprehension, which are manifested in its great agitation, and repeated and exhausting attempts to escape.

Perhaps you may think proper to look into the shop window, over which is written—"Jones, Chemist and Druggist."

The following is an extract from Mr. Benjamin Martin's Young Gentleman and Lady's Philosophy, in which Cleonicus thus addresses Euphrosyne:—"Being angling by the side of a brook, my ears were assailed, gradually, by some poor creature in distress, with the most dismal, dreadful, and lamentable screams and cries I ever yet heard. I was greatly affected with the long continuance of these melancholy notes and cries, and ran this way and that by the side of the brook, to find out what and where it was. At last I discovered, under an old overhanging alder, a large serpent sucking a full grown frog into his mouth; and though the noise had already continued long and loud, no more than one hind leg and thigh were yet drawn into the jaws of the snake. I then gave him a smatch with my rod, which made him let go the frog, and swim off precipitately for his own safety."

Leaving the offender in your strong hand, I remain, Sir, your obedient humble servant,
E. W.

LAW.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Wednesday, July 1.

JOHN ROGERS v. PARR POPKIN.

The declaration stated, that on or about the 13th March, 1812, the defendant made an assault upon the plaintiff, and imprisoned him for a certain number of days, by means of which the plaintiff was unable to carry on his business, &c.

Mr. GURNEY observed, that the plaintiff, a jeweller, sought a compensation for a great injury inflicted upon him by the defendant, an attorney of the Court. There had been dealings between the parties long before the date of this transaction; and in the spring of 1817, Mr. Rogers, who resided in Pall-mall, became indebted to Mr. Popkin, of Dean-street, Soho, in a considerable sum upon bills of exchange. The latter took the security of a warrant of attorney to confess a judgment empowering him to sue out execution against the plaintiff's person and property; but in the course of that year the whole sum due to the defendant was discharged. Mr. Popkin had, however, taken the precaution of entering up his judgment, and had lodged the warrant of attorney in the sheriff's office, that his claim, if any, might be prior to that of any other creditor. In Nov. 1817, all accounts between the parties were closed, and the plaintiff, not owing a shilling to the defendant, required that the warrant of attorney should be given up to be cancelled; but Mr. Popkin evaded the demand, observing, that it had been filed and could not be removed, but the plaintiff need not be under any apprehension about it, as it was done with. The plaintiff and defendant up to this period had been on terms of friendship, but between Nov. 1817 and March 1818 they differed: the Jury would be aware how dangerous it often was to excite the enmity of an attorney armed with power, and disposed to exercise that power unjustly and illegally; at least the facts of this case proved that it was extremely perilous, for on the 13th of March last, without the slightest previous intimation, or a moment's notice, without any claim even of the smallest amount, the plaintiff was taken into custody at the suit of Mr. Popkin, on a writ for 164*l.*, besides the sheriff's poundage. This conduct could not but excite the utmost astonishment, and it proved of the utmost inconvenience to the plaintiff. No bail could be given, for it was not an arrest upon mesne process; and it was a month before the commencement of the term, when the plaintiff might have been relieved by application to the Court. This Mr. Popkin well knew—his purpose was to keep the plaintiff as long as possible in confinement, and, if possible, to ruin him. He refused to consent that the money should be placed in the hands of the Sheriff, to abide the event of any proceeding; and the plaintiff was compelled to take out three summonses before he could be released from durance. If Mr. Popkin had only wished for the safety of his debt, he might have appeared to the first, and consented to the discharge of the party; but he delayed to the utmost extent (not being under the necessity of appearing before the third summons), and at last resisted the application. Lord Ellenborough, however, directed that on depositing the money, the plaintiff should be set at liberty. This proceeding occupied no less than eight days, during which the plaintiff was in a lock-up-house in Warwick-court. As the plaintiff was perfectly certain that he did not owe a farthing to the defendant, either upon the warrant of attorney on which he had taken out execution, or otherwise, he applied very early in the term to set aside the judgment; and after some discussion it was deemed expedient to refer the matter to Mr. Reader, the barrister, who finally made his award, declaring that there was not the least pretence for the debt on which the plaintiff had been imprisoned. What then could be said too severe of any man who had been guilty of such unheard-of oppression; but, above all, what could be said of an attorney of the Court, who had proceeded against his better knowledge, merely for the gratification of his own dark malice? That malice had actuated Mr. Popkin was obvious from the whole transaction; but if any thing were wanting to prove it beyond contradiction, the defendant himself had supplied the evidence; for he had avowed to a Mr. Kely (the next door neighbour of the plaintiff) that his purpose was to ruin Mr. Rogers, and that failure must be the consequence of his imprisonment. The plaintiff, therefore, had a triple claim to compensation: first, the injury and suffering he had sustained; next, the consciousness of the defendant that he was acting illegally and unwarrantably; and, lastly, the black and inveterate malice by which it was clear he had been actuated.

* This appellation is surely justifiable, when applied to men who enlist in the service of a nation at war with their country.

Mr. Kely and other witnesses having been examined,

Mr. TOPPING submitted that the defendant had had nothing to do with the arrest; he had merely put the writ into the hand of the officer; and it had been settled that a plaintiff was not liable for false imprisonment, unless he was actually present at the arrest of the party.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT.—He is not liable for any irregularity by the officer, but he is liable for the act of arrest, if it be illegal.

Mr. TOPPING then addressed himself to the Jury, contending that all the facts were not and could not be before them, and regretting that the arbitrator had not thought fit to give any directions whether the present action should be brought.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT, in summing up, went through the testimony. It appeared, that the plaintiff had been unjustly confined for seven or eight days, though Mr. Popkin, with perfect security to his own claim (if he had had any), might have released him on the third. Under these circumstances, it was peculiarly the province of the Jury to assign reasonable and temperate compensation to the party for the injury he had received.

The Jury consulted for a few minutes, and found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 84*l.*—[It was admitted on all hands in the course of the proceeding, that the 164*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, deposited in the hands of the Sheriff, had been repaid to the plaintiff, with cost, according to the award of Mr. Reader.]

KING'S BENCH, DUBLIN.

Tuesday, June 23.

JONES v. CARRICK.

Mr. MANTLEY opened the pleading. He said, that this was a special action for a libel. The plaintiff, Frederick Edward Jones, was proprietor of the Theatre Royal; the defendant, John Carrick, was proprietor of a newspaper, Carrick's Morning Post; and he had published in his paper a libel concerning the said Frederick Edward Jones, for the purpose of holding him up to public contempt and ridicule, and injuring his character and property. The alleged libel was then set out. The damages were laid at Two Thousand Pounds, and the defendant pleaded the general issue.

Mr. Serjeant JOY stated the case on the part of the plaintiff. All difficulty respecting the application of the libel was removed by the annotations. The following is the poetry:—

"Thus excited, we chatted of players and poets,
"Of the stars and the sparks—of the brilliant and low wits;
"And grieved, when he found out by certain things read,
"That the genius of drama was dying or dead—
"That the 'lights' of old Crow-street, so bright and inspiring,
"Like sun-beams at evening, were slowly retiring—
"Yet lingering and loth as a midsummer's day,
"Till unkindness and tyranny force them away;
"And whatever of merit or worth that remains,
"Depends upon whatever of Cash he detains.
"Who wields about Crow-street so wildly the reins,
"But, alas! the perspective still darker we find,
"Though bad at the best, yet, 'the worst is behind.'
"For the Viceregal sceptre (albeit almost barren),
"Will soon be resigned by our favourite FAUNCE."

And now for the annotation:—

"The affairs of Drury-lane Theatre suffered all the mischiefs which could arise from the imprudence or inability of the Manager, Fleetwood. That Gentleman had embarrassed his domestic concerns, by almost every species of misconduct. He was one of those happy prodigies in life, which people gaze at, but cannot understand; who, without a visible sixpence of his own, continued to lavish away thousands; bustled on with Drury Lane for more than ten years, during all which time the Theatre continued in great distress, and laboured under every inconvenience. But what renders the circumstance so extraordinary is, that while the whole theatrical train scarcely gleaned from the profits money sufficient to sustain existence, their profligate Manager was figuring away, and enjoying every luxury. Fleetwood at last found himself involved in such difficulties, that there remained no other means of extricating himself from them but * * *

But what? (continued Serjeant Joy) Three stars! What is the meaning of the three stars, Gentlemen? Something too bad to be expressed! But this is not all. We are told, "The text is in Gulliland's Dramatic Mirror—we know where to look for the commentary."

Mr. GRADY stated the case of the defendant in a speech which occupied near two hours and a half in the delivery.

No witnesses were examined on the part of the defendant. Lord NORMANBY charged the Jury, leaving the question altogether to their decision. They retired for a short time, and then brought in a verdict for the defendant. This verdict was received by a very crowded Court, with three distinct rounds of applause!

POLICE.

CROW-STREET.

On Monday Mr. Lee, the high constable of Westminster, was charged with committing an assault upon Mr. Henry Hunt, on Saturday night, during the time he was addressing the assemblage in Covent-garden.

Mr. Hunt.—I was on the railing at the front of the hustings. I saw Mr. Lee acting in the capacity of constable, with a silver staff in his hand. Without any provocation on my part, while I was speaking to the assemblage before me, he used most abusive language, and challenged me to fight. The words he used were, "Curse you, I will fight you, not with this (his constable's staff), but with these (holding up his clenched fists in a menacing attitude): I thought I should have you at last." On the first day of the election, last Thursday week, I was also assaulted by him; he threatened to wring the nose off my face.

Sir NATHANIEL.—There was some altercation at that time between you: how did it arise?

Mr. Hunt.—He asked me "what business I had there?"

told him that I was a candidate, and had a right to be there, as I had to pay a share of the expense in erecting the hustings. He replied, "I don't care a curse who you are—I know you—and if you don't come off, I will wring the nose from your face." I told him, that if he dared only to lay a finger on me, I would beat his head from his body.

Mr. West, wire-worker, Wych-street, said, Mr. Lee shook his fist in a menacing attitude in Mr. Hunt's face. I heard some words used by both Mr. Hunt and Mr. Lee, but could not at all distinguish what they said.

Mr. Dolbie—I was upon the hustings, and saw Mr. Lee acting very disorderly: he had a staff in his hand, which he brandished in the face of Mr. Hunt. I heard him say a short time after to Mr. Hunt's son,—"The conduct of your father is so outrageous, that if no one else will fight him, I will fight him myself;" and shook his staff in the boy's face as he spoke the words.

Sir NATHANIEL.—It has been declared before me, Mr. Lee, that your conduct has been intemperate as the head of the constables. Your task upon such an occasion is no easy one. I cannot try the cause between you; it had better go before a jury.

Mr. Lee.—I deny most positively that I acted to the extent which the witnesses have stated. Mr. Hunt endeavoured to excite the mob against me, and beckoned to his dumb brother to come down and beat me; and I told him, if he dared to come down, that I would chastise him.

Sir NATHANIEL said, Mr. Lee had better reserve the remainder of his defence for the trial; and required him to enter into recognizances, himself in 100*l.*, and two housekeepers in 50*l.* each, for his appearance at the sessions.

Several gentlemen of Sir Murray Maxwell's Committee, who were in the office, then became Mr. Lee's bail.

Soon after the speeches were concluded on Monday, the mob in Covent-garden proceeded to commit some acts of rioting. It was impossible to distinguish to which of the parties the most turbulent belonged, or rather, whose cause they pretended to support. The windows of the Committee-room of Sir Murray Maxwell, at Richardson's Hotel, were broken by one party, and the windows of the Committee-room of Sir Samuel Romilly, nearly adjoining, by another. After this a general confusion prevailed, when Sir N. Conant and Mr. Birnie came to the spot, and the riot act was read. The mob not dispersing, Sir N. Conant despatched a message to the Horse-Guards, and a Captain and several Life-Guards were immediately sent to aid the civil power. The Magistrates then went to Richardson's Hotel, and several persons who had been the most active in the disturbance were brought before them. Some were charged with having broken windows, others with having committed acts of personal violence on the police-officers, and a third party with having broken a car belonging to the friends of Sir M. Maxwell. About twelve o'clock in the day the canvassing friends of this candidate had filled the car with men in the dress of sailors, and they inconsiderately attempted to draw it past the hustings, in the line from Henrietta-street to King-street. After they had proceeded about half way, they were driven back, and found it necessary to retire altogether. About four o'clock, however, the car appeared in another part of Westminster, carrying men armed with bludgeons, and wearing the colours of Sir Murray Maxwell in their hats. The opposite party fell in with them in Poland-street, and a regular battle ensued. The sailors, or those who wore their dress, were soon defeated, the colours were torn from their hats, and the car itself demolished. A report prevailed that one man had been killed; this was not the fact. Another report stated, that the mob had proceeded to pull down part of Mr. Richardson's premises, but the whole injury was confined to a few broken panes of glass. After hearing the several charges, the Magistrates committed the following persons to the prison in Coldbath-fields. They were sent in hackney-coaches, guarded by the military:—John Benbrook, Wm. Jefferys, Wm. Smith, John Coleman, John Whately, Wm. Wager, Wm. Williams, John McCormack, Robert Pigeon, James Evans, Aaron Pond, Richard Williams, John Coleman, Wm. Halley, James Mould, James Barnes, David Fitzgerald, Samuel Fagg, Michael Casey, Wm. Deall, Wm. Smith, Robert Jenkinson, Wm. Richardson, Wm. Harris, Pat. Magann, alias Burne, Thomas Farrant.

On Monday, John Bates was charged with being ringleader of the riots at Covent-garden and its neighbourhood, being concerned in the first attack upon the car or cutter which was drawn about town by the party of Sir Murray Maxwell.—John Blazey said, that on Monday afternoon he saw the prisoner in Oxford-street, carrying away a pole belonging to the cutter, which had been drawn about with the colours of Sir Murray Maxwell. The prisoner's hat was at the top of the pole, with a flag attached to it, and he was carrying it about in triumph, calling out "Burdett for ever," &c.—The prisoner was committed.—The several persons who were taken into custody on Monday evening underwent examinations before Mr. Birnie, four of them at a time being placed at the bar.—John Huggins, a special constable, stated, that he observed one of the prisoners active among the crowd. He first told him to go about his business at six o'clock, but he paid no attention, remaining among the crowd till the soldiers arrived between seven and eight o'clock, when he several times called the Life Guardsmen "Piccadilly butchers," hooted and hallooed at them, &c. His evidence was confirmed by George Judge and John Chesworth, who stated, that he saw the prisoner Jeffries heading the mob about seven o'clock; and a little after seven, he saw him armed with the handle of a birch broom, and striking at the constables with it.—George Dalton, an officer belonging to the Whitechapel Police-Office, saw the prisoners, Farrant and Jeffries, very active among the crowd, and he saw them both pelting at people with various hard substances: Farrant, in his defence, said he was a labouring man, and had been employed during the election, as a porter, by Sir F. Burdett's Committee. He was merely passing through the mob, and he was taken into custody at seven o'clock, and therefore the officer must be mistaken as to him.—Several were ordered to find bail, and some were discharged.

On Friday a singular scene was exhibited at the hustings, Covent-garden. Mr. Hunt, it appears, who throughout the Election has rendered himself conspicuous by pointing out various persons to the indignation of the multitude (in some cases uttering insinuations of too gross a nature to repeat), thought proper, on Thursday evening, in his way from Covent-garden, to halt with his party in front of three newspaper offices, in the Strand, where, after certain denunciations against these journals, he delivered copies of each to certain friends in attendance, by whom they were immediately burnt. He next proceeded to the office of a Sunday paper, where, after some allusions to the character of that paper, he went on to state, that this newspaper had been bribed to calumniate him. He attributed the change which had taken place in a paper called the Observer, to the circumstance of an individual being (as he termed it) at the head of its reporters, of the name of Mr. Vincent George Dowling. "This was no other than the well known Spectacle Dowling, the Spy." The person he meant was Mr. Dowling, who had been employed by Lord Sidmouth to take notes of the speeches of the two Watsons, in Spafelds, and who afterwards gave his evidence upon the State trials. The circumstance having been communicated to Mr. Dowling, he on Friday proceeded to the hustings as early as ten o'clock, provided with a horse-whip. Soon after, Mr. Hunt, accompanied by his son, his dumb brother, Mr. West, of Wych-street, and others, entered, when Mr. Dowling advanced and struck him several blows over the head and shoulders with his whip. In a moment the confusion became general, the crowd closed upon Mr. Dowling, and Mr. West and others seized him by the collar, and, depriving him of his whip, prevented on his part further violence. During the fracas, the dumb brother and the younger Mr. Hunt contrived to strike him some blows upon the face. The civil power had by this time so effectually interfered, that all further violence was suppressed. Mr. Dowling soon afterwards appeared at this office, where he preferred a charge of assault against the dumb Mr. Hunt.

This person, together with Mr. Henry Hunt and his son, entered the office, and Mr. Birnie proceeded to hear the charge, which was simply that of Mr. Dowling having been struck by the defendant, while in a situation in which he was unable to defend himself. In answer to this charge, the defendant, through the medium of his brother, who acted as interpreter, asserted that he had been first struck by the complainant.

Several gentlemen now came forward, and declared upon their oaths that they had seen Mr. Dowling strike Mr. Henry Hunt several blows across the head and shoulders with his horse-whip, but denied most positively that he struck the defendant.

Mr. Henry Hunt said, that he had been informed, one hour before he came to the hustings, that he was to be horsewhipped, and was advised to bring his stick to defend himself, but that he had determined to come to the hustings unprepared with any weapon.

Mr. Dowling said he did not mean to deny that he had come to the hustings for the purpose of horsewhipping Mr. Hunt, and admitted that he had effected that intention as far as it was necessary to evince his feelings, and to chastise a person whose calumny was as malignant as it was false.

Mr. BIRNIE said, that sitting as a Magistrate, he had but one course to pursue, and that was to bind both parties over to the Sessions, Mr. Dowling for horse-whipping Mr. Henry Hunt, and the dumb Mr. Hunt for assaulting Mr. Dowling.

Mr. H. Hunt here produced a letter, which he said he had received about five months since, in which he was informed that Mr. Dowling had declared that he would horsewhip him wherever he met him; and that he (Mr. Hunt) was prevented from appearing at the election for Lord Mayor, in consequence of that threat.

Mr. Dowling denied that he had ever expressed such an intention, and entered into an explanation of circumstances connected with a former transaction between him and Mr. Hunt, from which it appeared that it was the opinion of his friends "he would degrade himself" by taking any further notice of an individual who had tamely submitted to the epithets applied to him in a letter published by him, Mr. Dowling, in the newspapers. This letter was written from Hereford, and was in answer to an attack made upon him by Mr. Hunt at a public dinner, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, when Mr. Hunt coupled his name with the most infamous of characters. Mr. Dowling also begged to state, that these attacks arose out of the circumstances of his having been a witness upon the State Trials. That he had the misfortune to be a witness was true, but he declared in the most solemn manner that it was solely from accident, and that at the time he went to Spa-field he had not the most remote anticipation of what subsequently took place.

Mr. BIRNIE now said, that having heard Mr. Dowling so fully, he was ready to hear Mr. Hunt in explanation also.

Mr. Hunt admitted that he had said Mr. Dowling was the person who had given evidence of speeches upon the state trials, which nobody but himself could hear.

Mr. BIRNIE said he felt himself bound to call upon Mr. Dowling to find sureties to keep the peace towards Mr. Henry Hunt; and at the same time, he must also call upon Mr. William Hunt to find similar sureties with regard to Mr. Dowling.

Mr. Hunt immediately said he did not wish that Mr. Dowling should be held in any sureties.

Mr. BIRNIE—What not for horsewhipping you, Mr. Hunt?

Mr. Hunt—No, it was a mere nothing; my brother received the blows ten times harder than I did; and I should not now even be afraid of Mr. Dowling and 100 such Irish bullies!

Mr. Dowling now said, that the latter remark of Mr. Hunt was not one which perhaps could properly be replied to in the presence of a magistrate, but that since Mr. Hunt was so courteous, he was inclined to be equally so, and should not insist upon Mr. William Hunt being put to the trouble of entering into recognizances, as, if he considered it necessary, he could take other steps hereafter.

Mr. BIRNIE thought both gentlemen had acted in this respect with great prudence, and complimented Mr. Hunt on his forbearance. He could not, however, dismiss the case without recommending Mr. Hunt to teach his son, and his brother more particularly (who was unfortunately deaf and dumb), habits of peace and good order.

The parties then withdrew.

On Thursday, a person, calling himself William Charles Gregory, pretending to be a clergyman, underwent a long examination before Sir Nathaniel Conant and Rich. Birnie, Esq. charged with having committed a great variety of frauds and deceptions. The prisoner, it appeared, had assumed different names and characters, and fabricated letters, with forged franks. He was committed.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

FATAL BOXING.—Monday afternoon, two men who were employed in a large manufactory near Golder's-green, Hampstead, had a quarrel, and agreed to decide it instantly upon the Green. In less than five minutes one of them, of the name of Downly, received so violent a blow under the ear, that he fell down and expired immediately.

Thursday evening, a little after six o'clock, when the doors of Covent-garden Theatre were opened for the admission of the audience, Mr. Rowe, the principal check-taker at the two-shilling gallery, while stationed in his place, suddenly dropped from his seat and expired.

Thursday morning, a young woman, rather genteelly dressed, after walking a considerable time in a desponding manner near the Serpentine River, threw herself in. Some young men bathing witnessed the event, and after some time, succeeding in rescuing her from a watery grave. She gave her name as "Waller," of Paddington, and stated, that the cause of her attempt was the marriage of a young man, who had formerly paid his addresses to her, to another young woman. She was then carried home, and is in a fair way of recovery.

On Thursday morning, about one o'clock, the attention of one of the sentries stationed on the Pagoda Bridge, was attracted by two females who were crying, conversing, and shaking hands with each other. He at length saw them salute and part; one of them went to one side of the bridge, and the other proceeded to the opposite side, and, climbing on the balustrade, they hung by their hands; the sentry instantly ran to one, and laying hold of her whilst suspended, he effected his purpose in saving her life. During this interval, the other woman threw herself into the water, and was drowned. The soldier gave the alarm. Drags were provided, and in about half an hour after the body was got out. It was carried to the workhouse. The woman who was saved stated her name to be Mary Carpenter, and that her husband was a soldier in the Guards; the other woman's name was Anger, and her husband was in the same regiment. The deceased and she were companions, and brought the greatest distress on themselves by drinking; in consequence of which their husbands would not let them come near them, and maintained their children themselves. They had been out drinking all that day, and not having a lodging to go to, they agreed (for the purpose of ending their miseries) to drown themselves. She expressed a determination still to carry her intention into effect.

On Friday an inquest was held on the body of Wm. Butcher, aged 23, found on Saturday in the New River, with his hands and legs tied. It appeared that the deceased had formerly kept a shop in the oil trade, in Ratcliffe-highway, and having failed became a porter. He was, however, unable to do the work required of him, and was discharged. Being destitute of employment, and his family in great distress, he manifested occasionally great agitation. On the day previous to that on which he was found dead his family had no food. Before he left home, he kissed his wife and children, and with tears said he would not return till he got some employment to procure them bread. After going out, he returned and kissed them a second time, and then tore himself away in the greatest agitation; he had five-pence when he left home, and it is supposed he gave two-pence of it for the rope with which he contrived to tie himself.—The Jury returned a verdict of—Insanity.

THE GREENWICH MURDERS.—Tuesday evening, as some labourers were cleaning out a pit at the back of Mr. Luton's house, in Greenwich, they found a large iron hammer, corresponding exactly with the description of that with which Mr. Bird and his housekeeper were murdered, and which was supposed to be a bricklayer's hammer. The hammer was immediately brought to Mr. Bicknell the Solicitor, and an examination is to take place at Greenwich, in order to trace the identity of the hammer.

TO THE ELECTORS OF WESTMINSTER.

LETTER II.

GENTLEMEN,

THOUGH I think the result of your election might have been still better, and the progress of it a good deal so, I cannot but congratulate you most sincerely.

You have, in the first place, at all events, defeated the Court Candidate. The ministerial papers affect indeed to think it a triumph on his part; and certainly it must be allowed, that as far as the court-tradenmen and others of that stamp are concerned, it was a triumph to them to be able to shew their heads again at all. But how were they so enabled? By those very divisions among you, in spite of which, after all, you were not conquered. The most ridiculous thing that could happen to most bodies of men did happen to you, and yet you were not ruined;—such a fund of sound political feeling there is in Westminster.

Sir MURRAY MAXWELL, Gentlemen, has had a greater lesson in politics than ever he got on board ship. I am much mistaken if he would not rather toss and tumble on all the billows betwixt here and China, than get a-top of an election again. To be well out of it's jostlings, yells, hisses, and yaps, must lap him up in as delicious a silence as a valley in Loo Choo. The roar of the winds will hereafter be penny trumpets to him. The raking of all the surfs on all the shores, if he could hear them at once, would grate on his ear as nothing. The pole would have no chills for him but the name. Water-sports, floating ices,—the masters of the main, real and fabulous, sharks, dog-fish, sword-fish, polypuses, krakens, wassermen, rosmarins, and sea-satyrs,—all these, not being householders, he would not care for. And as to guns and cutlasses, to broadsides, rakings, splinters, and blowings up, he may say of them, compared with the spirit of freedom, as his brother seaman said of spectres and apparitions,—“Give me a French seventy-four, and I know what to do with her; but as to your ghosts, I don't understand their tackle.”

Not that any of us, Brother Reformers, wish ill to the Gallant Officer. Far from it. We wish him so well, that, joking apart, we hope for his own sake and that of his profession, such men as he will never again be seen in such a situation. Of the personal violence also which he had to encounter, I shall only repeat, that the inflictors of it were either more ruffians who are to be found on all sides of a question in times of tumult, or more pardonable individuals driven to poverty and madness by the system of which they saw him the representative;—but why are they not brought forward, that we may know which? It is said they have been identified. See however what more tools the Government make of naval officers! Not content with letting them battle with their proper dangers, they use them on land for the most mortifying purposes, taking advantage of their simplicity to thrust them upon encounters totally unfit for them. Yet when honours are to be dealt out, the continental fashion is aped, and the military make up your only pomp. And if making a sort of land-lubber of a sailor is thought doing him an honour, what must be the little ceremony with which he is treated when disliked? Let the persecutions answer, which Lord COCHRANE endured from a lottery-making, jobbing, and seat-selling set of politicians, with a gambler in the funds and a forger of false news for their daily instrument. It is quite in character with the oligarchical usurpers of this island's freedom, that their friendship and their enmity should alike be dangerous to its natural protectors.

So much, Gentlemen, for the negative part of your success. With regard to the positive, I have to offer you double congratulations on the return of Sir FRANCIS BURBETT, after the danger to which his unconscious fellow-candidate and your own divisions exposed him. It was certainly a pity that a young man estimated so highly by Sir FRANCIS as MR. DOUGLAS KINNAIRD, and connected with so many favourable political things in the minds of others, should turn out to have been so little known among you. And this regret is increased by the frank and generous spirit with which he made his appearance after the withdrawal of his name, and advocated the cause which he was not to represent. Yet you did as much right, it must be confessed, in not taking him on mere trust, as I think you did wrong in something I shall mention presently. If you thought it a dictation in Sir FRANCIS, that the name of Mr. KINNAIRD was coupled with his, it became especially incumbent upon you to resist it, and most particularly from him. I trust, for many obvious reasons, it was not the case; but at the same time, how stands the question of dictation on the score of another candidate and of his setters up? I allude to Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY. This, at any rate, was not the sort of answer to give the other; nor could it have been in just resentment of dictation from a professed thorough Reformer, that any of you proposed a Whig. I hope some of you have not been playing the silly game of spite with each other. All are sure to be badly off in it; and it contains only this involuntary piece of justice,—that he who would cause most suffering, suffers most. But be this as it may, many Reformers, Gentlemen, regret that you should have returned Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY to Parliament rather than some more decided advocate of the cause, politically unconnected with the aristocracy. If any of the aristocracy themselves had come before you, as coalescers with reform, it would have been another matter; but to send their friend, or to make their appearance themselves only to recommend him, without incurring any responsibility on their own parts, is a very different business. Many things conspired, Gentlemen, at this particular moment, to render it desirable that you should return a more decided and additional reformer, in your own old sense of the word. One of them was, the want, more severely felt every day, of reformers within doors, to whom an additional one, and of your choosing, would have been a great increase of strength. Another, was the reported divisions among yourselves, which turned out to be too true, and which you would have triumphed over still better, had you not gone, like a piqued woman, and chosen a partner comparatively indifferent to you. The third, was the increasing necessity felt by the Whigs of coming and coalescing with the Reformers, whereas in this instance you go, as if with a confession of weakness, to the Whigs. The fourth, and most general, was the late good fortune of the Allied promise-breakers, who are so anxious to revive the old prejudices, bigotries, and tyrannies, and towards whom it becomes every lover of liberty to put on his most decided singleness of aspect, unidentified in the slightest degree with any of their common-liv-eries. I mean, that Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY, with all his abstract admiration of liberty, and in many instances his practical efforts in its behalf, is still a lawyer of too professional a cast to represent its most unshackled champions. He is still too much pulled back with precedents, and fretted within pales. He may not always oblige his party, but I recollect nothing he ever did to disoblige them; and a Westminster Representative, I think, should sometimes do that. He does not shew much deference to those in power; but let him change places with them, and there is reason to suspect he would not look very good-humouredly on a want of it. In religious liberality, he will allow to others, of course, all which he has claimed for himself,—which is to go as far as precedent and worldly countenance make safe and admissible; but there is also reason to suspect, that, to go beyond him, as he has gone beyond others, makes all the difference in the world in the tolerability of an opinion. I am sorry to be obliged to notice these defects in one, to whom it is great praise not to have been more hurt by his profession, and who, if professions were represented in the House, would make a most liberal and favourable specimen of the one in question,—of Westminster-Hall;—but Westminster itself. Still however, Sir SAMUEL may do his usual good in the House, and I shall be as forward among his admirers as usual;—more forward, if he does more than usual,—and most happy to find myself mistaken.—I have been reminded by a respectable journal of what the lawyers did for the glorious Revolution of 1688; but alas! the same words remind me of what the lawyers also undid,—and of those very Septennial Parliaments, which are so truly, Gentlemen, the barmen of our song.

I cannot finish this letter without calling to mind the handsome readiness with which Major CARTWRIGHT, ever preferring his cause to himself, withdrew his name from the poll, when he feared that its continuance might injure Sir FRANCIS. As to the remaining candidate, I have some tenderness for the name; and he himself has now left me, I trust, as little necessity as inclination to contradict the paltry artifices of the government-writers, and shew that I have no sympathy with the nature.—I remain, Gentlemen,

Your old and faithful friend,

THE EXAMINER.

LATE HOUSE OF COMMONS—STATE OF PARTIES.

It will assist our estimate of the character of the late House of Commons, if we look a little into the history of the three great political parties which divided the country, from the commencement to the close of its career. These were, and are, the Ministerialists, the Whigs or Opposition, and the Democratic or Popular Party—which also presents a general and sometimes a powerful opposition to the Minister of the day, but without any regular plan.

1. THE MINISTERIAL PARTY.—Ministers themselves were but a feeble race; making their holes in the monument of Pitt,—the rag-end of his Administration, and zealous adherents to his one principle; having some little credit, as weak men generally have, for good intentions; but resting their claims upon a clerk-like dexterity in the small details of business, rather than upon eminent talents and commanding views. The preceding Parliament had declared them unfit to guide the helm: But, after a reluctant, feeble, and unsuccessful attempt to engage others, it was said that no better could be found; and the vessel was allowed to drift on, the passengers confiding more in the strength of her timbers than in the skill of her steersmen. Liverpool, the nominal Premier, had at least some character for "respectability;" and what Castlereagh wanted in that, he made up by native assurance and happy address. Sidmouth was at the head of the Police; like Dogberry, eager to "comprehend notorious benefactors;" and, for a master constable, having no small portion of decency and sanctity. The rest of the appointments were filled by a nameless herd, who had climbed to their places, and who still held them, by obsequious time-serving, and laborious plodding in the small matters committed to their care. Canning, a Tory in principle, and a place-hunter by profession, had drawn out a bill of indictment against his colleagues,—had fought with the Fishman, and thrown up his Secretaryship in a pet: But he "longed for the flesh-pots," and was still flirting with office, though he found fault with every thing; and it was not till some time after that he was sent to gather the golden sands of Tagus, learn the principles of the Jesuits and the practice of the Holy Inquisition, and then return thoroughly qualified to play the buffoon on the stage of St. Stephen's, for the amusement of the "country gentlemen," or to be the prize-fighter of Castlereagh, whom he had sought to kill, and of Sidmouth whom he had always derided.

But whatever might be the merits of Ministers themselves, the Ministerial party was all-powerful in the country. It had stood long; had struck its roots deep in society; and stretched its branches over the whole domain of patronage and self-interest. The revenue which passed through the hands of the Executive, was equal to the maintenance of half the population. The merchants and manufacturers were bought by jobs, contracts, and facilities afforded to their trade; which became the more subject to an artificial influence, the farther that war had driven it from its natural channels. The lesser landholders, drained by taxation, dissipated by luxury, and degraded by ignorance in the midst of increasing knowledge, were seduced from the small remains of their independence, by the necessity of procuring places for their sons, marriages for their daughters, and visits and gossip in the "select circles" for their jiving dames. The Nobles, naturally haughty, indolent, and leaning to Toryism, had been recruited by frequent levies from among the most devoted disciples of terrorism and Pitt. And Bonaparte being still at the apex of his power, and the fear of invasion not quite extinct, the alarm of that, with the knell of Jacobinism, kept up by the designing, yet tangled in the ears of all whom we have omitted in the preceding classification of the foolish and feeble-minded.

These circumstances gave a decided character to the majority of the House of Commons. Even in the few instances where the members of that Assembly are returned neither directly by the nomination of Peers, nor indirectly by the influence of the Crown, the people, except in one or two solitary instances, flung their franchise into the hands of the weakest (abstractly the weakest) Administration that had appeared in England for a century. A return to manlier habits and a sounder faith, though at last it did come in the revolution of years, came too late for the correction of Ministers, for the character of the House of Commons, and for the public interests. The Ministers,—or let us point more particularly to Castlereagh, after his return from the Continent,—became, on the ground of their good fortune abroad, vain, insolent, and tyrannical at home, regardless of their original character for good intentions, and tenacious of place beyond all former measure of adherence to “the one principle.” The House, grown old in prodigality, and hacknied in subservience, even when it did attempt to “assume a virtue,” failed to make itself either respected or feared: The people could petition, recommend, remonstrate; but they had no means of removing bad Ministers or unfaithful Representatives; the single share which they possessed of the birth-right of freedom was a small one, and they had thrown it away; so their portion was now the bitter remorse of Esau.

2. THE WHIG OR REGULAR OPPOSITION PARTY, had declined, from the same causes that had made the Ministerial interests advance. They still could number many men of talents, and a few of high moral excellence; but their chiefs had fallen or were falling,—their front ranks were thinned, as well as those of the Ministry, by the shafts of death or the progress of decay. The wisdom and the eloquence of Fox were mute; the spirit and the fancy of Windham delighted no more; and the brilliancy of Sheridan was flickering in the socket. The acuteness of Tierney, the legal learning of Romilly, and the hardihood of Brougham, still remained to the party; but these were little, compared to the mighty spirits that are gone. The liberal and scientific views of Horner, opened but to be closed for ever; and the honest voice of the intrepid Whitbread was raising its last warnings.

It was the misfortune of the Whigs, to have been recently in office, when their stay was too short for enabling the country to form a just estimate of their value. The very slender and faulty performances of their brief reign, too, were measured by a standard of most extravagant expectation. Their political prophecies, also, respecting Bonaparte and the war, had very generally failed; while the indiscriminate and universal character of their opposition, in trifles as well as in grave concerns, took from it much of its proper dignity and of its natural weight even in the House, by giving to it the air of a vulgar scramble for power. Out of doors, again, the influence of the Whigs, if we except the few who dined and drank themselves into Whiggism, was rather of an aristocratic nature: resting mainly on the support of certain great families who inherited their principles in the same way as their estates, and much to the same purpose. A party so constituted, and so conducting itself, was not likely to gain proselytes either from the Court or the people. It has accordingly, as we have already hinted, been rather on the decline.

3. THE POPULAR PARTY, as it now exists, came in place of the old Country party,—when the landed gentlemen, yielding to the various influences of the present reign, began to neglect their ancient and honourable station as leaders of the people; and the people, resenting that abandonment, and eager for independence, forsook the standards under which they were wont to rally in former times. Willis may be regarded as the founder of this party in the House of Commons; and he has been succeeded by Tooke, Burdett, and some others, eminent for talents, but standing almost alone. The failure of those high hopes which had been built upon the Whig Administration, gave it a great impulse; the forcing of the Duke of York from an office the patronage of which he had abused, marked its occasional energy and its farther development; but it was the distresses, burdens, and blunders of later years, that revealed the full extent of its numbers, and the mystery both of its weakness and its strength. One cause of the rapid growth of this party, has undoubtedly been, the increased intelligence of the people. This, though too much overlooked by statesmen in their scramble for office, is the hinge upon which government must ultimately turn. The science of politics may be deep and difficult; but the practical results are palpably felt, and clearly judged of, by every man of common understanding. It was impossible to hide from the people, that the Commons, their constitutional guardians, had deserted them, and sold themselves to those other branches of the state on whom they were meant to be a check. Hence a reaction; which has been augmented by the increased number, energy, and spirit of popular writings. These writings have indeed, in a great measure, come in the stead of the House of Commons; and, rather than any thing that is done in that Assembly, are now the safeguards of our liberty. This has nearly put an end to the idolatry of names. Philosophy, while she has unpeopled the earth of half its marvels, has shorn the statesman of more than half his glory; and we are ready to exclaim, with the old Swedish Chancellor, “See how little wisdom suffices to govern the world!”

In the votes of the House, the Popular party has hitherto made but a poor figure. Nor was this to be wondered at: Three fifths of the members held their seats from the Executive Government and from the Lords; of the rest, the majority were of the Whig party; and a few were traders for office on their own account. In Burdett, perhaps, as many good qualities have united, mixed with as little alloy, as ever entered into the composition of a political leader. He possesses rank, fortune, talents, character, pleasing manners, and impressive eloquence. His chief fault seems to be a constitutional indolence; and the more violent Reformers accuse him of vanity, of a certain leaning to aristocratical feelings, and of a distaste (which we do not wonder at) for some who profess the same opinions, but whose zeal outruns their knowledge and their means of promoting the interests of the cause. He has perhaps also carried his contempt of the small war of politics to excess, by absenting himself with apparent indifference when his testimony and even his vote might have been of use.

Out of doors, the exhibitions of the Popular party have been by no means fortunate. Raw, unformed, and as yet not aware either of its strength or its proper mode of acting, it has been noisy rather than wise, and vehement rather than efficient. It has been vilified and decried by the abettors of unlimited taxation and divine right. The idle and mischievous, too, have been hurtful allies. Even of its more worthy advocates, not a few have displayed a spirit of intolerance, and a contempt of other Reformers who did not go to the full extent of their visionary and dangerous schemes,—denouncing all who could not at once place their faith in dogmas which had never been tried by experience, and neglecting things of real value, in the mad pursuit of what is clearly impracticable. Notwithstanding all this, however, the cause has prospered; and the principles of liberty, and the demand of reform, are widely and deeply spread. This is the surest proof of the goodness of the cause; and affords the best hope of its ultimate triumph. But, by the decay of Treasury patronage, the Alms-bell has been gradually wasted; and the Popular party, being supported by a diminishing strength, may, by a little concession on both sides, become assimilated with the Whigs. Then, cured by foreign experience of the iniquities of Jacobinism and the horrors of violent change, the talent and virtue of the country will, in all probability, lend their efforts to that sober and sure reform which is to be gained by gradual steps,—without struggle, except that of the mind, and without animosity, save that of disappointed sycophants and degraded panders of tyranny and arbitrary power.

Such has been the state of parties in the country; and such its organization in the House of Commons. It remains that we trace the influence which the union of heterogeneous and disproportional elements in that Assembly has exerted on the principal arrangements of our foreign and domestic policy.—Dundee Advertiser.

GENERAL ELECTION.

WESTMINSTER.—The Committee who conducted the Election of Sir F. Burdett have published an Address to the Electors, in which they say,—“You have successfully combated against the Treasury, the Admiralty, and all the Public Offices; against the Court and its Sycophants; against Peers, Peeresses, and their Parasites; against Bribery and Perjury; against a hired and calumniating daily Press; and against Corruption in every shape.—When you reflect upon the tyranny and deception over which you have prevailed, you will have a just sense of your own exertions, of your public spirit, independence, and strength.—On your behalf, no tricks or delusions have been employed. Your Committee have acted upon the principles of Purity of Election; they have uniformly rejected every overture for a coalition with any party, and have appealed only to your common sense and understandings.—In a contest, the most arduous which has ever been known, and with no other incitement than your own patriotism, you have nobly defeated your enemies: you have re-elected your faithful Representative Sir Francis Burdett; you have shown your attachment to the great cause of Parliamentary Reform, without which there can be no security for freedom and happiness in England; you have maintained your own exalted character; and by steadily persevering in the same course, you will finally succeed in rescuing your country from the oppression under which it has so long suffered. * * * It appears that 10,277 Electors have polled; that 4,967 Electors have given single votes, and 5,280 Electors have given double votes; that Sir Francis Burdett had a decisive majority of the single votes, and that the only reason why he was not at the head of the poll was, that 2,334 of the double votes were divided between Sir Samuel Romilly and the Court Candidate.—The result of this Election, which is entirely owing to your spontaneous exertions, is a subject of just pride and satisfaction to us all. Let it encourage us to future efforts. The enemy is ever vigilant; let us also be vigilant and united; and ever ready to oppose the attempts of tyranny and corruption to overcome our endeavours in behalf of our country.”

SIR F. BURDETT'S CHAIRING.

The chairing of Sir Francis Burdett is fixed for tomorrow. The procession will be altogether on foot, the Baronet only excepted, who will be elevated on a cart. Sir Francis Burdett will meet the cavalcade at Hyde-park Corner, whence it will perambulate the principal parts of Westminster, proceeding up the Strand to the Crown and Anchor, where a dinner will take place at five o'clock, at which Sir Francis Burdett will preside.

A kind of program of the intended procession for the chairing of Sir Francis Burdett has been published. Places of meeting are assigned to each elector in each parish, whence they are to proceed at 10 o'clock to the neighbourhood of Hyde-park. Different stations are pointed out for the pedestrians, the horsemen, and the carriages. The movements of the procession are to be regulated by signals made by discharging rockets and displaying flags. Its course will be along Piccadilly, down the Haymarket, along Cockspur-street, round the statue at Charing-cross into the Strand, up Bedford-street, along Henrietta-street, round Covent-garden, down Southampton-street, and along the Strand to the Crown and Anchor Tavern. The following is given as the order of the procession:—

High Constable on horseback.
Eight Assistants, two and four.
Three small dark blue Flags, used during the Election.
Band of Music, three and three.
Large white Flag, carried on horseback; motto,
“Purity of Election.”

Carriages to follow.

WESTMORELAND ELECTION.

APPLEBY, JULY 3.—At the close of the poll for the day, and we may add, for the election, the numbers stood as follow:—For Lord Lowther, 1211—Col. Lowther, 1157—Mr. Brougham, 889.

Mr. Brougham said, the success he had met with convinced him that the majority of the independent men were in his favour; for, in spite of the attempts of his opponents to bribe the freeholders, in spite of their efforts at intimidation, in spite of all the tricks, artifices, and menaces which they had employed, he had polled 800 votes. (Great howling and clamour.) Therefore he could say that he had nearly gained the victory, that he must ultimately succeed in the contest, and that the day was not far distant, when, in spite of the long purses and hired agents of their adversaries, his friends would signally beat them, and conquer the independence of their county. One thing had been proved to demonstration—that the strength and the feeling of the county were in his favour; and he would here pledge himself before his friends and adversaries, never while life remained, to desert the cause of its independence. (Great clamour.) To consolitate and increase the strength on his side, the most ample arrangements were made; and he would request his friends to accompany him to the Castle-yard, that they might hear the details of a plan prepared for organizing and directing their future exertions. He had that plan in his hand—it had met with the approbation of the distinguished friends who were now by his side; and every man who valued his rights, or held the independence of the county dear, must be a party to it. (Great clamour and confusion.) It was the nature of some animals to come out of a hole, and after a shower of rain—some never appeared but in fair weather. Of the former class were the Tories; and from the croaking of the animals now before him, he imagined they might belong to that species, or that, being Tories, they wished to resemble the land they fed on. He had no doubt they came from London, where this species of animal abounded. (Great interruption.) The last and the only time he had had a contest was, opposed to persons of liberal feelings and enlightened minds—who would have secured to every point by eloquence, or to resort to tricks to overpower a adversary. To be opposed, as he had this time, to a man like Mr. Brougham, was a high honour;—he was not only a man of no common sense, but a man who took no account of the feelings of his opponents, who indicated the greatest facility in falsehood, and who added to his triumph the selfishness of a victory won by unlaudable means. Opposed during a long course to this distinguished orator—a man of the greatest talents, and of the most accomplished mind of the day—no angry feeling was indulged; no reason for complaint was given on either side; and as they met as friends at the beginning of the election, so they parted at the end with mutual thanks and congratulations on the manner in which it had been conducted. (Great clamour.) He thanked his friends for the zeal with which they had supported him, and for their order and good conduct during the contest; and he once more warned his opponents, that though they were declared members to-morrow, the struggle was not closed, their success was not secure; and that, till the independence of the county was finally vindicated, every new election must be a new contest.

After this address, which was delivered amid incessant clamour, Mr. Brougham retired, at the head of the freeholders in his interest, to the Castle-yard. He subsequently addressed his friends, and remarked, that steps ought to be taken which in any future struggle must secure the independence of the county. The necessity of this was manifest from the number of his votes which had been disallowed, owing to the land-assessment trick. In the east and west wards the partisans of the Lowthers were as negligently assessed, as his friends were in the Kendal and Lonsdale wards; expedition in registering the assessments was, therefore, as necessary to them in the two former, as to him in the two latter; but what did the collectors do? they hastened the assessments in the two first, and delayed them in the two last, so that the Lowthers lost few votes, and he upwards of 100 by this partiality. This was not all; he had lost nearly 200 more by the quibbles and the quibbles of lawyers, so that instead of having 900 he should have had a clear majority. Yet, notwithstanding this, he had polled more than could have been expected six months ago, in spite of the array of government influence—in spite of attorneys by the score, and tax-gatherers by the dozen—in spite of the efforts of magistrates, parsons, and the resident gentry. This was, therefore, a day of triumph; but they ought to consolidate the means of future success. He would, therefore, propose the formation of a great and independent association, which would organize their force and realize the fable of the bundle of sticks, which, though weak separately, would be strong when bound together; no strength or craft could break, scatter, or disunite them. He proposed to include the county of Cumberland in that association, and the plan had met with the approbation of the gentlemen from that quarter. The day of its foundation would be memorable in the history of the northern counties; it would not only encourage by its example, but assist other counties by its efforts and advice. That day should be fixed for to-morrow, the 4th July, because that was the day on which the Lowthers would be returned for the last time. He had another reason for fixing on the 4th of July; it was the day on which America, under the great Washington, had thrown off the yoke, and asserted her independence, and risen against oppression, and bearing up against temporary disasters, had become, next to this, the first nation in the world. He concluded by quoting, as applicable to his friends, the part of Washington's words, in which he exhorted to his nephews the secret with which it had taught in the sense of independence, enjoining them never to draw it but as self-defence or in defence of their country, and then never to let go the hold, but to die sooner than relinquish it.

The following resolutions were then read and carried, and the meeting dispersed:—Resolved—1. That a grand association be immediately formed for securing the independence of the sister counties. 2. That the Westmoreland branch do hold its meetings in Kendal, Appleby, Kirkby-Lonsdale, Kirkby-Stephen, Brough, Ambleside, Barton. 3. That the Committees for conducting the present election, be first Committees appointed for managing affairs of the Westmoreland branch, and that Kendal be the central place of this branch. 4. That the anniversary of the formation be held every year, on the 4th of July, being the day when the Lowther members were returned, as we confidently trust, for the last time. 5. That the papers do lie at the Committee-men's houses for receiving the signatures of all such as wish to become members of the association. 6. That every member do hold himself bound to promote by all lawful means the object of the association, more particularly if a freeholder, by seeing that he is regularly rated to the land-tax, so as to prevent the recurrence of practices which have proved so injurious to the cause this election; and by obtaining freehold qualifications by enfranchisement, purchase, and otherwise. 7. That the members of the association, on all public occasions connected with the cause, do appear with the badge of a blue ribbon round their left arm above the wrist. 8. That these resolutions be communicated to our friends in Cumberland, who are not here present, in order that they may be adopted by the Cumberland branch of the association. 9. That independent men of all parties in politics belonging to other counties, but desirous of making common cause with us, be admitted honorary members of the association.

JULY 4.—At a quarter before eleven, the Deputy-Sheriff declared Lord Lowther and his brother, Colonel Lowther, duly elected as Knights of the Shire for the county of Westmoreland.

Lord Lowther thanked the freeholders for the proud situation in which they had placed him on the poll, and the distinguished honour which they had done him by returning him as their representative. He reminded them, that this had been a contest of principles, not of men, and denied that there had been any personalities shown to the opposite candidate by himself or any of his friends. The triumph which he now enjoyed was the triumph of the Westmoreland freeholders, as well as his; he was merely an instrument in their hands. A contest had been threatened at a future election, but he would be found at his post, and would never desert friends by whom he was so honourably supported.

Colonel Lowther felt particularly gratified with the result of this day, as the Member for Winchester had declared that his opposition was solely directed against his return. He anticipated certain success from the beginning, and his trust in the honour and zeal of the Westmoreland freeholders had not been disappointed. If the poll had continued to-day, 50 unpolled freeholders were in town to give him their support, and more than 100 others would have arrived from the country, if their services had been required. The Hon. Colonel, after a few more observations, which he uttered in broken sentences, with less hesitation and less prompting than on the previous days of the contest, concluded by giving the freeholders his most hearty thanks, and promising never to desert their cause.

Mr. SWIFT (a person, as we were informed, from London) then addressed the freeholders in terms of great asperity and coarseness, against the conduct of Mr. Brougham and his friends.

The newly elected Members were then chaired in great parade. The zeal of Mr. Swift was here conspicuous. He tore down a standard of Mr. Brougham's party, which was erected in the street entirely out of his way, broke the pole in pieces, threw the fragments among the yellows as trophies of their victory; and, after mistreating a poor old woman, gave her in custody to the bludgeon-men. The Members again mounted the hustings, and returned thanks to their friends, on which the ceremony ended, and the crowd dispersed.

The following may be regarded as an accurate state of the poll on the last day of the contest:—

For Mr. Brougham. Ld. Lowther. Col. L.
Plumpers	823	13	4
Total votes	889	111	117
Declared majority for Col. Lowther			208
Rejected votes, which were almost wholly on account of defects in the land tax assessments
Undecided votes, returned and objected to, on which no decision has been made by the sheriff's officer			30
			140—820

From the above it appears, that upwards of 1,100 have tendered their votes for Mr. Brougham. The majority for the Lowther party is composed of upwards of 80 magistrates and esquires, and 100 clergymen from all parts of the kingdom.

At the end of the first day's proceedings at Appleby, and after Mr. Brougham had left the hustings, a person of the name of Burrow, who is, we believe, from London, came forward, and said that he had to say something, not respecting a mistake, but an absolute false statement which had been made in the morning. (Loud cheers from the Lowther party on the hustings.) He meant the statement of Mr. Brougham respecting Mr. Bousfield. He knew Mr. Bousfield very well, and he had been a warm friend to the Lowthers, (hisses from the crowd), so that it was not in opposition to his wishes that his name was in the Lowther Committee. (Applause from the Lowther party.)

Mr. Brougham immediately after returned to the hustings, and as he understood a person had made a charge against him in his absence, he now demanded that the person who had done so would repeat it in the same terms in which he had made it.

Mr. Burrow came forward amidst groans and hisses, but Mr. Brougham begged that, as a personal favour to himself, Mr. Burrow might be heard. Mr. Burrow then said, that he had stated that Mr. Bousfield had been a warm friend of the Lowthers, and that he had changed his opinion and supported Mr. Brougham. (Cries of "No, no, that was not what you said," and hisses.)

Mr. Brougham begged Mr. Burrow (for such he understood the name of his accuser to be) would repeat what he had said, and not something (as he was informed) quite different.

Mr. Burrow then, after much hesitation, said that he had asserted that the statement respecting Mr. Bousfield was false. (Cheers from the Lowther party, and hisses.)

Mr. Brougham said, he would show how far this Mr. Burrow was worthy of credit. What he had said was not that Mr. Bousfield had been once a friend of the Lowthers, but that his name had been put to an advertisement beginning "We, the undersigned," without either his knowledge or consent; in other words, that it was forged. He had the letter, in Mr. Bousfield's handwriting, in which were these words. Did Mr. Burrow mean to say that the letter was not in Mr. Bousfield's hand? Did he mean to deny that Mr. Bousfield's hand had been forged? (Applause.) He now had only to make one remark—he had never seen a person out of temper but when he was beaten, or when he had been doing something wrong. Mr. Burrow's rash and absurd conduct was a proof that he had been in one of these predicaments. "And," concluded Mr. Brougham, "if your suspicions as to the man who was guilty of forging Mr. Bousfield's name to the resolutions fall on the same person as mine do, you will know what to think of Mr. Burrow." (Cries of yes, yes, and shouts of applause.)

Mr. Burrow made no reply, but left the hustings amidst the hissing of the multitude.

In consequence of Mr. Burrow having refused to explain whether the word false, which he had used, was intended to apply to Mr. Brougham or Mr. Bousfield; Mr. Lambton, at the request of Mr. Brougham, went to Mr. Burrow, and required him to give a more explicit declaration, that the term he had made use of did not apply to Mr. Brougham. Mr. Burrow could not be found in Appleby that night, having gone to King's Meaburn, whither a messenger was despatched for him in the morning. At length Mr. Lambton obtained an interview with him; and then desired Mr. Burrow to make the declaration we have mentioned. This gentleman at first sought to qualify his statement; but Mr. Lambton required him to make an explicit recantation of his charge, as far as it could apply to Mr. Brougham. Mr. Burrow said he could not retract what he had probably said, and authorized Mr. Lambton to say as much to Mr. Brougham. Mr. Lambton said this was unnecessary, for he was authorized to demand immediately from Mr. Burrow, that he would name a friend who should settle the time and place of a meeting with Mr. Brougham. Mr. Burrow then said that he did not hesitate to decline the demand—that he was a family man, and could not with propriety accept of it: so ended this affair. It should be mentioned, that the Lowther party had not only been obstreperous in their applause of this Mr. Burrow, when he had made his charge in the absence of Mr. Brougham, but also after he had been completely baffled by the plain statement of this gentleman, and by his own confused explanation on the hustings. We should also add, that Mr. Lambton was authorized by Mr. Brougham to tell Mr. Burrow, that he would not demand any explanation from him, if he would discover at whose instigation he had made the false and blundering charge against him.—Westmorland Advertiser.

COUNTY OF DOWN ELECTION.

Lord Castlereagh and Lord Arthur Hill came together. The necessary preliminaries having been gone through, Andrew Nugent, Esq. proposed Lord Castlereagh to be one of the Representatives of the County, and Colonel Forde proposed Lord Arthur Hill to be the other. The High-Sheriff then called a show of hands, when, after the usual proclamations were made, no other candidate being proposed, he declared the election to be unanimous.

LORD CASTLEREAGH addressed the freeholders. He begged leave to return his most grateful thanks to the freeholders for the honour they had conferred on him. It was peculiarly grateful to his feelings, that, after having served them for twenty-one years, he had obtained this unanimous testimony of their approbation. He begged leave to remark, that there was no inconsistency in returning his Hon. Friend (Lord Arthur Hill) and himself: although they might differ in political opinions, the aim of both was the public good. It was only by the honest conflict of opinions that truth was elicited. It would be impossible for the most enlightened cabinet to govern a nation without an honest conflict of opinions. He hoped they would give him credit for having acted always from honest motives, and he should never shrink from responsibility. His Lordship, in a most eloquent and appropriate manner, contrasted the time when he last visited this country with the present. The country, he observed, was then in the utmost distress, owing to the recurrence from a state of war to that of peace; for we had been engaged in a contest for our very existence as a nation; and in that contest Great Britain had triumphed, and crowned herself with glory. Providence, however, then, in order to check our exultation, had visited us with a most inclement season: he recollected, in a particular manner, that the wheat on a farm which was occupied by his father was then covered with snow. Now, the contrast was most grateful, and it was his hope that prosperity would again visit the land; nothing could exceed the beautiful verdure of this happy country, and he could assure them, it was not confined to this country, but it was general. Arts and manufactures also were again flourishing, and all was one active scene of employment. Linen had again found a good market, and he felt confident that their abundant harvest would find a market in Great Britain. His Lordship further observed, that every human institution was liable to defects; but every person must be convinced, that under no constitution did the people enjoy a greater share of civil and religious liberty than in Great Britain; and as long as freedom of discussion in both houses of Parliament existed; as long as we were possessed of a free press, no real abuse would be brought forward without its correction or a remedy being found. Changes or reforms must take place deliberately, for all changes made abruptly or hastily came to no good. His Lordship again expressed his acknowledgments for the honour they had done him, and said, that not only in Parliament, but to the latest moment of his existence, he should entertain the most grateful recollection of their kindness.

LORD A. HILL then rose and shortly returned thanks to the freeholders, and said, he should always endeavour to deserve their confidence.—Belfast News Letter.

BEDFORDSHIRE REPRESENTATION.

TO FRANCIS PYM, ESQ. LATE M.P. FOR BEDFORDSHIRE.

SIR,—If there be any truth in the old proverb, that "the height of wisdom is well-timed retreat," the ill-timing of your late retreat will remain an unerring standard by which to measure your sagacity; indeed, there seems such a total absence of all reason for your conduct, that it must appear you were ambitious, as an old man, to finish your political existence by a riddle or a blunder; and with this, simply considered, we could have little to do, had you not connected interests therewith, which as an old and respected Member of Parliament, you had scarcely a right either to compromise or renounce. With this sentiment you must have been duly impressed, when you sat down to pen that manly and spirited address to the Freeholders of Bedfordshire, in which, to use your own language, "you threw yourself, without fear or apprehension, on the sense of the County, confident that the result would justify your pretensions to that situation, which it had been your greatest pride so long to have enjoyed, and to the Resumption of which you looked forward, as the only reward for the disinterested zeal and honesty with which you were conscious of having devoted yourself to the service of your Constituents."

Now, Sir, had you been one of those very Constituents, what would have been your opinion respecting the author of such an Address? Could you have supposed it possible that so sacred a pledge would have been made for so speedy a violation, and would you not have considered this specimen of Punic faith, as better suited to the character of a smirking Irish Courtier, than the respected, independant, old English Gentleman at the Hazels?—Here, I am willing to acknowledge, your right to make calculations respecting the issue of the contest; but if the result of those calculations was opposed to the probabilities of your success—Why were they not better timed? Why not made previous to that call, which was replied to from the bosoms of your warmest friends, by their zeal and activity to ensure your success? those numerous and steady friends, to whom your final triumph appeared less problematical than your own timidity had represented.—You are well aware what class of interests and feelings in the County you were supposed to represent, and a child of one of the old fathers of freedom, could scarcely be allowed to abandon the charge, without witnessing the transfer of its guardianship to hands worthy of the trust.

Let me inquire, Sir, whether any such feelings actuated you in your ill-timed resignation? and, if not, what must be your regard for that cause, which arrays so many firm Patriots in defence of the Constitution, that your sudden retreat should leave a gap in its bulwarks, to be filled up by its perverters and destroyers? Besides, was there no less patriotic motive to prompt a wish that the suffrages which had so long and so nobly distinguished you, should be preserved to your family?—Alas, Sir! if report speaks true of the generous ambition of your Son, your renunciation must be viewed in a way that even "prudent reasons" will hardly justify! I must again observe, that your conduct, simply considered, could never have extorted these remarks, had I not considered deeply, and as deeply lamented, that you have inflicted an injury on the cause you were bound to support, which not even the retrospect of a life of silent services can obliterate; and I leave it to your own bosom to respond, whether it would not have been more gratifying to have retired from your duties accompanied by the gratitude and applause of your Constituents, than covered with the enmity and indignation of many

A BEDFORDSHIRE FREEHOLDER.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JULY 1.—The affair relative to the engraving, called L'Enfant du Regiment, which has been so often before the Court of Correctional Police, terminated yesterday. Four persons of the names of Gautier, Croulebois, Christi, and Colas, were charged with being the authors or distributors of this coloured engraving, representing a group of French soldiers, with a child of about six years of age, clothed in a military dress, in the midst of them, on whom they are all looking with apparently deep emotion. M. Claveau, after having cleared his client, the Sieur Partout, of any voluntary design to make an allusion to the son of the usurper, admitted, however, that the circulation of the engraving might hereafter have dangerous consequences. He therefore consented, on the part of his client, that the plate should be destroyed. On this offer being made, M. de Marchangy, the King's Advocate, withdrew his prayer for three months' imprisonment, and 200 francs' fine, and left the punishment entirely to the consideration of the judges. The Court ordered the suppression of the plate, and the copies seized, and dismissed the complaint against all the persons accused. Mr. Partout, who was imprisoned, will be set at liberty.

JULY 4.—We read in one of the journals of Rome of the 18th of June (Notizie del Giorno)—"It is stated with certainty that the Allied Sovereigns have decided that all the ships of the Barbary Powers should be disarmed. This measure, so necessary to humanity and commerce, will take place, it is said, in the course of this year."

The Duchess of Devonshire set out from Rome for London on the 15th of June. "We are assured," says the paper before cited, "that this protectress of the Arts will return to us in the month of October next."

M. Plamher, bookseller, condemned to three months' imprisonment, as Editor of the Courier des Chambres, and M. Tartarin, author of Pere Michel, were conveyed on Wednesday to the prison of Sainte Pelagie.

The English actor, Mr. Kean, arrived yesterday at Paris.

An extraordinary fish has been taken alive at Nantes by some fishermen, who have given it the name of a sea-tiger.

Madame de Krudener resides at present at Jungbrenhoff, a country house near Riga, belonging to her brother, the Privy Councillor de Wictinghoff.

A Notice of Mr. HAZEWELL's delightful "Views in Italy," in our next.

ALPHA is received.

Upon looking again at the Letter of our Correspondent respecting a Will (not the one mentioned in our present paper) we observe something in the postscript which has made us hesitate in publishing it,—a something which the writer perhaps will think it proper to re-consider, even in justice to his own good motives.

It may be right to mention here, that the transmitter of the other notice alluded to, has sent his name to the Office, agreeably to the excellent feelings which evidently actuate him.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JULY 12.

THERE was a report of a conspiracy against Louis the 18th at the beginning of the week; but no symptoms appeared in the French funds or otherwise, and it has since been quite discredited. It's egregious folly however might have tended to quash it as soon as known, for the conspirators were said to be Ultra-Royalists, whose object was to dethrone Louis the 18th, and raise to the throne the bigoted—a speculation so ridiculous, considering all the circumstances of the present time, that the Courier pronounced it impossible to have been entertained:—and so it might have been with less ridiculous people; but absurdity is no disproof where an English bigot is concerned, much less where an old French ultra. On the other hand, the report might have been raised in order to throw a little contrasted light on the King!—so benighted, and in the background of all that is liberal, are the rest of his family!

That some of these feeble and furious persons have long been for what they call stronger measures, is well understood; nor have observers forgotten the little by-attempt in one of the agitated provinces to set up the cry of CHARLES the 10th. And here we may remark, what prodigious Jacobins Princes often are in their own families, at the very moment when they are loudest against Jacobinism. They make nothing of intriguing against and perplexing the King, nay, sometimes of rebelling and attempting to oust him. The old regal history of France, with all its loyalty and chivalry so much talked of, is little else than a tissue of such cross-purposes. The late Russian history is full of Jacobinism, imperial and aristocratical. So is the Swedish. And we have a most notorious instance of regal Jacobinism now living, in the precious, wise, manly and grateful person of King FERDINAND VII., who takes possession of his living father's throne, and imprisons and kills his most patriotic countrymen! It would be useful and exemplary to have a little treatise drawn up on the Jacobinism of Kings and Princes.

By the way, that business of FERDINAND's was never well explained. Upon the principles now broached by him, and his brethren, and their hirelings, it must have been a flat usurpation; and so, we perceive, the South Americans call it. We allude to the Chili Manifesto, which is going through a course of publication in the Chronicle, and in which the Independents give their reasons, excellent and indisputable reasons, for separating from Spain. We trust it will be afterwards collected into a pamphlet.

The ordinary species of news from the Continent is as barren as it has usually been of late. The most curious is an article dated Munich, respecting a quarrel between the Crown Prince of BAVARIA and his brother-in-law LUIGI BEAUMARQUIS. The writer tells us, upon "undoubted authority," that the Crown Prince had refused his signature to the act, by which EUGENE is recognized by the Sovereigns of Europe as a Prince of the Empire; and that the latter was so indignant at the unexpected refusal, that he immediately went to the King, and said he should quit Munich for Warsaw, to which place the Russian Emperor had invited him; but the King's entreaties prevailed, and the various magnificent buildings were resumed which Prince EUGENE had commenced. The "illegitimate" Prince, it seems, has great wealth as well as taste, and uses both in a very popular manner, so that the CROWN PRINCE perhaps is jealous. "BEAUMARQUIS' income," says the article, "is six hundred thousand pounds a-year, every guinea of which he spends in Bavaria, where he is idolized." The quarrel however, which became very serious, has been "terminated by command of the King; the architect from Milan has returned, and all is right again." It is curious to see what a real and superior kind of importance these BONAPARTE people keep up with the Legitimates, wherever the latter venture to come in contact with them.

The following intelligence was received in the City yesterday morning:—

"Buenos Ayres, April 18.

"Yesterday brought us the most happy news that could possibly be received. General SAN MARTIN had on the 5th completely annihilated General OSORIO's army, about three leagues from Santiago.—The General himself had escaped with only thirty men, who were on the road to Concepcion, closely pursued when the dispatches came away. This town is in the greatest confusion, from the transport of joy; business will be suspended three or four days. The ringing of bells and firing of guns have not ceased for the last 18 hours."

Extract of a letter from Paris, contained in the Courier. "The courier of the Spanish embassy at Paris has brought this morning letters addressed to several respectable commercial houses, apprising them of the important news, that the American forces had taken possession of the Floridas, and that M. ORIZ had conveyed this intelligence to his Government.

A Dutch mail arrived yesterday morning. An article from the French frontiers, dated the 3d instant, after mentioning the departure of the Duke of WELLINGTON from Cambrai for Paris, observes, that his Grace is still deeply engaged in mediating between Spain and Portugal. It is added, that no doubt is entertained of his Grace's being present at Aix-la-Chapelle, in order to declare, "in person, his opinion respecting the evacuation of the French territory by the Allied Troops."

The differences between the Grand Duke of BADEN and the King of BAVARIA, do not appear to be adjusted yet. An article from Carlsruhe mentions that the Baden Minister had quitted Munich some time since, and that the Bavarian Minister, who had been absent from Baden above a twelvemonth, was preparing to have his effects removed from the hotel occupied by the Embassy. Hopes are still entertained that an amicable arrangement may be made, because of the personal friendship subsisting between the two Princes!

By the Hamburg Mail intelligence is received of the death of the Queen-Dowager of SWEDEN, her Majesty having survived her consort little more than four months. The cause of her death was a violent attack of spasms.—She was in her 60th year; and was married to the late King of SWEDEN in 1774.

There is no truth in the rumour that the new Parliament is to meet for the dispatch of business in August.—Its immediate assembling could only be rendered imperative by an event, which the last Bulletin of his Majesty's Physicians is far from preparing us to expect.—Courier.

The resignation of Mr. PEEL, (says the Courier) as Secretary for Ireland, is at length determined, and Mr. C. GRANT will be the successor of the Right Hon. Gentleman.

Mr. PERCEVAL, who comes into Parliament for Ennis in Ireland, is a son of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Hunt.—“The conduct of this gentleman throughout the late election (observes a Correspondent), was so very extravagant, that he could not have followed a better plan, had he been a spy employed by Ministers to bring the cause of Reform, as well as his own Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments, into general contempt. Allowing that Sir Francis Bouverie may not have acted in Parliament to his satisfaction, had Mr. Hunt been honest and sincere in his declared hostility to Ministers, when he found that himself had no chance of being elected, and there was a strong probability that Sir Murray Macdonald might, he would have supported Sir Francis Bouverie, as the least evil of the two; but in place of this, he strained every nerve to throw him out, not only by extremely abusive and violent language on the hustings, but by printing and circulating every thing which he supposed would militate against and injure Sir Francis in the public estimation, while he scarcely noticed or mentioned the Conservative at all!”

The metropolis of Britain (for London, Westminster, and Southwark, may be so termed) has recorded its decided opinion of Ministers in its late choice of Representatives. Out of eight Members, not one of them is devoted to their service, for even Mr. Wilson declines to be considered as wearing their livery. If the rest of the Empire had the same right of voting as the great metropolis, we see what the result would be—a House in direct hostility to the present corrupt system.

A Correspondent has transmitted an account of the very pathetic Meeting between Messrs. Willcock and Hendrie, on the day of the defeat of their Champion, Sir Murray, for whom they had so strenuously exerted themselves in vain?—It may probably appear next week.

Mr. Cobden's family, it is said, are on their return to England. Mr. C. himself, it is added, means to follow in a few months.—“Hough-ho! Why did he come—why did he go?”

RUSSIAN VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY.—The Russian brig Rusick, under the command of Lieutenant Kotzebue, whose arrival at Portsmouth we announced about three weeks ago, had been out on a voyage of discovery two years and seven months. The crew had continued remarkably healthy, but the vessel was obliged to put into Portsmouth, for supplies of provisions. During his voyage, which at first was directed to the North, Lieutenant Kotzebue reached a very high latitude, but we are not yet able to state it with accuracy. He fell in with a most singular iceberg, of great magnitude, which not only had a portion of its surface covered with earth and mud, and bearing trees and vegetable productions, but a portion of its water line covered with a shore formed by the deposit of earthly matter washed down from the higher parts of the earth-covered iceberg. On this shore a landing was made, and considerably quantities of remains of the mammoth were found, in such a state of putrefaction as to produce a most insupportable stench. The Rusick brought away a number of the tusks and other parts of these immense animals, which had probably been preserved in a frozen state for many ages, till the mass of ice which inclosed them, put in motion by some unknown cause, reached a more temperate latitude.—Philosophical Magazine.

Two forged notes on the Bank of England were lately posted up in the window of a tradesman, in Holborn-bridge (Mr. Evans), and beneath them the public were informed, Mr. W. hoped those of his customers, with whose names and addresses he was unacquainted, would excuse him from taking any more of these papers, as the Gentlemen in Threadneedle-street had declined to inform him how he was to distinguish between such as were genuine and such as were forged.—N.E. The notes and inscription have since disappeared.

In the late Westmoreland Election, it is stated that not fewer than One Hundred and One Clergymen voted for the Lowthers!—“The Lord gave the word, and great was the multitude of the preachers.”

CANTABRIGIA, JULY 7.—The Members' Prizes of 15 guineas each, for Latin Essays, have been this year adjudged as follows:—Senior Bachelors.—(1) Mr. J. T. Allen, St. John's. SUBJECT.—“Antique numismatice species et natura.” Middle Bachelors.—(1) Mr. H. J. Rose, (2) Mr. C. T. Heathcote, Trin. Coll. SUBJECT.—“Inter Græcos et Romanos historice scriptores comparatione facta eorum styli imitatione maxime dignus esse videtur?” Sir William Browne's Medal.—To Mr. T. H. Hall, King's Coll. for a Greek ode.—“In obitum illusterrime Principisse Carolinæ Augustæ Sacrell Wallie Principis fluit.” To Mr. W. E. Maltby, for the elegiacs on “Magna civitas, magna solitudo.” The Porson Prize, for a translation from Shakspeare, Messinger, Ben Johnson, in Greek Senarian families, to Mr. W. S. Weller, Trin. Coll. The passage was this year from Shakspeare's Henry 8th.

“The Duke of ORLEANS, who has distinguished himself by his protection of the Fine Arts, desired Mr. HORACE VERNET to paint him ten pictures at a thousand francs each. The choice of the subjects was left to the artist, who, eager to prove his gratitude as well as his talent, represented his Royal Highness in the ranks of his regiment, at the battle of Jemappe, in the early days of the revolution, when the young Prince gave proofs of eminent bravery, and was the second who stormed, sword in hand, a formidable battery of the enemy. The painter portrayed in the same picture the standard bearer, with the long folds of the tricoloured flag. It is affirmed that his Royal Highness conceived this emblem a little too prominent in the foreground of the painting, and observed, with a smile, to M. VERNET, “Le tableau est à ravir, mais le sujet en est un peu chatouilleux.” “Ah Monseigneur,” repondit VERNET, “Je ne sais pas mentir à la posterité!”—Canard.

We are informed that a duel lately took place in Lisbon, between his Excellency the Count of C—na, and an English Officer of that service, Major R. MINTOSH, both Officers of Cavalry, in consequence of an insult offered by the former to a Portuguese Lady of Nobility, whilst under the arm of the latter at the San Carlos. It appears they met with the sabre, and that the British Officer completely beat the Count to the ground, and that he could not be compelled to rally and combat.

We by no means wish to treat a melancholy subject with levity, but we cannot help mentioning the following anecdote. Since the bankruptcy of Aberdeen, the salary of the common hangman, as well as that of all the other public officers, has fallen in arrear. There were three half-years' payment due him; and he refused to perform the late melancholy execution till his arrears of wages were paid him;—observing, however, that he wished “a' the gentlemen of the Town of Aberdeen war as sure o' their silver.”—Glasgow Paper.

DREADFUL EFFECTS OF BOXING.—On Wednesday night last, in consequence of a quarrel, as we understand, a father and son repaired into the street, at the corner of Whitehart-yard, Catherine-street, to fight. In one round the young man knelt down his father, when he was heard to say he was bleeding to death, and in a moment he was watering in his blood, in which state he was carried to Mr. Cole's, surgeon, of Charles-street, Covent-garden, for assistance. A desperate wound was found on his leg, which perforated some of the blood-vessels. Mr. Cole dressed the wound, and the patient was then conveyed in a hackney-coach to the Middlesex-hospital, in a dangerous condition, where he now lies.

The Ministerial papers have for a fortnight past been daily reminding us that the contest for Westminster was not a common one, but a contest for principles. Well, the contest is over, and the day of triumph come—but not for the principles those papers wished to see prevail. Since they have all along desired that the popularity of their cause should be judged by the result of this election, they must acknowledge that it is now low indeed; for notwithstanding the vast exertions made by the agents of Government, and the extraordinary influence, direct and indirect, which has been resorted to, the Court Candidate has been left several hundred votes in the rear. This defeat is the more signal, for the Ministry never did try, and never can again expect to try, a contest in Westminster under such favourable circumstances. The court candidate was pure from any positive act of political delinquency. He could affect to be independent of Ministers. He was supple, sly, and submissive. Shipwrecks and spittles, mud and confusion, were all calculated to favour his hostile pretensions. The popular party too has unfortunately been split, and came into the field with division and dissension in their ranks. Yet notwithstanding this great disadvantage, they have succeeded, and the Treasury have only obtained from the whole population of Westminster 4,809 votes, two-thirds of which may at least be estimated to be the result of compulsion, corruption, and undue influence. The difficulty which has been experienced in dragging the Treasury voters to the poll, is an incontrovertible proof of the disgust with which the cause and the conduct of Ministers is regarded by the people of Westminster.—Stamford News.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

Information having been received that the Princess ADELAIDE of Meiningen, to whom the Duke of CLARENCE is to be espoused; was expected to arrive in London on Saturday week, a King's Messenger was despatched to the Duke of CLARENCE to the seat of Sir C. POLE, near Watford. About seven o'clock on Saturday evening, the Princess, accompanied by her mother, the Duchess of MEININGEN, attended by Lord KEITH, Lady ERFFA, Lady OSTERHAUSEN, and Lady RAM; his Excellency Baron ERFFA, the Master of the Horse; his Excellency Baron KONITZ and Dr. FROMM arrived in two carriages of the PRINCE REGENT and two others at Grillon's Hotel; their luggage followed in a caravan and four horses. Soon after they alighted they partook of an excellent dinner, which had been provided in expectation of their arrival. Count MUNSTER came soon after to pay his respects, and remained the whole of the evening with the Princess and the Duchess. About ten o'clock the PRINCE REGENT arrived at the hotel, and was introduced to the Princess and the Duchess by the gentlemen of their suite. The Duke of CLARENCE came to town soon after ten o'clock, and directly proceeded to Grillon's Hotel, when he was introduced by the gentlemen of the suite to his intended bride and her mother. The REGENT and the Duke of CLARENCE remained till near half-past eleven o'clock.

Her MAJESTY was so much relieved on Monday as to be able to receive the Princess ADELAIDE of Meiningen, and the Duchess her mother. The Princess and the Duchess left Grillon's Hotel, on Tuesday, about one, in one of the PRINCE REGENT's carriages and four, with outriders, and proceeded to Kew Palace. The Princess and the Duchess were conducted to the QUEEN's private apartment, where they were introduced to her MAJESTY by the Countess MUNSTER, and were most graciously received.

Her MAJESTY is said of late to have somewhat improved in health;—but, we hear, that, well or ill, she intends to hold no more Drawing-Rooms till the departure to the Continent of the Duke and Duchess of CUMBERLAND.

The nuptials of his Royal Highness the Duke of CLARENCE, with her Serene Highness the Princess ADELAIDE of SAXE MEININGEN, will be celebrated this evening at Kew, at six o'clock. A dinner will be given on the occasion to a select party of the Nobility. The re-marriage of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of KENT, according to the forms of the Church of England, will also take place at the same time.—Courier—Saturday.

There has been some disrespect shown by some person or persons in office in France to the Prince and Princess of HESSE-HOMBOURG. They arrived in the royal yacht off Calais on Monday afternoon, and it being low water, they were put on shore in an open boat about four o'clock, when the only military honour the amiable Princess ELIZABETH, the daughter of the KING and QUEEN of Great Britain, the sister of the PRINCE REGENT, received, consisted of three soldiers and a corporal in undress, and they did not even present arms, and did not pay any attention to the illustrious personages; whereas, when the Grand Duke MICHAEL arrived there, he was received with a discharge of cannon, and as is the case when an Ambassador passes through. The Prince and Princess remained at an hotel till 12 o'clock the next day, and there was no guard of honour at their door.—Court Circular.

Every body knows the happy ingenuity with which the PRINCE REGENT contrived, on a late occasion, to extract good out of evil, and to console Sir W. CURTIS to his own heart's content; but it may not be so generally known, that this feast of reason and this flow of soul outlived the day, and that his Highness remembered with gratitude the delight he had experienced. The REGENT, with characteristic discrimination, sought out the obscure Artist to whom he was principally indebted, and through the medium of Sir WILLIAM and Alderman BIRCH, a professional Alderman (Qy. Was he of the party at Southgate?), conveyed to the Cook a Royal intimation, equivalent to a command in such a case, that he would be graciously received at Carlton-house. The Cook, nothing loth, on this extraordinary occasion, dressed himself, and, to stimulate his best exertions, was regaled on his arrival with cold chickens and tongues, before he was apprised that his Royal Highness was desirous that his skill in dressing turtles should again minister to his delight. The thing was done, and his Highness was pleased to command, that in addition to the honour, a ten-pound Bank-note should be presented to the Artist, with six bottles of the oldest wine in his cellar (in vino veritas). Whether, like some foreign curiosities, it was sent home in one of the Royal carriages, we have not heard. Who can refrain from exclaiming, What a gentleman this cook must be!—From a Correspondent.

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 328.

ENGLISH OPERA.

THIS Theatre has opened for the season. We shall speak of its more operatical efforts, when the first new musical piece comes before us; and shall notice some lesser novelties next week. At present, we give our readers a sketch of its principal performers;—who are most of them of a sketchy description.

And first, to take care of our climax, and begin with the men. The chief of these, we believe (for we speak without the list before us) are WRENCH, CHATTERLEY, BARTLEY, PEARMAN, HORN, and Mr. T. P. COOKE, who has just taken his march hither from Drury-lane.

WRENCH is a sort of lively etching of an actor. He is a plump etching too, in regard to person; but he is tall, and has such quick thoughts and words, that you think him agile; he seems always on the borders of something, rather than arrived at it: and all this, with a young aspect, a genteel figure, and a face which has the roundness and merriment of a pudding without the heaviness of it,—a knack of singing a bad song in a kind of off-hand manner and without appearing to think it a good one,—and a considerable talent of nodding, bushing, and wearing tight uniforms,—makes him get through a two or three-act piece, as if he was born for it. He is too incomplete for a great actor, but what there is of him is much too good for a bad one. He shows what can be done with a little real animal spirit and shrewdness, when they have self-knowledge enough neither to perplex themselves with over-consciousness nor to go out of their natural bit of play-ground. He is like a great good-humoured boy run up into a dragon officer. If he were not acting and making love, he looks as if he would be robbing orchards.

CHARLES has more talent for broad humour, than many give him credit for; but he overdoes it: and the excess does not look so much like excess of enjoyment, as a bad compliment to the spectators. He seems to think they will not feel it, unless he keeps ringing it, as an Irishman would say, in their eyes: and this, by the way, involves a bad compliment to himself. He has all the manner of an actor spoilt by being a favourite with a country creature. But perhaps he has mended since we last saw him. He must be very useful to this theatre, from the variety of characters which he performs.

MR. BARTLEY is well known to the visitors of the winter theatres. He is one of those actors, who give one the idea of being more intelligent off the stage than on it. The reason is perhaps, that they speak the dialogue with an air of understanding it as readers, while the awkwardness of their action shews they have little talent as performers.

MR. PEARMAN is a singer with a delicate and sweet voice, and is by no means destitute of feeling. Perhaps a care-worn countenance gives him an additional interest with the spectators, especially as there is an air about him of confidence mixed with presumption. He seems to know the extent of his talent, and to make neither more nor less of it accordingly.

MR. HORN is not so pleasant either in voice or manner, the former of which is weak, internal, and full of effort. The deficiencies of the latter are not of the worst kind: but they are very formal and theatrical. The best feature in this gentleman, as our before-mentioned Irish friend would say, is his good looks. He is what they call a handsome man. Of his compositions we would rather not speak, unless we are compelled. What an ungracious office is a critic's,—obliged to say those things of men who may be the best fellows in the world off the stage. If Mr. HORN is one of these, as very likely he is, we can only say, that he is a much better thing than either a good actor or musician:—but if he were all three, it would certainly be better.

MR. T. P. COOKE we have seldom seen but in melodramas and melodramatic characters, so that we have little to say of him but that he appears very well suited to such parts. His person and aspect are handsome, and he seems very skilful in what may be called the manual exercise of his art. We remember, however, one character, though an humble one, in which we ought to have noticed him before, as exhibiting something of a higher talent. It was that of a Dutch Skipper in the Maid of the Inn. It was like a portrait from life, with all the mixed strength and laxness of a sea-faring hero; and the dialect was as admirable as the manner.

The women here are the same as they are apt to be in most places,—some of them very stupid, some lively, some pleasant because they are handsome, some more handsome because they are pleasant; and the commonest of them, better than the commonest of the other sex.

Those whom we do not mention at present, we beg to range themselves under any of these heads they please. We hope Miss STEPHENSON has been studying, since we saw her last; as there was a good deal in her worth cultivating, especially of the lady's-maid and school-girl sort. She sings rather painfully, and turns up her eyes a little too lavishly; but even this affectation, partly real and partly theatrical, happens to fall in very well with her slim person and her gawky kind of voice; and a handsome face, which seems to understand itself, renders her altogether admirably boarding-school.

Of Miss KELLY, who is so well known and admired, we shall also have too much to say to need describing her here. We shall content ourselves, as we well may, (and she too), with copying a sonnet written in her praise by the profoundest critic now living:—

C

TO MISS KELLY.

You are not, Kelly, of the common strain,
That stoop their pride and female honour down
To please that many-headed beast the town,
And vend their lavish smiles and tricks for gain;
By fortune thrown amid the actors' train,
You keep your native dignity of thought;
The plaudits that attend you come unsought,
As tributes due unto your natural vein.
Your tears have passion in them, and a grace
Of genuine freshness, which our hearts avow;
Your smiles are winds whose ways we cannot trace,
That vanish and return we know not how—
And please the better from a pensive face,
A thoughtful eye, and a reflecting brow.

THE LATE MR. BADDELEY AND DRURY-LANE FUND.

[From a Correspondent.]

Proceedings have been instituted by the Trustees of this Fund for the Support of Aged and Infirm Actors, to recover some property, unjustly and unfeelingly withheld from it, by one of the late Mr. BADDELEY's Executors. The property in question consists of some freehold premises at Moulsey, which Mr. BADDELEY, by his Will, left to be divided in tenevents, and made the residence of his aged Brethren and Sisters of the Sock and Buskin; together with a sum of money, and a leasehold estate in town, either to enlarge the establishment at Moulsey, or add to the comforts of the residents in any other way. But, alas! so undefinable a commodity is law, that a man may dedicate his life to the study of it, and die in comparative ignorance at last;—for although a most elaborate and voluminous Will and Testament was digested and prepared by a sage of the law, and executed with all due ceremonies by Mr. BADDELEY, it has been discovered that the Statute of Mortmain utterly defeats the Bequest which the Will contains, and the benevolent Executor, who was made the residuary legatee, instead of obeying the strong dying injunctions of his friend,—repeatedly pressed upon him throughout the Will, to guard the interests of the Charity,—most humanely insists on annihilating the claim of the Fund, and keeping the whole property himself, in the teeth of all intreaty and remonstrance. As the estate however, for want of an heir, has escheated to the Crown, the trustees are proceeding, under legal advice, to establish proof of such escheat, in which case there is little doubt but the benevolence of the sovereign will regret the property as intended by the Will. And yet, though such a result is anticipated, this heartless, unfeeling Executor of his friend's Will is determined to put the Charity to an expence of two or three hundred pounds, rather than relinquish a property he must be fully convinced will never belong to him. This man is a Surgeon; let him "anatomise Rogan," and see what breeds about her heart. Is there any cause in nature for these hard hearts?"

Actual increase on the quarter, 1,120,645

From these documents we see that there is an increase of above 3,000,000*l.* in the last year, and of 1,120,645*l.* in the last quarter of it; from whence we infer, that the revenue improves in an accelerated degree, inasmuch as four quarters such as the last (that is, the sum of 1,120,645*l.* multiplied by four) would amount to 4,482,580*l.*, or 1,426,017*l.* more than the receipts of all the four quarters as they stand at present. But surely, while nature, industry, and enterprise are thus favouring us on the one hand, economy and retrenchment should do a little on the other, so as at last to make our expences and revenue meet: between which, it must not be forgotten that there exists a much greater deficit than this specified improvement of the latter is able to fill up. This is the real point of view in which the subject should be placed. He cannot be called rich who has a large income, but he who lives happily and easily within his income.—Times.

FINE ARTS.

LETTER II.—To MESSIEURS JOSHUA CRISTALL, JOHN LINNELL, AND THE REST OF THE MAJORITY OF THE SPRING-GARDEN SOCIETY OF PAINTERS.

GENTLEMEN,—Nearly three weeks have elapsed; and my Letter respecting the table for the sale of Prints at your Spring-gardens Exhibition-room remains unanswered. I would willingly find some other reason for your silence when thus publicly called upon, than the consciousness that your motives will not bear to appear in print: nor shall I insist on this. Whether you have any better motive or not, please to accept of such acknowledgments from me, as good manners may be supposed to dictate, for what has been orally imparted to me on the above subject through the medium of our mutual friends, of which I understand the substance to be briefly as follows:—

1st, That in the event of your compliance with my request, you fear such quantities of the trash of art would be poured forth upon your table, from such toy-shops as FULLER'S and ORME'S, that you must be at the expense of stronger legs for it. And, 2d, That you hold the print-selling privilege in reserve, to operate as an inducement to those who are only Exhibitors, to become responsible Members of your Society. To neither of these pleas can I concede the point at issue.

In reply to the first:—Such Societies and places of Exhibition as yours, were never intended to be for any other persons than professional Artists. It is well known that shop-keeping dealers, both in pictures and prints, are out of the question. Now the number of Artists who publish their own works,—unfortunately for the public (I say so, because all the best English Engravings have been produced in this way)—are but very few; and as there is always a discretionary power vested in your Hanging Committee, of excluding such pictures as might discredit your walls, surely a table thus slenderly assailed and thus powerfully guarded, would be sufficiently safe. Forgive me, then, if I think this is mere pretext.

With regard to your second plea:—You know that I consider my son EDWIN (at the irresponsible age of sixteen) too young to become a member of any such Society; and for myself, fortunately, I am too old—that is to say, am old enough to have quitted in distaste two Societies calling themselves Benevolent, because I found them theatres of paltry personal intrigue, of which the management was usurped by those self-elected and self-illuminated legislators, who, without first principles, and incapable of distinguishing between a major and a minor proposition, would rush in with their legal shreds and patches, where BENTHAM himself would tread with caution. If you should here sophisticate, and say, I do wrong to confound yours with Benevolent Societies: without denying this, my reply would be, that I should do very wrong to occupy the pages of the Examiner and the attention of the public, with any egotistical view of the case. Let us therefore regard your conduct and professions, with reference to Artists in general—or rather, with reference to Art.

You say, it is for the sake of inducing those who are only Exhibitors, to become Members of the Society, that you have enacted this law of exclusion from the print-table. Is it from generosity, then, that you wish others to participate with you in the good things of the Society? or are you Jones that have lost your tails in the trap? In either case, why not, by being a little more generous and a little more frank, appeal to the generosity of others, rather than address dark hints to their selfish feelings?—Have those whom you invite to exhibit, lost all credit with you for the better kind of sympathies? Do not, in this case, invite, or admit, them at all. Keep all the good things to yourselves. You are said to have among you Saints, and but five loaves and two small fishes. Let therefore the Exhibiting rogues have none of these: Let them have neither profits of the table; profits of the door-money; sale of their pictures: nor privilege, pleasure, or pride, of hanging them in the best lights. Why should you? How can you be such simpletons?

As for those Members who are said to profess themselves to be religious beyond the generality of other men,—Is it for me to remind them of a divine precept? Or do they willingly neglect, or knowingly refuse, to do as they would be done by?

And for those few of your number, who have attained in their works so much of the genuineness of nature and the light of truth,—such a straight-forward intellectual looking out on the poetic aspect of things, as we behold in their pictures,—for them to be so crooked, uncourteous, and unkind, for so I must deem it, in the performance of their duties toward their neighbour and the public. Alas! for liberality, you, JOSHUA, in particular, whom I have formerly praised (incognito,) with so much honest pleasure: you, who in your scenes of rustic grace or classic magnificence, can “catch, ere it change, the Cynthia of the minute,”—for you to give me occasion to assign you thus publicly of letting slip a time-loose and golden opportunity, whose benefit to Art might have flowed on for ages,—and from a sordid motive too, dictated either by a small-minded attention to petty pecuniary gain, or by that esprit du corps which should be the shame of all professors of science and the liberal arts.—I own has excited, in no ordinary degree, both my surprise and regret. But, by golden opportunity, what do I mean? (may possibly be asked.) I will answer this. Of the existing Societies of exhibiting Artists, yours was formed the last; you had therefore a glorious opportunity of doing for the art of Engraving, what other Societies, ostensibly instituted for the benefit of the arts, have left undone: what even the British Institution has not yet done. Yet how have you neglected, to such yourselves of this fair and honourable occasion. How have you avoided what was good, and sedulously copied what was most reprehensible, in the constitution and conduct of the Royal Academy. Can you be at a loss here? I mean, its private malice; its shallow, ungenerous, unpatriotic, and unsentimental habit of exclusively identifying merit itself in art, with the practice of its own Members; its beckoning to a narrow selfishness, and its consequent neglect of the existence of that British public for whose the King intended it; its ignoble striving for a small selfish benefit, and its accomplishment of a worthy and noble purpose of its institutions; and its pertinacious adherence to bad laws, frustrative of its ostensible purposes, and to the old, crooked, and low-principled roads to its honours and emoluments.

Permit me to assure you, Gentlemen, that it was far less for the sake of any profit that I expected my name could derive from your selling Mr. HAYDON'S Drawing-book, or the "Fighting Dogs," than on account of general consequences, that I made those applications which have met with your refusal. I thought it would be honourable to Artists to originate a fine thing and set a good example. I wished you to attain that honour. I thought too that the ARMYENANS would not have failed to see and acknowledge what was right, had the Lacedæmonians practised it. The Lacedæmonians! did I say? Again I am forgetful. How could I be so mistaken? How could I apply that genuine of sound virtue and of ruddy health, to your decrepid and pale-faced republic? But enough. Fortune, and plain Simplicity, and Public Good, have in vain proffered you the means of superior pleasure and superior respectability. With cold and crafty hearts, and with open but stony eyes, you have chosen to join in principle,—or, in the want of it,—the selfish and ungrateful Academic crew, who can bear to press forward to honour and glory, without bestowing on the arduous and humble art that has facilitated their progress, a single smile of disinterested approbation, or the smallest mark of favour or affection. Should you see reason to renounce the narrow notions that I conceive to be so unprofitable to the public, and so unpropitious to your final success, I shall with pleasure continue to subscribe myself, Gentlemen, your sincere friend and servant.

CRUEL EXHIBITION.

4, Bouverie-st., July 6, 1818.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—An article, headed with the epithets "Cruel Exhibition," appears in your paper, the Examiner, of yesterday (Sunday), 5th July, 1818, written, as I should conceive, in a manner highly prejudicial to the interests of the house where that "Exhibition" is said to be exposed. It is not my present purpose either to expose, or defend myself on that subject, so palpably calculated to inflame the unreflecting human mind against the house in question, but to call upon you, or through you, upon the individual author of that composition, to show, that it has not been maliciously written for the express purpose of that mischief, which such an article is too well calculated to effect; and if I cannot prove, after he shall have shown clearly that his motive is not malice, that mine is defensible, the "Cruel Exhibition" shall be suppressed, and every contribution on my part, that is not derogatory from a principle actuated by integrity of intention, shall be duly expressed. Let the author of that glowing address "to Mr. Examiner" come boldly forward under his proper name, and avow his real object for slapping it into a new paper.

"Leaving the offender in your strong hand!"—it is to be presumed with the intention (for it is not otherwise apparent) that, by his shades of colouring, your able management and popular indignation let loose, he may draw down, however really unmerited, as much odium on only the implicated multitude of the individuals in exhibiting the house, as will amount to the full gratification of his spleen and private pique; while you, by the ready admission of this article into your paper, afford a justification for the supposition, that you are a willing agent to his purpose.

Though I will admit, should he forthwith shew that I have outraged humanity, public feeling, and decorum, to the extent of his exposition, that to the public such conduct is amenable, yet in this, or any other country where laws are recognized, can it be admissible, that the same party shall be accuser, judge, and jury? To say no, is the replication every one must feel in a free country like this, where our excellent Constitution affords equal redress to the powerful, and redress to the weak, otherwise the wise and judicious, the weak and the base, would be on a footing, and the bonds of social order rent asunder; but where the grounds of accusation may turn out to be malice, or the false colouring of misapprehension, the answer is virtually an incendiary, who, while apparently but appealing in favour of helpless objects, he is effectively perverting the generous sentiments of feeling minds, substituting prejudice for justice, and mischievous consequences where approbation would be the result of rectitude and correct representation.

If however the real meaning of Mr. E. W., be he who he may, (for no doubt those letters are intended to be honoured with the dignity of initial characters) be the cause of humanity, let him furnish his name, come fairly and openly into the field, and I will not fail nor fear to meet him there on that score.

My future proceedings will entirely depend upon your prompt notice of this my call upon you, and the light you may choose, or have the opportunity of throwing, upon this matter, with the view of adopting the speediest measures commensurate with the importance of my concerns, to stem the mischief, which you must be aware is now as widely and rapidly spreading as your paper can display; but which I am willing to believe and hope has happened inadvertently on your part.—And am, with due respect, Sir, your very obedient servant,

W. JONES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—The author of the observations, inserted in your paper of last Sunday, respecting a cruel exhibition in a chemist's window, at the west end of the town, inherits the thanks of every person possessing the least degree of humanity. Torturing experiments, made upon animals, can hardly be justified, even upon the ground of their pretended utility, in furthering the advancement of scientific knowledge, as their results have seldom proved satisfactory; and where no good can be expected to accrue, such practices are disgraceful. It is to be lamented that a propensity to cruelty should seem to be innate with human beings; it were equally to be wished that the laws of civilized nations punished the perpetrators of such monstrous barbarities. Strange, that in this enlightened age, and improved state of chemical science, there should be found one of its cultivators so lost to a sense of its dignity, as not to exercise his talents in exhibiting some curious process, were it but an Arbor Dianæ, rather than a disgusting spectacle, calculated only for the amusement of the idle and giddy.—I am, Sir, your humble servant,

PHILO-HUMANITAS.

BANKRUPT LAWS.

MR. DUFRENE'S PETITION, PRESENTED TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, ON THE 5TH JUNE, BY THE HON. H. G. BENNETT, AND ORDERED TO LIE ON THE TABLE AND BE PRINTED.

To the Honourable the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled:—The Humble Petition of John Dufrene, late of Leeds, in the County of York, Merchant:—

SHEWETH,—That your Petitioner begs leave to refer your Honourable House to a Petition of his which was presented on the 1st of May, 1817, praying that a Bill then before the House for investing Commissioners of Bankrupt with an unlimited discretionary power might not pass into a law; which Petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

That the said Petition stated various circumstances respecting a Commission of Bankrupt, bearing date the 13th day of June, 1812, which was sued out against your Petitioner, contrary to the will of one hundred and eleven creditors of his, by a person in London, who had not any legal claims for debt against your Petitioner, and who chose himself sole assignee. The allegations contained in the said Petition relative to your Petitioner's case have been verified by affidavits, which his opponents have not been able to disprove.

That the said Petition further stated, that through the abuse of discretionary power by Commissioners of Bankrupt, your Petitioner had suffered about five years' imprisonment; and as this imprisonment is still continued, your Petitioner now begs leave to state to your Honourable House the following particulars thereof, viz. That at the third public meeting at Guildhall, on the 28th of July, 1812, your Petitioner surrendered to the Commissioners under the said Commission, but protested against its validity, and signified his intention to petition the Lord High Chancellor for a supersedeas. Your Petitioner was, however, examined before the Commissioners, and he answered all the questions that were put to him; but his final examination was adjourned to the 22d day of August, in order that his Petition for a supersedeas might previously be heard. That when the said Petition came on to be heard, on or about the 17th day of August, this sole assignee, who sued out the Commission, stated by his Counsel that he could not be ready, and moved the Lord Chancellor to let the Petition stand over till the next day of Petitions, which motion his Lordship granted. That at the adjourned meeting at Guildhall, on the 22d of the same month, your Petitioner's Counsel attended and stated to the Commissioners, that the decision of the Lord Chancellor having been delayed by the said assignee, they ought to adjourn any further examination of your Petitioner until his cause should be heard; but the said Commissioners refused to adjourn, and pressed your Petitioner to be examined. Your Petitioner, however, conceived that he had gone every reasonable length by answering all the questions which were put to him at the third meeting, when he signified his intention to petition the Lord Chancellor for a supersedeas; and as this said assignee, who sued out the Commission of Bankrupt, had declared himself not ready to prove the validity of his proceedings, when the Petition for a supersedeas came on to be heard, and as he had on that occasion been allowed further time by the Lord Chancellor to answer the said Petition, your Petitioner, by the advice of his attorney, asked the Commissioners to adjourn until the validity of the Commission had been decided by the Lord Chancellor; and on declining any further examination for the reasons aforesaid, the Commissioners committed him to the King's Bench Prison, where he now remains.

That your Petitioner, therefore, humbly submits, that this conduct on the part of the Commissioners was not only contrary to all reason and equity, but that it was also contrary to law, according to the following extract from the 16th s. 30th c. 5th Geo. II. relative to the power of Commissioners of Bankrupt to commit persons to prison, viz.—“In case any such Bankrupt or Bankrupts, or other person or persons, shall refuse to answer, or shall not fully answer, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, or the major part of them, all lawful questions, &c. (not having a reasonable objection to the wording thereof, or otherwise, &c.) it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Commissioners, &c. to commit,” &c.

That by the foregoing extract from the Act of Parliament it appears to your Petitioner, that “a reasonable objection” is a sufficient legal authority for not answering Commissioners of Bankrupt, and presuming that his aforesaid objection to answer was a reasonable one, he conceives himself entitled to an honourable discharge from the said commitment; and as such commitments cannot fail to be disreputable, the preservation of your Petitioner's character absolutely requires that he should not seek to be discharged otherwise than according to law; that such legal discharge is also necessary for his future security, because even if your Petitioner could be induced to sacrifice the present point, on which he has now suffered near six years imprisonment, and which point any person may comprehend, he would still be in danger of being recommitted by the Commissioners on some other point, which perhaps neither himself nor any other person might be able to understand, as it is the practice of Commissioners of Bankrupt to commit persons to prison on merely stating generally that the answers they have received are unsatisfactory without giving the particular grounds of their dissatisfaction, which in many instances might be essential to a further answer or explanation; and exclusive of the foregoing objections, your Petitioner submits, that if the Commission of Bankrupt be invalid, it would moreover be highly inconsistent for him to pass through such an inquisitorial sieve, thus subjecting himself to still further misrepresentation, and various other evils which might arise from either the misconception or hostility of his adversaries.

That your Petitioner, in addition to his own case, humbly begs leave to state, that he has lately read the minutes of evidence taken before the Select Committee of your Honourable House on the Bankrupt Laws, and their Report thereon, by which he regrets to find that the evidence which has been given upon this important subject could not be sufficient to enable your Committee to obtain a full view of the defects in the present Bankrupt system, because the said evidence is chiefly, if not wholly, of an ex parte nature, being confined to the supposed interests of creditors, while the interests of debtors and their necessary protection from injustice and oppression have been but slightly noticed; and as, in the commercial parts of the community, creditors in general are debtors also, your Petitioner submits, that the interests of honest debtors and honest creditors are one, and that without taking a full and impartial view of the subject, even the declared object of better protecting the interests of creditors must fail, because the possible exercise of injustice towards the debtor is now, in various ways, and must continue to be, productive of injustice towards the creditor.

That by the said evidence taken before the Select Committee it appears, that several harsh measures have been proposed to them as remedies for the existing evils in the bankrupt system; but these remedies, your Petitioner fears, would be worse than the disease; one of which is, that an unlimited discretionary power be vested in Commissioners of Bankrupt, and against their judgment to be no appeal.—Your Petitioner therefore submits, that such a Legislative enactment would be to be deprecated, because the limited discretionary power already vested in Commissioners of Bankrupt frequently produces the most degrading and oppressive consequences; for although a bankrupt is always examined upon oath before the Commissioners, yet, whatever may have been his previous respectability in life, he is, according to the present practice, liable to be disbelieved upon his oath; and although he may give the most full and positive answers upon oath, yet he may, at the discretion of the Commissioners, be committed to prison, there to remain without bail or mainprize, on the mere general declaration of the Commissioners that his answers are unsatisfactory; consequently a bankrupt who is committed to prison is sometimes unacquainted with the particular grounds of the dissatisfaction of the Commissioners, who may perhaps themselves be in error, because they cannot in all cases be so well acquainted with a man's trade, business, and concerns as he himself; and your Petitioner presumes, that it is only requisite that these and other evils be generally known to Parliament and to the country, in order to have the practice abolished, which your Petitioner humbly submits, bears more resemblance to the Spanish Inquisition than to an English Court of Law.

JOHN DUFRENE.

On Wednesday, an inquest was held at Old Gravel-lane, on the body of Frances Jockey, a young lady, aged 26, who hung herself.—Mr. Robert Maxwell said the deceased was related to him; on Monday she called at witness's house, and told them she would remain there, as she wanted to see her husband, who had promised to meet her there; she requested to lie down, and went up stairs, where she remained about an hour and a half. On the servant going to call her, she was alarmed at finding the door fastened; she made an alarm, and witness putting his shoulder against the door broke it open, when he found the deceased suspended by a silk handkerchief, one end of which was fastened to a nail in the ceiling, and the other round her neck; her feet were six inches from the floor; he instantly cut her down and laid her on the floor; she was quite dead. The deceased was the wife of a Captain of a Baltic trader. Witness, for the last eight months, observed in the deceased's manners a great alteration; at intervals she had appeared very desponding. Verdict—Insanity.

An inquisition was taken on Wednesday in Newgate, on the body of Patrick Rawlings, aged about 70 years.—Joseph Sevier said the deceased had been six weeks in the infirmary, and had died from a decay of nature.—The Jury were about to return their verdict, when an officer of the prison said that a gentleman who had viewed the body had remarked that there were some very singular appearances upon it. The gentleman alluded to came forward, and said he had made some observations upon the arms of the deceased, which appeared to have had some cord or string tied very tight round them and round the body.—The Coroner ordered the Assistant Surgeon to re-examine the body; having done so, he said that there were deep marks on the arms and body.—Upon inquiry he found that the deceased had had his arms himself, a short time prior to his death, with a silk cord, and said, that he never should be able to die unless he had the cord upon his arms.—Mr. Brown, the Keeper of Newgate, said that the deceased was committed to Newgate for three years, upon a charge of an assault upon a girl; he had several times before been convicted of similar offences; he was a schoolmaster in the neighbourhood of Hatton-garden. Verdict—Natural Death.

Saturday week an inquest was held at Barton, near Gloucester, on the body of Thomas Bick, 21 years of age. It appeared that on the preceding evening Bick was in company with two young men, when some persons came in who had been shooting, and having put down their gun, it was taken up by James Ravenhill, who, pointing it at the deceased, in a jocular way, said, "Mind I don't shoot you," when the piece instantly went off, lodging the whole of its contents in the head of the deceased, who lingered in the most excruciating agony for about an hour and a half, and then expired.—The Jury returned a verdict of Manslaughter, and Ravenhill has been committed for trial.

On Thursday an inquest was held at the London Hospital, on the body of David Torrington, aged 22, whose death was occasioned by his drinking near half a gallon of rum. John Hickmot, surgeon to the London Hospital, sworn, said that the deceased was brought to the hospital on Saturday last, in a state of insensibility, in which he remained for two days, smelling very strong of spirituous liquor: on the third day, when he recovered from his stupor, he said he was a labourer in the West India Dock, and being thirsty, ran to a measure containing upwards of three pints of rum, which he drank all off, and dropped down in a state of insensibility. On the fourth day the deceased became quite deranged, and died mad on Tuesday night. On opening his body after death, his stomach was found in a high state of inflammation. Verdict—Died by excessive drinking.

As the Paddington Coach was going at a quick pace up Cow-lane, on Tuesday afternoon, the coach, on going over a sink (which was very low, not having been raised on a level with the pavement), was overturned. Two persons were thrown with great violence against a wall, and the body of the coach falling on several others who were walking on the pavement, they were dreadfully hurt.

About nine o'clock on Tuesday night, as Mr. Nangle, schoolmaster to the Catholic School, in Dean-street, Soho, accompanied by a gentleman of the name of Condy, were returning to town, from Hampstead, in passing by the Regent's Canal they observed a poor woman, with an infant, about six months old, in her arms, on the point of precipitating herself and child into the water; they hastened to the spot, and happily prevented her executing her dreadful purpose. Mr. Nangle carried the child in his arms, whilst Mr. Condy supported the unfortunate woman as far as Mr. Down's, the Union Tavern, John-street, Oxford-street, where there was a general meeting of the gentlemen of the Catholic Club assembled for charitable purposes, and to which club Mr. Nangle is Secretary, when Mrs. Down took her into a private room, and after giving her some proper nourishment, her case was investigated; after which she was supplied with money to answer her immediate wants, and her address taken down, in order to make further inquiry into the truth of her statement, with the intention to afford her more permanent benefit.

Monday afternoon, as the child of Mr. George Freeman, builder, of John-street, Westminster, was playing before the door with some other children, a woman passing by took the infant, which was about two years old, up in her arms, and, going towards the Horseferry-road, she was proceeding to strip it, when a boy, who perceived the transaction, gave the alarm. The woman attempted to make her escape; but the mob overtook her, and proceeded to execute summary justice on her by drawing her through a pond.—She would probably have fallen a victim to their vengeance, had it not been for the interference of a constable.

On Thursday morning, as some men were digging a sewer near New Bethlem, the earth fell in, and the foreman (Marwood), with three others, were buried in the ruins. Two of the men, and the foreman, were got out after the lapse of an hour, the latter quite dead, who has left a wife and large family to deplore his loss.

The Rev. W. O'Connor, a priest, had his arm amputated on Tuesday night, in Dublin, in consequence of its being fractured in the following singular manner:—He resided at Galway, and having some business in Dublin of his own to transact, he was intrusted by a friend to take charge of a large sum of money, to bring to the capital. So careful was the priest of his trust, that having on the road placed it for security about his person when in bed, in the course of the night he dreamt that a man stood over him with a pistol in his hand, and demanded the money. Determined to protect his trust from the imaginary robber, he made a sudden blow at the supposed pistol; he unfortunately struck his arm against the bed-post, and shattered the bone in such a manner as to render amputation necessary.

THE FUTURE PARLIAMENT.—SPEECH OF MR. LAWSON TO HIS CONSTITUENTS.

THE House of Commons is now pretty nearly re-composed,—if re-composition it can be called, the Members and precious limbs of which have not yet come together. Not that we wish to speak disrespectfully of some of the old Members, or many, we trust, of the new; but it is impossible this fine weather to help a feeling of pleasantness in thinking of a multitude of the others. What a bustle is there among them at present, in resuming their honours or enjoying them for the first time! With what an easy pride will they pass their time between this and the first session! How often look grand to their own minds, and repeat EZZEZER TOMKINS, Esquire, M.P.! How speculate upon what they shall say, or rather what they shall not say! How imagine to themselves the new kind of flowing triumph (the “swift-eyed scorning,” as a certain provoking dog would call it) with which they shall travel to take possession!—the conscious but repressed dignity with which they quit the backward-heaving coach, and enter their town-houses or hotels!—the grave but joyous dash down to “the House;”—the calm though lofty tread through the lobby;—the indifferent taking of one’s seat;—the bow of genteel and mutual congratulation to the conscious friend or more conscious minister;—the debate, too much pre-occupied or not worth while to speak in;—the vote, conscientious of course;—and all the after lounges, recognitions, presentations, bows, little laughs, megrims, dozings, dumbnesses, yeas and nays, grave faces, red faces, successful faces,—mean-growing, petty, and miserable faces.

One of the most curious things in all this is, that the Members, for the most part, go to their meeting without any requisites for the task. Some have a little general, but no local knowledge; and many more have no general knowledge, but enough local to oblige those who are worth obliging. But what we mean is, that for the most part (to judge from preceding Parliaments), they know no more of politics or the interests of humanity in the larger sense, than cattle-drivers coming to dispose of their sheep know of the beauties of the country. Yes; the Saturday-night Strephons, with bits of candle in their hats, and 335 on their arms, poking the poor sheep through thick and thin, know about as much of Arcadia, as these pinners and pounders of their fellow-creatures do of the capacities of human nature. And this is the highest “privilege of Parliament;”—for all other assemblies, who meet for a particular purpose, are bound to know something of their task. A painter, to be an R.A., must at least know black from white; and a musician must be able to discern a flat from a sharp, before he declares himself irrevocably for the flats; but a Member of Parliament has only to cast his eye on the Red-book, and to say Aye or No, as somebody tells him, and he throws as pretty a light on his object, and makes as hum-drum a harmony, as the eyes and ears of Legitimacy can desire. Some knowledge indeed is requisite for those who oppose measures; and a good deal more for the few men, who like to have and to give their reasons for independence;—the more ostensible retainers also of Ministers must not trip, if they can help it, in their grammar or geography, though Mr. CANNING at present speaks for them all, and they need not take much trouble; but to be a regular hum-drum party man or even a Minister himself, little more is requisite than a few phrases about question—I’m sure—features—bearings—Honourable Gentlemen, &c., and such a profound ignorance of the globe and its inhabitants, as shall leave the possessor no sense of his own incapacity. My Lord CASTLEREAGH knew nothing about the first island he came to off the Dutch coast.

Enough however at present of these uninformed gentry, who

From the animated canvass come Demanding souls.

Too many of the former Members have been returned, to shew us that a great portion of the new Parliament will resemble the old: but at the same time, enough new ones have been returned to convince us that it will be a more spirited and intelligent one. We have spoken of this matter before, and mentioned some names too well known to repeat; but every week, thank Heaven, furnishes us with some others, who enjoy a similar reputation among their acquaintance; and indeed there is one thing alone, which could not but have had considerable effect in exciting intelligent men to come forward:—we mean, the extraordinary spectacle of a set of inferior understandings continuing to rule a country like this;—continuing to rule, merely upon the strength of an enemy’s rashness, whom after all they would have suffered to reign if he would have consented,—and of conspiring with their real masters, an oligarchical aristocracy, to hinder their country’s Constitution from being renovated. The nation could not have heard, read, and thought, as it has done, and still witnessed with despair this singular and stupid disgrace. The very journals written by the hirelings would tend instinctively to injure their masters, being part of the handicraft of knowledge at any rate, and not always badly manufactured.

Among those who have been thus impelled to interfere in behalf of their country’s old reputation,—even if it be only to rescue Parliament from its unnatural character for dullness,—we have felt exceeding pleasure in hearing of the gentleman, whose name is at the head of our paper. We first saw some extracts in the Chronicle from his speech to his constituents; but a friend has since supplied us with the whole substance of it printed at Cambridge, and we have given another extract or two in addition. Mr. LAWSON is but 25 years of age; and we understand, had just gained the highest honour in the University. From a scholarship he has leaped into Parliament; and what is still better, he evidently thinks that it depends on the conduct, or at any rate the proofs of intellect afforded by him and men like him to shew, whether such a leap is upwards or downwards. But we shall proceed to give our extracts, preceded by a little sketch of the previous state of the place which he put up for, taken also from the pamphlet:—

Boroughbridge is a small market and borough town in Yorkshire, in the parish of Aldborough, a large village, which also sends two Members to Parliament. The whole four have been for some years nominated by the Duke of Newcastle, who possesses a large majority of the Aldborough houses, and a small one at Boroughbridge. A week previous to the Election, Mr. Lawson announced his intention of opposing the two new members nominated by the Duke, George Mundy, Esq. Captain R.N., a relation of the Duchess, and Thomas Murdoch, Esq. (as it is believed), a barrister. Owing to the quiet way in which Elections had been conducted there for some time, much in the same way as Vestry Meetings, a Member had not thought it necessary to shew his face for several Elections; Generals Sir H. and Sir W. Clinton, the two late Members, had never been near the place. On the rumour of opposition, an express was sent to Clumber, Nottinghamshire, the seat of his Grace, to fetch down all the four Members. The two Members for Aldborough, Mr. Vernon, son of the Archbishop of York, and Mr. Fynes, son of Dr. Fynes, late Prebendary of Westminster, came down, as did Captain Mundy. Mr. Murdoch never appeared, and Mr. Vernon pleaded his cause.

At eleven o'clock precisely, on Saturday, June 20, 1818, a Hustings having been erected, and an immense concourse of people being present, it being the fair at Boroughbridge, the three candidates were severally proposed and seconded, after which Captain Munday shortly addressed the Electors. After this, Mr. Vernon spoke in behalf of his friend Mr. Murdoch, and stated his absence as quite owing to unforeseen circumstances. He assured them, he was of all men the most fit to represent them.

Some other proceedings having taken place, the new Candidate addressed the Electors:—he said—

Gentlemen, I come not as many men do, seeking the favour of their constituents, as the kingdom of heaven should be sought, by humility of profession; I come not boasting of my own unworthiness, and assuring you of my utter incapacity to serve you. Nor can I here avoid expressing my utter astonishment at the confident hardihood of those many solicitors of public favour, who ground their pretensions on having no pretensions at all; who either being fools speak the truth, or being wise men speak falsely.

Mr. LAWSON then proceeds to speak of the old representatives, and gives a good orthodox account of Parliamentary faith:—

I will now advert a little more minutely to the conduct of your late representatives, because by them we must estimate my present opponents, since they spring from the same source, and are nominated by the same influence. Well, then, they were both, I believe, Major-Generals, and I am perfectly willing to believe each, in his profession, not only major but maximus. I will give each of them credit for being very fine fellows in their way; and I dare say, though you have never had ocular demonstration of it, you will do the same. For we are told, "blessed is he that believeth, though he hath not seen."

After noticing the impossibility of a military man's doing his duty at once both at home and abroad, Mr. LAWSON continues in the following very pleasant and promising strain:—

They may also possibly be exceedingly grateful for your long continued favours, for passing their septennial accounts so often without even the slight ceremony of a reckoning or audit-day; but their gratitude, if any thing of the kind has ever existed, has been so great as to be, as we sometimes read, owing to the overpowering force of feeling, quite inaudible. And among all our superabundance of zeal and loyalty, we have always been under the mortifying necessity of toasting "the absent members!" And yet to state the matter fairly, their absence may perhaps be owing to their military ideas, wrong though well meant. For as they know, that a General's business is not to go into the heat of the battle, but to remain afar off in distant security, they may possibly have applied this mode of reasoning to elections; and instead of going themselves into the bustle, may have imagined, the right way was to send their aide-de-camps here, their stewards and agents, with orders, which they expected to get obeyed with all the promptitude of martial subordination. I wish most sincerely, that maxim of common law was made part of the law of elections, "de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio," that is, those not forthcoming are considered as not existing. If so, all the four Members that have represented this parish, (the only parish in England, I believe, that sends four) would have been long since ineligible. For no one, who bestows even the most cursory glance on the map of Britain, can help being astonished at the brilliant assemblage of stars, which our part of the country presents; places sending two Members being typified, as you perhaps know, by two little stars.* For though probably all would allow Cornwall to be the milky way, shining with a continued stream of light, like one of its own putrid pilchard bones gleaming in the dark front its rottenness, they must grant this parish to be, at least, some brilliant little constellation—the Bull's eye, for instance, or Orion's belt; unless it reminded them, of what is perhaps a more appropriate idea, some of those decayed and corrupted passages in old manuscripts and legends, where the deficiency of genuine text is supplied by a multitude of asterisks.

And yet some of you will say, "We don't like change, we'll go on as we have done." And I am aware, that there is a proverb, "when the old ones go, there seldom comes a better." This, however, your old members have taken good care, shall in no ways make in their favour; for, how can the old ones be said to go, when they never came?

After telling the Electors that he has not made up his mind decidedly in favour of Reform, but that he is willing to be guided on that point by the wishes of the nation and his constituents, he says—

Since, however, I am not as yet a reformer, you will easily perceive how unfortunate that circumstance is for my present harangue; by this untoward event, how many glittering tropes are denied me! how much appropriate invective is cut off! By what unfortunate stars does it happen, that, when nothing would have better suited my purpose, than to have told you, that all the taxation we have endured, all the misery from which we are now happily beginning to recover, was to be traced to the corruption of an overbearing aristocracy, I find it too bold an assertion? O why is not man furnished with two sets of ideas, a duplicate of conscience, a reforming one as well as an anti-reforming one, to be employed alternately as may suit convenience?—Why cannot I, like the Bishops, preach up peace in the Lord's House, and vote for war in the House of Lords? Why, alas! is not my interest adapted to my conscience; or why am I an honest and conscientious man?

In speaking of the conduct of the Duke of Newcastle to the Electors, he addresses them thus—

You will easily recollect another point, in which his behaviour was not the best, on the abolition of the annual races here. It was then almost as good as promised by his agents, that the money given to the races should be transferred to the support of a school for the education of the poor. Well, how was this fulfilled? Why his Grace at once readily came in to the proposal for withdrawing his subscription, but not quite so easily to the transfer of it. After all, considering himself not any ways bound by his agent's words, he has actually pocketed more than half that paltry sum. And he even threatened to pocket all, unless the children of Dissenters were excluded, though here he might perhaps be guided by equitable considerations. For as he well knew, that Methodists profess not to attend races, and so derived no benefit from his money when bestowed on equestrian prizes, he probably thought they had no more right to share in the advantages of his contribution when transferred to the purposes of education, in which they were both willing and wishful to participate. Another instance of his grasping spirit was visible at the inclosure, when, after having come in for, what most people would consider, a very handsome dividend, he wished also to inclose those poor ten or eleven acres of common adjoining the south road, and which had been so eminently serviceable to the poor of the place, and in which he was opposed by a lamented relative of mine. Thus resembling that man, of whom it was said, if you gave him England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales for his estate, he would yet want the Isle of Man for a potatoe garden. You complained heavily of these things at the time. Let it be seen you are not exactly like the brutes, that only growl and grumble when molested, and afterwards forget. Let it be seen, you have not only the power of feeling injury, but the capacity of recollecting it. Unless, perhaps, you are induced to bear the yoke more lightly, and to console yourselves, as the bully in Tom Brown did for his kicking; first, that it was done with a shoe of the finest morocco, and next, that it was done by a Lord.

* When the Duke of Newcastle got a blue riband, it was observed by a disappointed expectant, "He might thank his stars for it."

And again:—

I do think it shameful, that having so long enjoyed the uninterrupted nomination of our Representatives, he should have sent us such inefficient Members, such monarchs of log. Indeed, I begin to suspect, that his Grace is a reformer at heart; for, although he may not for prudent reasons like to avow it in theory, yet he carries its wildest schemes of disfranchisement practically into effect. By nominating Members like our last, who so rarely attended the House, he has done what the reformers wish to see done, he has made the representation of the place null and void. He has thus effectually provided against any accusation, of our being accessaries to the votes of corrupt majorities, or the lavish expenditure of public money. And yet, I imagine, one of the most crying sins of the day, is the very slender attendance of Members of Parliament on important questions. Its all very well for them to affix M.P. to their names, and to frank letters; but it is seriously detrimental to the nation, to have questions so important as the Poor Laws and General Education, attended by about a fourth of the House. It may be very well for them to be taking their pastime abroad, or in the country; but as the fable says, "though its sport for the boys, it kills the frogs."

He thus concludes with a statement of his own pretensions:—

With respect to my parliamentary conduct, though very great eloquence never was in my line, and is what I probably shall never attain; though from my extreme youth* I am not possessed of so much general knowledge as I could wish, yet I do flatter myself, that I could on all occasions bring somewhat of political merriment bearing even in an argumentative manner on the question in debate, and that I could contribute my mite to the conviviality of the House. Besides you would possess a check over me, which you never had, or could have, over the Newcastle† nominees, the power of dismissal. So that you would look forward to each succeeding dissolution of Parliament with somewhat more anxiety than the schoolboy in the story, who only wished for it, that he might have the church service shorter by one prayer, the prayer "for the great council of the nation now assembled in Parliament." Indeed, were I to disappoint either my own expectations or those of my friends, I should be the last person in the world to wish to retain my seat, merely as I said for the purpose of affixing M.P. to my name, and of franking letters.

I have now come openly before you, I have used no unfair arts; I have held out no expectations of gain. Nay, so careful have I been to avoid all imputations of the sort, that I have not so much as a single shilling at present in my pocket; for knowing that sometimes a man found with picklock keys about him is committed as having the implements of housebreaking, so were a casual sixpence to drop from my person here, I might be accused of having come to a contested election having implements of bribery about me.

However, to be serious, I once more ask, whether you are prepared to assert yourselves as independent men, or will you consent to depart into everlasting rottenness? I promise you my best services at home and abroad. By abroad, I do not mean foreign countries; for every place I wish to consider as abroad to me, except Boroughbridge. I promise you try best endeavours, a steadfast integrity, even when I breathe the atmosphere of jobs and pensions, even were I to be put to the toil and peril of sinecure. I promise this without equivocation or mental reservation; and although I cannot go so far as the philosopher of old, who said, "Give me but standing room, and I'll move the universe;" yet I will say, Give me but a seat, and I'll move the House.

These are perhaps the best passages in the speech of our new and very refreshing M. P. The whole of it is pleasant and full of evidences of talent, though there are some jokes in it, at once old and young (if our readers understand that paradox), not quite so worthy of Mr. LAWSON'S wit, but excellent, it must be allowed, for a Member of Parliament. Mr. LAWSON'S Cambridge friends must have been specially delighted with it; and for our own part, if they are grateful for past enjoyment, we are already grateful for what is to come,—so raviving is the idea of having one more clever man in the House of Commons! one more, who can relieve the somnolent length of the debates, and give an intellectual pinch of snuff to the attention! one more, who can help to awaken us again to a sense both of pride and pleasure, when the reigning dunces have made us stare and yawn at the same time, and the "Murphy" of the Treasury Bench "brings his puppies to the eyes of sleeping mortals."

Mr. LAWSON says he is not "yet a reformer." He is not perhaps in some received senses of the word; but he is certainly so in others, though more no doubt from the force of instinctive better taste and youthful virtue, than from any party feeling; and this is the very best way in the world to be a reformer. We are pretty staunch reformers ourselves, yet we are connected with no party. We are not acquainted with Sir FRANCIS BURDETT, nor with Major CARTWRIGHT; neither have we ever seen Mr. COBBETT, nor even the great Bristol Stone, our namesake, with whom the hirelings take such flattering pains to confound us. We hail Mr. LAWSON'S appearance in public life with the sincerest joy. He is not only a man of reading and wit, but, if we are not mistaken in the meaning of some parts of his speech, he is a man of sentiment, in the best sense of the word, and has local and habitual attachments, which precede his liability to attachments more equivocal, and will unite with his intellect to guard him from their seductions. But he is young, it will be said,—triumphantly said by those who have exchanged the happiness of their youth for care and corruption. He is so; but it is this very circumstance, united with what we have just described, that we place the greatest ground of hope of him. Others have been young of course; but it does not follow that they were such young men; and whatever it may be with them, it is no longer a hopeless common-place with some others, that the finest kind of young wisdom is the most desirable species of old. In spite of care, in spite of calumny, in spite of the apparent and ridiculous triumphs of the common-place dictators of the world, they have ever thought so, they still think so, and they find their cheerfulness and their own silently increasing triumph in acting up to what they think. We hope and believe that Mr. LAWSON will help to confute these shakers of shallow heads.

GENERAL ELECTION.

CHAIRING OF SIR FRANCIS BURDETT.

* Mr. Lawson is 25 years of age.
† So manifest was the interference of the Duke of Newcastle at this election, that two or three of his voters obstinately persisted some time in voting for the Duke, even when assured by the Borough Bailiff that his Grace was not a Candidate.

On Monday the Electors who voted for Sir Francis Burdett, assembled in the several parishes of Westminster, in each of which they were met by two Members of the General Committee, who conducted them to their appointed places in the immediate vicinity of Hyde-park, where persons had been previously stationed, bearing the parish banners. The High Constable, however, and the civil officers under him, were not allowed to attend, in consequence of orders from Lord Sidmouth, as High Steward of Westminster. When the Committee were apprised that all were in readiness, an explosion-rocket was discharged from the turnpike-gate, and a signal streamer, of dark blue and white stripes, was immediately hoisted above the lamps, and remained until the parishes were in motion.—The procession then passed in order from Hyde-park-corner along Piccadilly; and as soon as all those preceding the Car had passed the gate at the top of Constitution-hill, another rocket was discharged, and the same streamer again hoisted, as a signal to halt, which was repeated by corresponding streamers to those at the head of the procession, and the whole halted, when the twenty persons on horseback immediately joined; and all others mounted fell in their rear, four and four; and the carriages arranged to follow singly.—As soon as Sir Francis Burdett was seated in the Chair, the third rocket was discharged, and the signal streamer again hoisted above the lamps, and communicated as before, when the whole procession moved forward to the east end of Piccadilly, down the Haymarket, along Cockspur-street, by Charing-cross to the Strand, up Bedford-street and Henrietta-street, round Covent-garden, by the west, north, east, and south sides, down Southampton-street, to the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand.—Whilst the procession was in Covent-garden, a fourth rocket was discharged from the top of the Piazza Coffee-house, and a signal streamer hoisted, when the whole halted, and gave three cheers.—When Sir Francis Burdett had alighted from the chair, the flags, banners, and chair, proceeded round St. Clement's church to Waterloo wharf, under the charge of a number of volunteer special constables, who accompanied the procession for that purpose.—The chair on which Sir Francis Burdett sat was covered with crimson velvet, fringed with gold, and was placed on a Roman car, drawn by six horses. The latter was decorated with the fusces, and other emblematical signs, the honourable Baronet's crest, (with a wreath of oak on each side), and the arms of the City of Westminster. It was ascended by three steps, on which were inscribed the words, Truth, Justice, Reform.—Sir Francis Burdett was habited in a plain blue coat. He bowed respectfully to the people on both sides as he passed along, and seemed much gratified by their repeated cheers. As the day was remarkably fine, the streets were crowded to excess, and the windows of the houses fully occupied by the fair sex. The procession was conducted with the utmost order.

DINNER AT THE CROWN AND ANCHOR TAVERN.

A great number of individuals who had purchased tickets for the dinner assembled as early as four o'clock, with the view of getting admission to the large room of this tavern, but the doors were kept closed. As the tickets expressed that the dinner was to be on the table at five o'clock precisely, the multitude, who had by that time vastly increased, and occupied the whole of the passage leading to the room, became very noisy, and insisted upon the door being opened. The pressure was excessive as the number increased. At last the procession arrived, and it was then expected that the door would be opened, but it still continued fast. The discontent of the multitude was now extreme. The crowd having lost all patience, burst open the door. When admission was thus forcibly obtained; it was found that a considerable number of persons had been introduced by a private passage. This excited the anger of those who had been kept back for several hours in a very uneasy situation outside of the door, and an explanation was loudly called for.—About half-past six, Sir Francis Burdett, Mr. Douglas Kinnaird, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Jones Burdett, and others, entered the room, and took their seats, Sir Francis in the chair. The calls for explanation, however, still continued.

Sir Francis Burdett said, it appeared that the blame was solely attributable to the landlord, who had, as he was informed, issued 100 tickets more than accommodation could be found for. He now understood that it was therefore the desire of the meeting that the landlord should be called up to explain. (Loud applause.)

The Landlord, after some time had elapsed, appeared, and was directed to stand on the table near the chair in order to give his explanation. He said he exceedingly regretted what had happened, and that it would have given him the greatest pleasure had the accommodation been such as to give satisfaction. The whole mistake was owing to the way of bringing in the dinner. He had wished to let the company in, and place it on the table after they were seated; but his opinion was overruled, and it was thought best to have every thing done before they were admitted. This took up a great deal of time, and he had been ordered by the Secretary (Mr. Percy) not to open the door until every thing was prepared. He was exceedingly sorry for what had happened, and sincerely begged the company's pardon; but if such a meeting occurred again, he should know better how to manage, and had no doubt that he should give satisfaction.

This explanation was not thought sufficient by some of the company, while others were disposed to be satisfied with it, and considerable contention for some time prevailed.

Mr. Hobhouse hoped the company would be satisfied with the explanation which had been given. The whole unfortunate affair had originated in a mistake between the Secretary of the Committee, Mr. Perry, and the landlord. They had heard the landlord state, that he was sorry for what had happened; and he could assure them on the part of Mr. Percy, that he was also most sorry. They had, during the arduous contest of this election, on many occasions shown their good temper and generosity. Let not their reputation be now lost by dissensions among themselves. Their conduct might be made the subject of calumny, and the sheets were not far from them which would soon convey that calumny to the most remote parts of the world. Let them not, therefore, act so as to put power into the hands of those persons who had no strength but from their weakness; and who only sought to vilify them, that they might afterwards delude the country. Sorry he should be to see the great triumph which had been so nobly gained sullied by dissension at the festival which was to celebrate it; but he hoped that from this moment all contention would cease.

This speech had the effect of tranquillizing the company, and the following toasts were successively drunk with three times three:—

"The People—the source of legitimate power."

"The King and Constitution, and a speedy recovery of both."

"Purity of election, and may a speedy and effectual reform enable the whole people of the united kingdom to choose their own representatives."

Mr. Sturges rose, first, to congratulate the company on the victory which the electors of Westminster had gained over the enemies of freedom, and all the influence of a corrupt administration; and, secondly, to give a toast which he had already often given, but which, under the present circumstances, he gave with increased delight. It was not the personal qualities of Sir Francis Burdett, it was not his amiable character, it was not his numerous private virtues, neither was it his great fortune nor his splendid abilities, that could induce him to give a single vote in support of his election. But if any man should ask him why he felt interested in the return of Sir Francis Burdett, he should say it was because he felt in his heart and soul that their favourite representative was the unalterable friend of freedom. If, however, that melancholy day ever should arrive when their representative no longer possessed the principles which had recommended him to their choice, he would then shrink with aversion from that toast which he now gave with delight. When Sir Francis Burdett was first elected for Westminster in 1807, they chose him because they were assured of his principles by his previous conduct in Parliament. Since that time he had been twice sent back to them, and they had twice returned him. Those elections and the present gave a complete and decisive answer to all the false assertions of the ministerial press, that the principles of Sir Francis Burdett were unpopular. He rejoiced in the success of the electors of Westminster. Many who had been active in the election of 1807 were now in their graves, but others had risen up in their places; and he trusted there would always be found in Westminster a great body of spirited and patriotic men, determined at all risks to support reform, and the best interests of their country. The cause of reform, which was the cause of liberty, he was happy to say, was daily extending itself and gaining new friends. Men whose conduct had been equivocal with respect to this great question, and even those who had been absolutely unfriendly to reform, had lately begun to speak in some measure well of it. In fact, these men felt that they had now no means of gaining the favour of the people but by pretending that they were friendly to reform. Even Lord Castlereagh himself, in addressing his constituents in Ireland, had thought it necessary to talk to them of the advantages of a free press and reform. After this, what might they not expect? Such was the language which the noble Secretary of State had used at his late election, that for his part he should not be surprised where the Noble Lord, at their next anniversary celebration of Sir Francis Burdett's first return for Westminster, to signify his wish to dine with the friends of Purity of Election! He concluded with proposing—"Westminster's Pride and England's Hope, Sir F. Burdett."

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT addressed the meeting amidst the loudest plaudits. He commenced by saying, that he felt himself wholly unable to make any due return for those testimonies of affection, which, on various occasions, he had received from the great and enlightened city of Westminster. He could only account for them on the consideration, that having from the earliest period of his political life, up to the present moment, embracing a period of nearly a quarter of a century, still adhered to those opinions upon which he first offered himself to public notice, he now had to congratulate them on the progress of those opinions. It was now about 23 years since, on his return from his travels, he had been requested to take the chair in that very room, at a meeting of persons desirous of effecting some reform in the House of Commons. That invitation he had accepted, and had there distinctly avowed those principles which, although in some degree since modified by times and circumstances, he had, during his subsequent life, done all in his power substantially to promote. (General applause.) Mr. Sturch, whom he was proud to call his friend, and who had done him the honour of expressing sentiments with regard to him personally, that could have arisen only from the partiality of friendship, but which must still afford him the highest gratification, when he found that such kind and favourable sentiments were echoed by the testimony of the general voice, had made one or two observations to which he would beg shortly to refer. In the first place, however, he must say, that if the feelings which he now confessed were to be set down to the account of vanity, he had no reluctance to plead guilty to the charge. It ever had been the pride and glory of his heart to obtain the good opinion of his countrymen by an honest attention to and support of their real interests. (Applause.) He was aware that he had been accused of conduct not conciliatory to those who followed his opinions; that he had held himself back from his own supporters, and had not adopted the means usually employed by men whose aim it was to cultivate public favour. But having on his own part no object to carry but the recovery of the liberties of the country, he had felt a strong aversion to the performance of any act which might create even the appearance, or indicate a design, that he was desirous of succeeding in any purpose of a personal nature, or in which his personal feelings would be consulted. He had felt, that by coming forward at the time when he was called for, he should have compromised not only his own dignity and theirs, but the dignity of the cause itself. On the present occasion, he was happy to assure them, they saw him the same man in 1818 which they had seen him in 1802, when, during three successive elections for the county of Middlesex, he had, by canvassing night and day, endeavoured to advance their cause. He should not now scruple to do the same thing again; if, in this advanced period of public opinion, he thought it at all necessary to its progress. But he acted upon a different principle, because he trusted to the enlightened mind of his constituents, to the enlightened mind of the people of England, to their spirit and their determination, never to abandon the cause in its present stage of advancement.—(Loud and various applause.) By the course and result of the late election, they had placed the cause on a ground higher than it had ever stood on before: they had raised it and recovered it from a momentary fall, and their victory over unexpected difficulties gave them a triumph of much higher value than any former which they had achieved. His valuable friend, Mr. Sturch, had ventured upon two predictions, and if, among the wreck of political predictions, a safe one might be made, it was, perhaps, that which related to himself, and which, he hoped, his conduct would verify. But with regard to the other, as to the probability of Lord Castlereagh's falling into their ranks, he would not assert that it was impossible, because the Noble Lord had set out upon the principle of Parliamentary Reform in Ireland, and had redeemed his pledge by supporting Parliamentary Corruption in England. In speaking of such changes of opinion, it was common to appeal to experience as an instructor. Now, he must frankly state, that experience had not made him wiser on the subject of reform. He had formed opinions twenty-three years ago, and those opinions he continued to entertain. Though he had grown older, his opinions had not; and he would beg leave to say, that they were the opinions of the greatest men that had ever enlightened or adorned society in different periods of history—of Machiavel, of Locke, of Milton. He had himself no merit, except that of having duly weighed those truths which greater minds had discovered and investigated, of having maintained them with honour and integrity, and of having, when mature reflection confirmed his first impressions, adhered to them with undeviating perseverance. Under all the circumstances of the late election, although he deeply deplored the loss of his late gallant and illustrious colleague,—deploring it as he must, although he knew him to be gone in pursuit of more distant but not less honourable objects,—it was his duty to state that he found himself happy in having a colleague by his side—a man of acknowledged ability, of steady public principles, and from whom he confidently expected the greatest support in aid of the great cause of a Reform of Parliament. (Loud applause.) Mr. Sturch naturally referred to the extraordinary circumstance of Lord Castlereagh's allusions to Reform, addressed to his constituents in Ireland; and, certainly, they were sufficient to countenance any man in thinking, that my Lord Castlereagh's opinion was, that Reform was rapidly advancing, and that he, dreading of all things the quitting of his office the most, had experienced the necessity of yielding a little (though as little as possible) to the strength of public feeling. It reminded him of a passage in a farce, where a master, desirous of intriguing with his servant, began by observing, "I think I have been a moderate master to you;" to which the servant answered, "Yes, Sir, very moderate indeed!" (A laugh.) Such might be the tone of Lord Castlereagh: it at least served to shew what his opinion was of the progress of the cause. But there was another gentleman who had uniformly and consistently declared himself the enemy of all reform—he meant, Mr. Canning; and as he had been returned by something like a popular election, and had made a speech upon the occasion, which appeared to be given with unusual accuracy, and which had also been trumpeted forth by all the press on that side of the question (which he was sorry to say was the greatest part), as containing a complete refutation of the argument for reform, it might not be amiss to enter into a little examination of it. In one part of the speech it was said, "that the war had not been so calamitous as was imagined, but had been productive of great good." Now, he could not form a conception of real prosperity arising from war, although a fallacious appearance of it might be exhibited in particular channels; but it regularly operated to dry up those which were the natural and the productive. For example, war might be favourable for a short time to gun-makers and casters of cannon; it might enrich many who, but for the war for their excuse, would be considered as atrocious criminals. The war, in the same speech, was described "as having had its peculiar prosperity." His answer was, that this was not a substantial or wholesome prosperity, and that it might be said of every crime that it had its peculiar prosperity. To instance the crime of forgery, to which another peculiarity belonged, which was, that it led to the gallows. (A laugh.) Had the result of the war been the same as regarded its authors, they might now have had some reason to rejoice at this peculiarity. (A laugh.) They (the electors) had been called wild and visionary, although many who so denominated them, themselves considered the war as unfortunate. But this it was for them to have considered at the proper time. It was not true that peace was the cause of their privations; it only put an end to those which the war must have inevitably increased. Peace certainly could not pay off the national debt, but it might prevent its accumulation. When Mr. Canning talked of the difficulties of the first year of a peace, he appeared to forget that he was speaking in the third year, and must be concluded to have nothing to urge in explanation of those difficulties under which we had laboured under the two last. Next came a sentence in which this great master of language probably meant much, but which quite surpassed (Sir F. Burdett's) poor comprehension. He talked "of the difficulty in providing employment for an exuberant population, the harvest of a long war." (A laugh.) The speech went on to ascribe the discontents of the country "to some malignant influence;" but the truly malignant influence was to be found in the House of Commons, which had plunged us into a destructive war, and afterwards imposed upon us war establishments in time of peace. (Applause.) In the succeeding passage, the Right Hon. Gentleman had perhaps been eloquent, for it appeared that it was received with applause; but he could not help thinking that he had been indiscreet. It was as follows:—"But, gentlemen, labouring as I do under the imputation of being a great lover of war, I am almost afraid to say, that there are some things in the war which I regret, and some things in the peace which I like as little as even those privations of which we have been speaking, but which are happily in a course of daily diminution. The war divided the political parties of the country on one great question, which involved and absorbed all minor considerations. When war, party had not ceased; but our differences are of a sort more ignoble and more alarming. The line of demarcation during the war was resistance or non-resistance to a foreign enemy; the line of demarcation now is, maintenance or subversion of our internal institutions." This, then, amounted to a plain confession of what had been the original cause of the war; and that was, in his belief, the rising spirit of the nation, at the time when it was undertaken, in favour of a reform of the Commons' House of Parliament. (Loud applause.) The preservation of the internal institutions of the country meant, the corruptions of that House. He had opposed the war from its commencement, because he thought its object, although often denied by Mr. Pitt until he was black in the face, was the restoration of the Bourbons; its professed object being (as they knew) the independence of Holland by the opening of the Scheldt. More than enough occurred to prove that the real object was the destruction of the freedom of this country; and no better evidence could be afforded than the trial of that great and honest man Mr. Horne Tooke, and the practices made use of to convict him of high treason, merely for having laboured to promote Parliamentary Reform. Mr. Canning spoke of the brilliancy of the war, in another passage, which he would beg to read to them; he said—"Gentlemen, it does seem somewhat singular, and I conceive that the historian of future times will be at a loss to imagine how it should happen, that at this period—at the close of a war of such unexampled brilliancy, in which this country had acted a part so much beyond its physical strength, and its apparent resources—there should arise a sect of philosophers in this country, who begin to suspect something rotten in the British Constitution." The brilliancy, whatever it was, appeared to him to be that of a gamester, who, having lost nearly his all, threw double or quits, and happened to win. (Great applause.) In the latter part of the passage, he thought the Right Hon. Gentleman had shown some contempt for the understandings of his audience. Could it be said, that it was only now that persons began to suspect something rotten in the constitution of Parliament, when the ablest writers and the greatest men of this country, Lord Camden, Lord Chatham, Mr. Pitt before his power, Mr. Fox, Sir George Saville, Sir W. Jones, and others, had repeatedly declared, that the undue influence exercised in the House of Commons was more dangerous than all the assumed prerogatives of the Stuarts? To these he might add the opinions of a mind not less enlightened, perhaps greater than any of them, (Mr. Bentham), and who considered, not merely that there was something rotten in the House of Commons, but that all was rotten, and that there was hardly a sound part belonging to it. There was something curious in the following passage—"Gentlemen, when the reformers come to discuss the British Constitution, nothing can be more respectful than their language towards the Crown; nothing more forbearing than their treatment of the Aristocracy. With the House of Commons alone they take the freedom of familiarity; upon it they pour out all the vials of their wrath, and exhaust their denunciations of amendment." If Mr. Canning thought so, it might be asked, why he had not objected to the proceedings against some men who, whether rightly or not, had been brought to punishment, and forfeited their lives, for treason against the Crown; they having declared their only design to be, to procure a reform in Parliament? But the Right Hon. Gentleman wished evidently to seduce the reformers into the mazes of law, and to bewilder them with the doctrines of treason. They, however, knew well that they were only exercising their right, when they exercised a familiarity with their own representatives; and that if they were respectful towards the Crown, it was only because they meant what they professed. (Applause.) Lord Sidmouth and his unseemly associates, his spies, and his informers, would cast their imputations and their charges of plots upon them in vain; and, with respect to the aristocracy at large, though nothing could be more unworthy than the treatment which the reformers had experienced from them, he did not believe they could long uphold their present system of intolerance. The speech went on to say "that they, the reformers, were wise in their generation;" in reply to the whole of which passage he would observe, that they wished only for such a House of Commons as made the Act of Settlement, and that they considered it better for the Crown to depend on the people at large, than on a few boroughmongers. Another passage in the Right Hon. Gentleman's speech was as follows:—"They (the reformers) know that the battle is with the House of Commons, as at present constituted; and that that once overthrown, another popular assembly constructed on their principle—as the creature and depository of the people's power, and the unreasoning instrument of the people's will—there would not only be no choice, but (I will go further for them in a rowal, though not in intention, than they go themselves) there would not be a pretence for the existence of any other branch of the constitution." He was glad to find it acknowledged, that their battle was with the House of Commons alone, which, in his opinion, ought to be the depository of the people's power, and not the unreasoning instrument of the Ministers' will. He wished it to be no unreasoning instrument at all, considering its true merit to consist in the protection it afforded to public liberty, and the opportunity it gave to every individual of asserting his own personal rights. It never could be the will of the people expressed in the House of Commons which voted for imprisoning men without trial, gave indemnity to the oppressors, and suffered the King's oath to be broken by the King's officers, "that justice should be denied to no man." What cause could be assigned for such proceedings, but what was to be found in the private interests of the boroughmongers? To those who were so full of apprehensions of anarchy from the carrying of reform into effect, he would suggest the danger of an approaching military despotism on the other hand. He felt happy in the belief, that it would be now impossible, in consequence of the diffusion of knowledge and just principles, to procure men in red coats out of parliament to subvert the liberties of their country. There was more danger from the two or three hundred mercenaries, not in red coats, but within the walls of the House of Commons. (Loud applause.) Mr. Canning, in conclusion, said,—"To maintain that Constitution has been the unvarying object of my political life; and the maintenance of it, in these latter days, has, I have said, exposed me to obloquy and to hatred; to the hatred of those who believe either their own reputation for sagacity, or their own means of success, to be connected with a change in the present institutions of the country. We have heard something of numbers in the course of the present election; and there is in numbers, I confess, a coincidence which gratifies and pleases me. The number of 300 was that of a majority which assured my return. It is the number, I am informed, of those who are assembled here to greet me this day. The last time that I had heard the number 300 in a way at all interesting to myself, was in an intimation publicly conveyed to me, that precisely that number of heroes had bound themselves by oath to each other to assassinate me. Gentlemen, against my 300 assassins I put any 300 friends, and I feel neither my life nor my popularity in danger." The Right Hon. Gentleman might have been conscious that no obloquy had been cast on him for any conscientious discharge of duty. The English people were too generous to deal thus with their opponents; and he might have felt that, if obnoxious to the people, it was because they had always found him the interested supporter of every species of abuse and tyrannical power. As to his distinction between liberty and order, liberty itself meant nothing but order; it could not degenerate into licentiousness, which was its opposite. Licentiousness, indeed, was a thing absolved from all law, the will of tyrants exercising arbitrary power; but liberty was a thing which only existed under the control and by the aid of law. Another allusion in this speech was to a letter, which appeared to have made a deep impression on the mind of the Right Hon. Gentleman, and he accordingly thought proper to draw the attention of his audience to a rhetorical flourish, from which the Right Hon. Gentleman could derive no serious apprehensions. It was no real dagger, but the air-drawn dagger of the brainy Macbeth, that haunted his imagination; he felt that that letter had spoken daggers, but meant none. They, on their sides, spoke the language of the Constitution; and no doctrine could be more dangerous to the Crown than that which represented it as depending upon interests separate from those of the people. In opposition to all the calumnies which had been asserted against them, he was confident that they had acted upon firm principles; that they had abandoned no former ground; and that neither he nor his friends had considered a seat in the House of that inestimable value as to be honourable, unless obtained by honourable means. (Loud applause.) He regretted to have heard that, of that sex which formed our ornament in prosperity and our strength and solace in adversity, some, instead of ministering angels, had stooped to render themselves creatures of terror, to frighten men into acts contrary to the dictates of God and their own consciences. This was, in his opinion, the only act by which that sex could ever appear in an unfavourable light. Against other calumnies it was scarcely necessary for him to guard himself in their esteem. They would not easily believe that he had bribed the whole of Westminster, and was nearly ruined in his fortune. To calumny he had so long been subject, that he had long since learned to bear it patiently. He should now, after detaining them so long, conclude by observing, that a new era was commencing; and he begged to recommend to them liberality of sentiment in promoting its consequences, and to exhort them to make allowance for differences of opinion among themselves; to avoid doing what some over-zealous persons had done, who showed more animosity against those who differed with them on trifles, than zeal for the general object. The fact which they should chiefly keep in view was, that a majority of the House of Commons was returned by about 6,000 nominal voters, or rather by about 250 individuals, who had thus at their disposal the lives, liberties, and properties of their fellow subjects. (Loud applause.) He hoped they would consider what points of principle might be most easily carried into practice, by their meeting the most general concurrence, and not clashing with honest, though unfounded, prejudices. They had to redress a cruel grievance, and to do this they must combine with men who took different views of arriving at the same end. With respect to the subject of the due extent of suffrage, he did not see his much valued friend, Major Cartwright, there; but he thought it right to state, that he had always objected to his term of universal suffrage, because it was indefinite, and because those who used it never meant to carry it into effect. (Applause.) His own object, he might call by way of distinction, "general suffrage;" but a suffrage that should establish universal liberty, and secure the people against universal plunder. These opinions had gone forth, and if understood with wisdom, and acted on prudently and effectually, would probably in a short time bring forth some fruit. Such opinions had formed the subject of anticipation in the mind of their great and glorious countryman, when he expressed himself in these words:—"Methinks in my mind's eye I see a great and puissant nation, rousing itself like a strong man after sleep; methinks I see her like an eagle, mewing her mighty youth, purging and unsealing her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance, whilst the whole troop of timorous and flocking birds, and those that love twilight, flutter around amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble prognosticate a time of sects and schisms." (Loud applause.) He trusted that no imprudence on their part would prevent their success, as a mighty nation, in the struggle in which they were engaged. The maxim of tyrants was, "to divide and conquer; let that of freemen be, 'to unite and to defeat.'" (The Hon. Baronet sat down amidst long continued shouts of applause.)

The following toasts were then given:—

"Our late zealous, faithful, and undaunted representative, Lord Cochrane."

"The Father of Reform, Major Cartwright."

"Jeremy Bentham, Esq., the unanswerable advocate of the rights of the people."

"Ireland, and may her soil be as free from those accursed pests, Parliamentary corruption, and religious intolerance, as from all other venomous reptiles."

"The Hon. Douglas Kinnaird and the reformers of Scotland."

Mr. KINNAIRD said, that at so late an hour he was sensible the company must be little disposed to hear him, especially as no person could be expected to be heard with effect after their representative. Still, however, he could not help wishing to be allowed to thank them for the honour they had done him. He should also observe, that it was but justice to themselves who had been engaged in the management of the election to tell their representative that he had not to blush for any act of theirs. The Committee had only been the mechanical instruments of carrying into effect the wishes of the electors in general, and they had been amply repaid for their labours by the looks and cheers they every where met. They had neither bribed nor threatened, nor ministered to the bad passions of any man. They had made but one appeal, and that was to the understanding of the electors. They had, however, to tell their representative, that this election had been profaned by soldiers; but they could also tell him, that the purpose of riot for which they were sent, was defeated by the prudent conduct of the people. That there was not the slightest occasion for calling out the military was notorious; and he could inform the company, that the High Bailiff, who was of that opinion, wrote to the Secretary of State to have the troops withdrawn. He had thrown down the gauntlet with respect to the conduct of the election, and could challenge all the world to show that any improper act had been committed by those who managed it. Their representative had, therefore, to go again into Parliament on the same high ground on which he took his seat in 1807. The champion of their liberties was again sent to parliament by purity of election. Having stated thus much with respect to proceedings with which he had been connected, he begged leave to say a few words on the subject of reform. He had been accused by the ministerial papers of youth and enthusiasm, and so was Sir Francis Burdett, 23 years ago. It had also been said that he was the advocate of universal suffrage. Now this universal suffrage was made the subject of ridicule by those who, wishing to go no length at all in reform, were glad to have the opportunity of declaiming against a proposition which appeared to go too far. It was, therefore, necessary that what was meant by universal suffrage should be explained. That could easily be done by a reference to the proceedings of that great body of reformers who, in 1795, assembled under the denomination of the Friends of the People. Among them were the present Vice-Chancellor, Sir J. Leach, Sir Arthur Pigott, Lord Erskine, and other great lawyers; Lord Grey, Mr. Tierney, the late Mr. Whitbread, and that illustrious nobleman who had so lately shown himself the friend of the oppressed—he meant the Duke of Bedford, when he came forward and contributed to the subscription opened for that persecuted individual Mr. Hone. It was said that he had acted imprudently, and that he ought to have waited until he saw how his own party would think fit to proceed; but he had very properly consulted only his own feelings. Well, when these great men met, and declared their principles, what did they say on the subject of the right of voting? Why they declared that "suffrage was personal and common." What could be more distinctly universal suffrage than this? It was true that they afterwards stated, that that right ought to be subject to limitations, and so did Sir Francis Burdett, for nobody ever imagined that it was intended that every individual should vote. The society of the Friends of the People, however, declared that the limitation should be so low as to put it in the power of every individual by industry to attain the right. This was precisely that for which Sir F. Burdett and those near him had contended, and for doing of which they were accused of entertaining visionary and impracticable theories. He made, however, only the principle of universal suffrage the general rule, as the Friends of the People had done, and like them regarded the limitations as the exceptions. It had been said by the agents of corruption, that those who maintained these principles were mad. Now all that he should ask of those who heard him, if ever he abandoned those principles as others had done, was, that in mercy they should think him mad, and save him from the reproach of dishonesty.

The following toast was then drank:—

"J. C. Hobhouse, Esq. whose powerful writings and whose intrepid conduct have so efficiently aided the cause of liberty."

Mr. HOBHOUSE, in a very animated address, declared his attachment to the principles, the triumph of which they were assembled to commemorate. As the question of sincerity had been touched upon, he could only express a hope that his health would never be their disease, nor his life their death. Even this was, perhaps, promising much at the outset of a political life, for he hardly knew one whose health, politically speaking, was not injurious to them, or whose death would not tend to their salvation. They came not there to consume the means of mistaken bounty, or to build up churches with one hand, and dilapidate the state with the other, or to celebrate or assist men who thought it a glory to uphold the system of the worst minister that had ever deceived or deluded the country. They came there to commemorate an event which he hoped would often recur, of electing the great man in the chair as their representative, because, by fatal experience, they had found that he was the only man whom they could trust. His return, therefore, must always animate whatever sparks of liberty might yet remain in our expiring constitution. He confessed himself glad to meet an assembly of Jacobins. (A laugh.) The term was of no consequence; and he seldom heard it applied except to the enemies of corruption. (Mr. Hobhouse then alluded to some of the opinions maintained by Mr. Canning, who, he agreed with the worthy elector who had just done him the honour of interrupting him, was unworthy of the notice of a rational man, and who could only be respectable in their eyes, as having been animadverted upon by the chairman.) He could assure them, that on no other account would he have presumed to introduce for a moment the mention of that abandoned name. (Loud applause.) He concluded by giving the following toast, which was received amidst general cheers:—

"The honest and independent Electors of Westminster—not forgetting our 2308 plumpers."

The following toasts were afterwards drank:—

"The progress of public opinion."

"Michael Bruce, Esq., the heroic deliverer of Lavalette."

"Trial by Jury; and may its suspenders be suspended."

"The honest volunteer Counsel; whose gratuitous services were found so efficient during the election."

"The Liberty of the Press; it is like the air we breathe—if we have it not, we die."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JULY 10.—A letter from Berlin states, that M. Jules Voss has published an address to the inhabitants of the banks of the Rhine, which has caused a great sensation. It is written with great eloquence, and the author has not hesitated to advocate the principles of absolute monarchy, and to recommend to the Prussian Government to refuse granting a representative constitution.

We have just learned the tragic fate of general Letellie. He could not survive his wife, who died towards the end of last month, in consequence of the unfortunate overturning of her chaise. Since that melancholy event he has never ceased to complain of his misfortune, and did not conceal from his friends that he was resolved soon to join her whom he had lost. He kept his word but too well. Yesterday morning, after having sent his servant to one of his friends with a letter, in which he announced his fatal design, he shot himself with a pistol, in the heart, and died instantly. His friend, who on receiving the letter hastened to the spot, found him extended on his bed, and weltering in his blood. His left hand, which was placed near his heart, had round it a lock of his wife's hair, and a handkerchief which she had used recently before her death. His last will, which is written with the most affecting sensibility, directs that he should be buried beside his wife.

EAST INDIES.

A Supplement to the London Gazette of Tuesday last, was published on Thursday, of which the following is a general summary:—

The first article is an extract of a dispatch from Sir T. Hislop, dated Camp at Pan Behar, seven miles north of Oogen, Dec. 19. This relates entirely to the affair at Nagpore, by the division of the army under the command of Colonel Scott, all the details of which are already before the public. Sir T. Hislop speaks of the action with the greatest approbation, and observes, that "there never was an instance in which not only the courage, but the allegiance of the native troops had been put to a severer test, and had been displayed in a more brilliant result than on that occasion." There is also a General Order, issued by Sir T. Hislop, dated 14th December, communicating the particulars of the above battle, to the army generally, and conveying his thanks to the troops and officers engaged therein.

The next is a report from Major-General Sir Wm. Keir, dated January 19th, stating that he had been detached in pursuit of a Pindarry Chief, who was encamped in the neighbourhood of Johud, (a place about 50 miles S.E. from Oudypoor) but that the enemy decamped; upon hearing of the approach of the Bombay division of the army. In their flight, however, they left behind them their guns and baggage, a considerable part of which fell into our hands. Subsequently to this, it appears by a despatch from the Governor in Council at Bombay, to the Secret Committee, dated February 19th, that Sir W. Keir, on the 21st and 26th of January, had completely succeeded in surprising a body of Pindarries near Veera.—By the same intelligence we learn that the forts Oncholgur, Singhur, Pallee, and Boorup, (all situated between Bombay and Poonah) had surrendered to our forces. The fort of Muddinghur, also, lying between Severndroog and Bannoor, had been captured.

The next is a despatch from Lieut.-Colonel Macmorine, commanding the 1st Brigade of Nagpore Subsidiary Force, dated Jan. 6, reporting the entire defeat of the Rajah's troops at Sreenuggur, on the southern bank of the Net-budda, about 140 miles to the eastward of Hoosingabad.

This is followed by another despatch from the Governor in Council at Bombay, conveying the official details of Brigadier-General Smith's successful operations against the forces of the Peishwa; particularly his having surprised and defeated the enemy at Ashta, near Punderpoor, about ten miles S.E. of Poonah. Bapoo Gokla, the Chief of the Mahratta army, and two other Sirdars, fell in the action, with between two and three hundred men. Bajee Row quitted his palanquin, and mounting his horse fled at an early part of the engagement. He was reported to have bent his course northward. Our loss was very trifling.

The remaining documents contained in this Supplement, communicate principally only more minute details of several actions, the chief circumstances of which are already known.

SOUTH AMERICA.

BUEVOS-AYRES, APRIL 17.—The following despatch has been received by the Supreme Director of the United Provinces of South America:—

"MOST EXCELLENT SIGNOR.—We have completely triumphed over the audacious Osorio and his followers in the plains of Maipo. The battle has lasted from ten o'clock till six in the evening, which we may, without temerity, say, has put the last seal to the liberty of America. The General of Infantry, Don Antonio Gonsalez Balcarce; the Chief of the right division, Don Juan Gregorio de las Heras; of the left, Don Rudesindo Alvarado; of the reserve, Don Liliaron de la Quintana; and, in fine, the commanders of all the corps, have conducted themselves with insurmountable courage and intrepidity. The enemy is entirely destroyed; all his artillery and baggage are in our possession; the prisoners exceed 1500, among them are more than 50 officers, besides General Odonez, and the Chief of his Staff, Primo de Rivera; the dead we are not yet able to reckon. The fugitives are still pursued by our valiant cavalry at the point of the sabre. Our loss has been very trifling. The victory of this great day crowns all; the detail of this glorious action shall be transmitted to your Excellency as soon as a moment of leisure permits; for the present I must remain satisfied in congratulating your Excellency on this event, and in your person all the inhabitants of the State. God preserve your Excellency many years.

(Signed)

JOSE DE SAN MARTIN.

"Head-quarters in the field of battle, the Plains of Maipo, April 5, 1818, at six in the evening."

Letter from a Private Correspondence, dated Buenos Ayres, 21st April, 1818:—

"We are here going on swimmingly. Intelligence arrived a few days ago of the total defeat of the Royal invading army, in the plains of Maipo, five leagues from Santiago de Chili, by the Allied army under San Martin, on the 5th inst.: 2500 prisoners, 26 pieces of artillery, are the immediate, and the clearing of all Chili the ultimate, consequences of this action, so glorious to the commander and troops employed; the former leading the troops on in person, and exhorting them to give the enemy plenty of the steel, which was faithfully executed. This action has, we may say, secured for ever the independence of South America against any attempts that can be made by Old Spain, with a view to re-establish her ancient dominion. The patriots have armed and fitted out at Valparaiso the Windham, formerly an East Indiaman, and now mounting 40 guns; she sailed from that port on the 4th ult., manned by the right sort of lads from the little island, with a sprinkling of brother Jonathans; her object is to take the Venganza, a Spanish 44, and this we think she will accomplish; indeed there is no doubt, if she can only get alongside of her. We are also hourly expecting here two vessels, of 1000 tons each and 40 guns, from North America; and when they arrive, a very powerful expedition will be formed against Lima, which it would appear can hardly fail of being successful, for the Royalists may fairly now be said to be out of breath, and at the mercy of the natives of the country. This government intends sending in all, this month, about 3,000 men to reinforce General Belgrano, the commander of the Patriot forces in Peru, who will thus be enabled to march to the Desaguadero without stopping, as the enemy must withdraw his opposing army to cover his provinces, into which it is supposed the war will now be carried. The Russian squadron at Cadiz, and the consequent expedition, give us no alarm, for unless Ferdinand VII. can contrive to man and officer it with something better than Spaniards, he is only working for the Patria: for even the famous Spanish regiments, represented as heroes of the Peninsular war, have been fairly beaten at the bayonet in this last action in Chili: so that you may make yourself easy on that head. Among the subjects of congratulation, there is one which to us, as Englishmen, is not the least, namely, that now a very large and populous territory is secured for a market for our national industry, and a little time must open much more; so that in a very few years, the commerce of this country will be really valuable, and, in our chief manufactures, without a rival. We hope that our government at home will shortly see the great importance this country is of to our trade, and make haste to acknowledge manfully the independence of such an heroic people. Already we have in this capital the American Commissioners, who are, it is supposed, treating of something similar, and we ought not to be behind-hand. You may expect greater news in a few months, and depend that in such case I shall feel great pleasure in giving you advice of it."

HERTFORD, FRIDAY, JULY 17.—HARDENN v. CAUSTON.—This was an action against the defendant for a breach of promise of marriage. The case excited universal interest from its peculiar circumstances. The damages were laid at 5,000*l.*—The plaintiff, who was represented to be a young lady of great personal attractions, accomplished, &c. is the daughter of a respectable tradesman at Hatfield; and the defendant is a gentleman of fortune, lately a printer in Finch-lane, Cofahill. The parties are first cousins, and in 1809, the defendant, then about 30 years of age, and the plaintiff about 21, commenced his courtship, having known each other from the earliest infancy. From that time down to May, 1817, a voluminous epistolary correspondence was carried on between them, the defendant professing the most devoted attachment to the plaintiff, whose language, in reply, evinced on her part the warmest affection. The defendant's promise of marriage was expressed in these terms: "I will marry you as soon as circumstances will permit."—It appeared that the defendant's family took every occasion to discourage the connexion, imputing the regard of the plaintiff to sinister motives. The defendant had gone the length of proposing to marry the plaintiff in private, to which she consented; but although the wedding-ring had been purchased, and the license obtained, and the half-brother of the plaintiff had consented to give her away, the contract was never fulfilled. This intimacy continued down till May, 1817, when the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, announcing that the best mode of terminating the anxious suspense which she had always expressed, was to break off the connexion, and think no more of matrimony; and he submitted the proposition to her deliberate judgment, declaring his own intention of breaking off the match. In consequence of the defendant's determination to break his promise, Mr. Palmer, a professional friend of the plaintiff's family, was consulted, and at first he wrote a friendly letter to the defendant, conjuring him to consider his rash determination; but this letter having no effect, the present action was brought. Since the commencement of legal proceedings, the defendant's father died, leaving him in possession of property estimated at 20,000*l.*—The Jury retired for about an hour, and on their return, found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, Four Thousand Pounds.

YORK, JULY 15.—Wm. Smith, aged 39, a tall, well-dressed, respectable-looking man, was charged with stealing two sheep at Claxton. The evidence for the prosecution was abundantly strong. The prisoner's son, an interesting boy, read his evidence in favour of his father. On cross-examination, he showed the utmost simplicity and innocence, and consequently rather aggravated the offence of his unhappy parent. Many most respectable witnesses gave the highest character to the prisoner for 20 years, all but the last, in which they seemed to be quite unable to speak of his character—guilty.—The prisoner's mother, a most exemplary woman, had been agitated by the situation of her son, that she expired on Friday last, owing to her excessive apprehension from the immediate approach of the judges.

A meeting was held on Tuesday on the subject of the Licensing of Public Houses, when a very good speech was made by Mr. BEAUMONT on the evils arising from the monopoly to which the system gave rise. Various Resolutions were passed expressive of the opinion of the meeting, as to the injurious consequences of the present system; since beer might be sold at 5*d.* per pot instead of 6*d.* and that the extra charge was equal to a Property Tax of 10 per Cent. on the labourer's wages.

When Mr. GOUCH was proposed at the late nomination for the county of Suffolk, a large stone was thrown at him on the hustings; which he immediately picked up, and good-humouredly observed, "You see, Gentlemen, they will leave no stone unturned against me!"

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

We intend, in our publication of Sunday next, to commence a SERIES of ARTICLES, to be continued from week to week, the object of which will be, to enable those who are not in the habit of attending our Courts of Justice to form a true estimate of the Talents and other qualifications, of the principal Members of that part of the profession of the Law, usually denominated THE BAR:—They will be written by a Correspondent, who for some years has been in the constant practice of watching the proceedings in Westminster Hall. From various causes (some of which will probably be adverted to in his first article), all knowledge upon this important subject is confined to a comparatively narrow circle; and during the vacation we have thought that we could not occupy some of our columns by matter more entertaining or useful, recollecting how important a feature in the polity of the country is formed by the Administration of public Justice.

The Writer proposes that Mr. SCARLETT, the leading Counsel of the Court of King's Bench, shall be the subject of his first Criticism.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JULY 19.

THE French papers continue their excessive, explanatory silence respecting the alledged Conspiracy; but other documents from that city are full of it; and the opinion now seems to agree pretty generally with the one we offered last week,—that the exceeding folly of the thing, considering who were the perpetrators, was no argument against its probability. So many and such high personages, it is said, were concerned in it, that neither LOUIS nor his Ministers could take any steps of inquiry; and it is now added, that its views may not have been abandoned yet. A conspiracy to displace a weak and unpopular King for a still more weak and unpopular one!—to displace a little liberality, the prejudices of which are already disgusting enough, for no liberality at all!—a jolly man of the world, who endeavours somehow or other to adjust matters, for mere old dotards or debauchees who mistake frenzy for strength, and might as well attempt to frighten the daylight with a candle in a hollow turnip, as threaten and grin down the French people with their impotent despotism!

The following document, extremely worthy of the attention of those who look beyond the little moments of little men, has just transpired. The Chronicle pledges itself for its authenticity. We shall give some observations upon it next week, with M. O'MEARA's Letters.

NOTE, WRITTEN BY BONAPARTE IN THE MARGIN OF SIR THOMAS REIDE'S LETTER TO COUNT BERTRAND, DATED APRIL 25, 1818.

"1. I gave you to understand, when you presented this letter to me, that I would not condescend to notice it, and that you need not translate it to me, since it is not in the form which has been observed for three years.

"2. This fresh outrage only dishonours this coxcomb. The King of England alone is entitled to treat with me on an equality.

"3. This crafty proceeding has one object—to prevent your exposing the criminal plot they have been contriving against my life for these two years past.

"4. Thus it is, that affecting a willingness to provide me a lodging, and build a house for me, I have been kept for three years in this unhealthy barn, and no building has yet been commenced.

"5. Thus it is, that affecting to allow me the liberty of riding on horseback, they prevent me from so doing, and from taking exercise, by indirect means. Hence the primary cause of my illness.

"6. They employ the same means to debar me from receiving visits. They had need of obscurity.

"7. Thus it is, that after having made attempts upon my physician; having forced him to give in his resignation, rather than remain a passive instrument: void of all moral feeling, they nevertheless keep him under arrest at Longwood, wishing it to be believed that I have his assistance, when they well know I cannot see him; that I have not seen him for a fortnight; and that I never shall see him, unless he be set at liberty, relieved from his oppressive situation, and restored to his moral independence in what concerns the exercise of his functions.

"8. Thus it is they are guilty of a characteristic falsehood in causing bulletins to be issued by a physician who has never seen me, and who is ignorant both of my constitution and my disorder! but that is well calculated to deceive the Prince and people of England, and of Europe.

"9. They indulge in a ferocious smile at the fresh sufferings this deprivation of the assistance of art adds to this tedious agony.

"10. Desire this note to be sent to Lord Liverpool, and also your letter of yesterday, with those of the 13th and 14th of April, that the Prince Regent may know who my — is, and be able publicly to punish him.

"11. If he does not, I bequeath the opprobrium of my death to the reigning House of England.

"Longwood, April 27, 1818.

"NAPOLEON."

It is curious to see how this extraordinary family is scattered, and what an interest they keep up in the minds of the world, whether in good fortune or in bad. Some are in Europe, one in Asia, another in America. The smallest movement of theirs attracts more attention to it even now, than twenty steps taken by the Legitimate. The least stir of NAPOLEON is watched like that of a volcano. JOSEPH has been founding a colony in America, and sending out an expedition; while LUCIEN, who is rich also, is receiving senatorial honours, and making splendid processions in Rome. The Legitimate are doubly piqued at this last, as well as at EUGENE BEAUMARQUIS, for getting among themselves, and becoming regular Dukes and Princes. The having fine tastes in art, and being able to write books, they affect to carry off with less annoyance; and yet these are the things, after all, that gail them most,—at least wherever they have sense enough to perceive any of the signs of the times.

Sir MURRAY MAXWELL's friends have been glorifying him and his defeat with a Dinner, and making the old Anti-jacobin speeches which make the wigsbys and bagsbys chuckle so over their port and plethoras. We must say for Sir MURRAY, that his speech was the best on the occasion, and that he is an intelligent as well as a gallant Officer; but he is not cunning enough, after all, to see what a mere tool he is made of: and we could wish, in honour to his gallantry, that he would not allude quite so often to his illness and his doctors. (By the bye, why are not the wretched men brought forward, who assaulted him?) The Courier says, it is "glad to find, that the celebration of Sir M. MAXWELL's cause is to be annually commemorated on the 18th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo." So are we. There is a very pretty reciprocal light in the circumstance. It will help to distinguish, on both occasions, the gallantry of the instruments from the objects of those who used them.

We are glad to announce that the President of the Royal Academy is fast recovering from his late severe illness.

The following Address was delivered by Mr. FAWCETT on Thursday night:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—The termination of the season calls forth the most grateful acknowledgments from the Proprietors for the liberal patronage they have continued to receive at a time when many events have occurred, which have proved considerable drawbacks to the prosperity of Theatres, conducted on a scale of expense commensurate to the dignified support of the National Drama in the metropolis of the empire. Your kindness has stamped the popularity of the Company: your presence has evinced the high estimation of public accommodation in Covent Garden Theatre; and this has enabled the Proprietors successfully to contend against their opposing difficulties, and the receipts of the season have rewarded them with a profit, which, taken on an average, is equal to all their wishes and expectations.—The new method of lighting and ventilating the Theatre, which they had the honour to introduce, has answered so completely, that not only has it been adopted partially in Theatres here, but on the Continent; measures are now taken to bring it into general use.—The Revivals and New Pieces produced during this Season have been numerous, and (with very few exceptions) most successful. Three new Tragedies, from the pen of different authors, have been greatly admired for their classical and poetical beauties; and their success in representation is a proof that this high species of composition is not lost in this country—and most grateful are the Proprietors to a public who have taste to appreciate, and generosity to reward, such distinguished talent.—Ladies and Gentlemen, until Monday, the 7th of September, the Proprietors most respectfully bid you farewell! Your encouragement of their efforts during this season is a fresh stimulus to their exertions for the next; and they trust they shall re-open the Theatre with an accession of novelty in performers and performances, which will merit the continuance of your approving favour. For the Performers, Ladies and Gentlemen, I have only to reiterate their expressions of gratitude for your unceasing, kind, and cheering indulgence; and till the time of re-opening they humbly take their leave.

COURT AND FASHIONABLES.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGES.

On Saturday week a temporary altar was fitted up in the Queen's drawing-room, which looks into Kew Gardens, on the first floor. The Royal pair, other members of the Royal Family, and the persons who were to be present, had all arrived before four o'clock, at which hour the Queen was conducted into the drawing-room, and took her seat on the right side of the altar. The PRINCE REGENT attended the QUEEN into the drawing-room, and was followed by the Duke and Duchess of York, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Duchess of Gloucester, the Princess Augusta, the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, the Duchess of Meiningen, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Liverpool, Viscount Sidmouth, Count and Countess Munster.—The Duke of Clarence and his intended bride, and the Duke and Duchess of Kent, being introduced into the room in due form, and having taken their stations at the altar, the Archbishop of Canterbury commenced the marriage ceremony, in which he was assisted by the Bishop of London. The brides were given away by the Regent. The Lord Chancellor produced the sanction of the Regent in Council to the marriages.—After the ceremony, the Bishop of London, as Dean of that chapel, registered the marriages in the book accordingly, which was witnessed by the Queen, the Prince Regent, and all the branches of the Royal Family present. The Queen retired to her private apartment, where her dinner was served up, the state of her health not permitting her to dine with company. At five o'clock the PRINCE REGENT and the remainder of the company sat down to a most sumptuous dinner.—Soon after half past seven o'clock, the Duke and Duchess of Kent left in Prince Leopold's travelling chariot for Claremont. The PRINCE REGENT and all the royal party proceeded in open carriages to the Cottage in Kew-gardens, near the Pagoda, which was a favourite place with the KING, where they drank tea. The Duke and Duchess of CLARENCE afterwards proceeded to the Royal Duke's residence in St. James's Palace, which was brilliantly illuminated. At the conclusion of the ceremony General TAYLOR despatched a light horseman to London, announcing that the marriages had taken place, when the artillery gunner was waiting in readiness to receive the communication, and at five o'clock a double royal salute was fired by cannons in the Park, and the bells of several parishes were rung. The Duke and Duchess of CLARENCE arrived at their residence in St. James's-palace, on Saturday night, about eleven o'clock, from Kew.

THE DUCHESS OF KENT'S WEDDING-DRESS.

A very rich and elegant gold tissue, with two superb borders of scalloped lama flouncing, each border headed with rich gold trimming; the body and sleeves to correspond, richly trimmed with beautiful Brussels point lace, and tastefully ornamented with gold tassels; the robe of rich gold tissue, lined with white satin, and trimmed round with rich scalloped lama trimming to match the dress, and fastened at the waist with a very brilliant diamond clasp. Head-dress, a wreath of diamonds.

THE DUCHESS OF CLARENCE'S WEDDING-DRESS.

A very rich and elegant silver tissue, with two broad flounces of beautiful point lace, each flounce headed with rich silver shell trimming; body and sleeves superbly trimmed with Brussels point lace and silver tassels; the robe of rich silver tissue, lined with white satin, trimmed with Brussels lace, and bordered with silver trimming to correspond, fastened at the waist with a brilliant diamond clasp. Head-dress, a superb wreath of diamonds.

The Grand Duke MICHAEL, attended by Baron NICHOLAI, honoured Mr. HAYDON by a visit on Wednesday, to see his great Picture of Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.

SIR M. MAXWELL, &c.

A select band of Place-men, Pensioners, Expectants, and others in the service of Government.—“friends and supporters of those principles on which Sir M. Maxwell offered himself as a Candidate for Westminster.”—dined together on Thursday at Willis's Rooms. Lord F. BEXINGTON was in the chair, and was supported by Lord PALMERSTON, Mr. CROKER, and other well-paid personages of the like official stamp.

After dinner Sir MURRAY MAXWELL took an early opportunity of shewing that the People of Westminster had done well in not choosing him as a fit person to watch over the conduct of the Executive. The Regent's Health having been proposed, Sir MURRAY said, “the Noble Chairman had kindly proposed to forbear from the usual greetings, in consequence of the feeble state of health in which he (Sir M. Maxwell) found himself. There was, he believed, never an occasion upon which, among such persons as were then present, the Prince Regent's health was not drunk with three times three, and no consideration could induce him to forego it at present. He should therefore, however reluctantly, feel himself compelled to withdraw from the room, if that mark of esteem for his Royal Highness was neglected upon the present occasion.”—The health of the Regent (who will doubtless be grateful to Sir Murray in due time for this disinterested burst of loyalty), was then drunk with three times three, and did not subside, the Courier says, for some minutes.—(See “Bail, Star of Brunswick.”)

The CHAIRMAN now made a speech, gravely informing the select band, that though Sir Murray had not been completely successful, yet “he was not defeated.” These are the very words, as given by the Courier,—which Paper, on such an occasion, may be supposed to utter something like the truth. The select band, it should seem, received this odd information with silence, as well they might; but when Lord F. BEXINGTON afterwards proceeded to speak of “the vices of the multitude,” (there are no Court vices), “and of dangerous innovations under the specious colour of Reform," the select band made the room shake with their plaudits. The Noble Chairman then gave the health of "The 4808 Electors of Westminster, who by their votes evinced their attachment to the genuine principles of the Constitution."—(Or, rather, for the most part, their fear of being ruined in their business if they refused to vote as ordered by the Court party.)

This toast was drank with rapturous applause. The song,—
"With a jolly good bottle let each man be armed," followed.

The CHAIRMAN then proposed—

"The health of Sir M. Maxwell, who stood forward in this good cause."

This toast (says the Courier) was drank with a degree of enthusiasm seldom witnessed even upon such occasions.

Sir M. MAXWELL, upon this, returned thanks in a speech of some length, in which he told the select band, that "he rejoiced at having met a company so distinguished by noble birth"—(Here John Willock, Esq. of Golden-square, land-surveyor, auctioneer, and sworn appraiser, —one of the stewards on this occasion,—looked a little oddish) "by noble birth, by talents, and independence, assembled to celebrate that struggle in the good cause of the Constitution, to which the humble individual who had then the honour to address them had given a name." Sir Murray then alluded to the "extraordinary means resorted to by their opponents," (taking good care however not to explain what he meant,) but for which "extraordinary means," he added, he should have been at the head of the poll! (Very true, indeed.) He said he should not allude to what had "befallen himself," but he expressed his exceeding grief at seeing those who went to support him in Covent-garden "loaded with abuse and covered with every species of filth"—(sweet creatures)—during the five days he appeared on the hustings. "And what," concluded Sir M., "were the principles which had been thus assailed? They rested upon the broad and immutable basis of the Constitution, the same principles that were acted upon at the most glorious epoch of their history, when the Peers and Commons of Great Britain met to deliberate upon the awful emergency of a vacant throne. These were his principles. The best and wisest of Statesmen had acted upon them at the Revolution, and by so doing deserved to be embalmed in the recollection of all Englishmen. They rooted out every thing that was bad in the aristocracy—they retained every thing that was truly valuable in the democracy, and they placed a family upon the throne who possessed every thing that was necessary to dignify and adorn it.* It was his prayer, that the Constitution and the Monarchy, as then established, might last as long as their sea-girt isle." (Sir M. Maxwell concluded his speech amidst loud and repeated cheering.)

A number of other speeches were made, and toasts drank—chiefly of the usual "loyal" description; but we shall content ourselves with quoting a passage from one made by my Lord PALMERSTON (who holds a place worth several thousands a-year, and must therefore be a most impartial judge of the value of the present system) which may be considered a fair specimen of courtly politics. After saying that he had no dislike to the regular Opposition Party, he added, "But there was a party, he hoped not a large one† in this country, who were actuated by no such ambition; who sought not to possess but to destroy; who aimed not to rule by the Law and under the Law, but to abrogate all Law; who wished not to exercise the legitimate authorities of the Constitution, but to subvert the Constitution itself; who talked of Reform, but meant Revolution. Of that party it behoved every well-wisher of his country to beware, jealously to watch, and strenuously to resist them; but above all to unmask their intentions, and expose their objects. Their only hope of success was by working under plausible pretensions and assumed disguises. To expose their object was at once to defeat them. Like Satan in Paradise, the moment they were touched by the spear of truth, and compelled to appear in their own natural form, they were put to flight, discomfited and disgraced."

* Fudge!—See the "Vicar of Wakefield"—where Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Slaggs is recounting her adventures in the presence of Mr. B. and Mr. C.

† Look, my Lord, for comfort, to the Poll books of Westminster, the City, and Southwark; and, in short, wherever the people have any thing like a voice in the choice of Representatives.

This Speech, says the Courier, was repeatedly interrupted by loud and long-continued applause; which we dare say is true enough, when we recollect, as Sir Murray observed, who were the persons then present!

Mr. DAWSON, the modest Attorney, made a brief speech of thanks when his valuable health was drank; but why was John Willock, Esq. of Golden-square, silent? Why did he not favour the select band with a little of his pure English and profound politics? Surely the man who harangues with "such applause" at Vestry Meetings, at Parish Dinners, and is so much admired by all the charity boys in St. James's, ought not to have held his tongue on such a joyful occasion! And after all the worthy man's extraordinary exertions in the "good cause," that nobody should propose the drinking his health, as well as that of the modest Attorney! Oh, fy, Gentlemen of the select band—fy—who will bustle about and do your ungracious work in future, if thus you use your most faithful friends? For our parts, we would advise the worthy Auctioneer to look out his old blue and buff suit again, in which he formerly supported Charles Fox on those very hustings from whence his present ungrateful friends were so shamefully driven, "covered with every species of filth;"—from the flagrant consequences of which, (as Mrs. Slipslop would say), not all the perfumes in his friend HENDRIE'S shop can possibly save them:—

Not musk, nor lavender,
Nor all the richest odours of the East,
Shall ever med'cine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou ow'dst yesterday.

FINE ARTS.

HAKEWELL'S VIEWS IN ITALY.

THE most perfect pleasure derived from picturesque scenery is from a view of those places in which the greatest external beauty or grandeur is associated with deep moral feelings and reflections, arising from the extraordinary characters and circumstances of the individuals or nations that have inhabited them. The renown of the deeds done there infuses a solid delight into the mind, which will spring from such objects to the last particle of their time-perishing remains. A mild but exalted spirit breathes from them, to which the thoughtful mind is attentive. In effect, the still, continuous voice of ages speaks. The greatness and the littleness, the wisdom and the folly, the virtue and the vice, the transient and the probably-immortal existence of man, are their themes; and of the vicissitudes, the passing and altering nature of all things that inherit the globe, they are especially and pathetically eloquent. Of this mixture of the moral and the picturesque, there is no country which affords so copious a treat as Italy. The very name communicates a glow to the imagination. It calls up the recollection of the magnificent empire, of which Italy was the builder and the head. It brings before our view a glorious display of excellence in every thing which exalts and felicitates, as well as an immense mass of misery and vice in whatever degrades our species. It calls up to view a fairy land in comparison with others,—

"For wheresoe'er we turn our ravish'd eyes, Gay gilded scenes and shining prospects rise."

We see displayed before us the most charming views of nature and of art, for it is covered with the beautiful and sublime remains of architectural and sculptural antiquity, and further embellished with numerous kindred works of modern genius. Its religious, civil, and domestic edifices are profusely enriched with the creations of painting, by the greatest masters of the fascinating art. It is the land of music. Her sweet sounds are heard not only from almost every voice in song, but from every tongue in speech, for her language is melody. But unequalled, multitudinous, and beautiful, as are her works of Art, they are still but the decorations of her far more beautiful works of Nature. They are but the trinkets placed on her lovely limbs. Loveliest is her varied face of Nature among the beauties of the European hemisphere. Georgia and Circassia themselves do not boast a more striking superiority over other countries in a species of beauty still more and most touching to our hearts, that personal beauty, which looks delight into the soul. Her picturesque charms are such as

—“Nature’s boon
Pours forth profuse on hill and dale and plain.”— “A wilderness of sweets; for nature here
Wantons as in her prime, and plays at will
Her virgin fancies, pouring forth more sweet,
Wild above rule or art, enormous bliss!”

Of such a delicious country, what greater treat could be conferred on those who have or those who have not seen it, than select views of its palaces, temples, bridges, aqueducts, cascades, gardens, lakes, castles, sea-coasts, cities, ruins, grottos, groves, valleys, mountains, &c., in a series of beautiful Engravings from accurate drawings made by an able Artist on the spot? This Mr. HAKEWELL has begun to do in the 1st Part, which he has published, of his Views in Italy, illustrative of ADDISON, EUSTACE, and FORSYTH, from Drawings made by him in 1816 and 1817. The work will be completed in twelve Parts, each containing three highly finished Engravings of Views, and two in Outlines, of the interior of the Museums of Florence, the Vatican, and Capitol of Rome, and the Studi of Naples, with appropriate Letter-press. In the capital execution of the 1st Part, the best pledge is given of the future excellence of the entire work, especially when we see that there is no manufacturing Engravers engaged, but Artists not only of the highest executive ability, but who, justly regardless of the honour of their Art, disdain, for the purpose of pelf, to lend their estimable names to the degradation of their liberal profession, by lowering it to a mere mechanical trade. They are Messrs. COOKE, FITTLER, LANDSEER, MILTON, MIDDIMAN, MOSES, PYE, and SCOTT. The 1st Part contains,—1. View of the Entrance of Rome by the Piazza del Popolo, engraved by J. PYE:—2. View of Naples, engraved by G. COOKE:—3. View on the Lago di Garda, engraved by MIDDIMAN:—4. Interior of the Sala a Croce Greca of the Vatican, looking to the grand Staircase, engraved by H. MOSES:—5. Ditto, looking to the Rotondo, engraved by H. “Even since, and now, fair Italy!
Thou art the garden of the world, the home
Of all Art yields and Nature can decree;
Even in thy desert what is like to thee?
Thy very weeds are beautiful; thy waste
More rich than other climes’ fertility;
Thy wreck a glory, and thy ruin grac’d
With an immaculate charm which cannot be defac’d.”

TREATMENT of the EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—There is always a pleasure in seeing oneself borne out in one’s opinions by subsequent facts, which operate as proofs of their justice. In your last number of the Examiner but one, I advanced doubts of the truth of the statement relative to the sailor, who was said to have visited Bonaparte, and also expressed my astonishment at the selection of such a man as Sir Hudson Lowe for the office of Governor. In a paper of this day, I think the Times, the swimming story of the sailor is completely contradicted, on the authority of a late arrival from St. Helena:—it remains therefore to conjecture for what purpose it was invented. In the Morning Chronicle of this day, there is also a document, which shews the miserable mind of the Governor, no less than the pettyfogging spirit of his employers. For this said Governor a snug income and residence is provided, the latter convenient enough no doubt for his dinner parties and routes, while his prisoner, whose shoes he is unworthy to clean, remains subjected to hardship and privation. I trust this important topic will be brought forward in the ensuing Session of Parliament, and the honour of Great Britain be preserved from a stain, which will otherwise be inflicted upon it by the pen of History. I am aware that to talk of honour to the present Ministers of Great Britain would be a mere waste of time; but it is strange they cannot see their interest. If, as report states, their agent in Paris,—a certain Noble Duke,—is endeavouring to give consideration to those old, sottish, priest-ridden fools, the Ultras, who are so justly despised in France, and so thoroughly contemptible in numbers, spirit, and understanding, we can wonder at nothing they do. To an infant politician the proper line of conduct to be pursued in regard to Napoleon, is clear as day-light; but the Castlereaghs and Cannings, the Sidmouths and Vansittarts,—with their creatures, who govern us for our affliction, exemplify the old latin proverb, “Quem deus vult perdere prius dementat.”—Yours, &c. W. X.

CRUEL EXHIBITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—I thank you for furnishing me with a title so appropriate, and beg the insertion of the following reply to so much of Mr. Jones’s letter as appears to me to require notice. Mr. Jones suggests malice or misapprehension on my part, and complains that my letter is written, as he “should conceive, in a manner highly prejudicial to the interests of the house where that Exhibition is said to be exposed.” Does Mr. J. deny such Exhibition, or any of its circumstances, to have been exactly as stated in such letter?

Mr. J. requires my proper name, &c. and my real object for “slapping” the address into a newspaper. I submit that the first is at present unnecessary, and may lead to my annoyance; and that a person may reasonably desire to avoid many things which do not excite his fear. To the second I answer, that I had not any “malice, spleen,” or “pique,” against Mr. Jones, whose person and connections are, as such, entirely unknown to me; that I had no “itch for scribbling,” particularly on a subject like the present one, for to me it is an unpleasant effort; that I am not in a situation of life in which there can be any opposition of the interests of Mr. Jones and myself; and that I was led to make the effort, in the most eligible mode that occurred to me, partly from resentment to what had taken place, but chiefly from a desire to prevent, so far as I could, similar misery in future. It cannot be gratifying to those feelings which forced me to take an interest in the fate of creatures having much in common with my own species, that any one of that species should be hurt, though necessarily and deservedly, by any act of mine: for here I feel compelled to confess, not without great self debasement, yet protesting that it does not affect the present question, that in my younger days, I, the writer of this article! was (like too many others) not altogether innocent of cruelty to animals. I thought it probable that I should be accused (among other things) of being actuated by a spurious kind of humanity,—that it might be urged that frogs were natural and proper food for snakes, and that no diminution of evil would ensue if the former were protected and the latter starved. I do not recommend to Mr. J. to starve, or otherwise destroy his favourites; they may live much more comfortably than the size, form, &c. of their prisons may lead me to suppose; but, if he find it useful or pleasant to keep them, and that frogs or any other living creatures are their proper food, would suggest how easily he could give the victims a previous and instantaneous death, instead of exposing them to a long and unnecessary continuance of what may be called (perhaps more conveniently than accurately) actual and apprehensive agony; from the latter of which, when in the unrestrained state of nature, they are exempt. With respect to the extract from Martin, although his characters are fictitious, yet he writes as a naturalist, and I believe without exaggeration; for (excuse the disgusting yet seemingly necessary relation) I saw one of Mr. J.'s snakes, when it had about half-swallowed a frog, which was (I believe) not one-fifth part so large as some that I have seen elsewhere; yet then, about a minute (perhaps more, it seemed very long to me), elapsed before it was completely drawn into the throat; and to the last moment of its being visible, it appeared to possess full vigour, and consequent susceptibility.

The duration and acuteness of the suffering must necessarily be in some proportion to the relative size of the respective animals. Any damage sustained by Mr. Jones, from an extended publicity of that which he himself had set forth to common view, must be attributed to his own misconduct; and I submit, that the best way to obviate the evil, and to acquire or regain the esteem of others and himself, will be to discontinue the practice (not merely the exposure) of the subject of complaint; to cultivate those humane feelings, which, I trust, were partially suspended only; and unaffectedly to express that contrition which must naturally follow, and which I think has already appeared, although somewhat disguised. I have within the last few days frequently passed the window, and have seen the snakes, but no frogs; therefore, I may have no right to suppose, that the same mode of feeding is persisted in privately; and I leave it to Mr. J.'s sense of propriety, to inform us or not whether it be so or otherwise.—I remain, Sir, your much obliged and humble servant.

E. W.

Mr. Jones has sent another letter to the Examiner, in which he states that his former one was a private communication.—Mr. Jones should have marked it as such, and then it would not have been printed. E. W., who has no connexion with the Examiner, has replied, and it is hoped, to Mr. Jones's edification. The following corrections in Mr. J.'s former letter, which it is, but fair to print, have been sent by Mr. Jones:—

First.—14th line first paragraph, for "human mind," it is printed "human mind."

2d paragraph (paragraphing it is wrong and alters the meaning, making it read different to the intention) 6th line, "individuals inhabiting the house," is printed "exhibiting."

3d paragraph 14th line, "the Author," printed "Answer."

14th paragraph, "let him finish his name," printed "furnish."

COURT OF CHANCERY.

TEMPEST v. ORD.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, as soon as he had taken his seat, proceeded to give judgment. He had considered the case of Lord Stewart and Lady Vane Tempest with the utmost anxiety. With respect to the most important consideration, the inclination of the young lady herself, he had thought it necessary to consult her personally; he had stated to her every objection to the match; he had endeavoured to draw her mind to a just consideration as to all the objections that had occurred to him. He had done so repeatedly, in order to afford her time for further reflection; the result was, that he was perfectly satisfied, that her determination was unaltered. It was reduced, therefore, to a question of time. With regard to some other points, he had felt it his duty to make inquiries which the master had not been able to make. It would be difficult to state in detail his reasons why the affidavits had satisfied him; that in a long course of time, and with reference to a numerous family, there was not an imputation of the kind that had been alluded to; and he could not but think it his duty to say, that if there had been any instance of the sort, (insanity,) in past generations, in a family so numerous, it was not to an extent that would justify him in allowing it to have any weight upon his judgment. He did not know to what extent he should go, if he acted upon such a principle in any family. There was a great difference with respect to the objection to which he was referring, where the matter was of recent date. Under these circumstances, and looking at the objections, all of which had been fully explained, and all of which had been presented to the mind of the young lady herself in the strongest point of view; considering all the objections separately and together, he did not think himself authorized to say that the Master had come to a wrong conclusion. There had been some mention of an appeal to the House of Lords; and certainly, such an appeal lay. It had happened once, that with reference to the care of infants, the House of Lords had told him that he was wrong; he had exercised his judgment to the best of his power, and no man ever did exercise his judgment with more painful anxiety than himself. In the present case, considering the difference of age, and the circumstance that Lord Stewart had a son who would inherit his title and fortune—and considering the other circumstances mentioned in the case, he could not represent this as the most eligible marriage the young lady could contemplate; yet he could not see any principle upon which he could determine that it was an improper match. He begged that Sir Samuel Romilly would let him know, after taking a reasonable time to consider, whether he meant to appeal to the House of Lords, in order that he might arrange matters in a way as little objectionable to all parties as possible.

Wednesday, July 15.

FINAL DECISION OF LORD STEWART'S CASE.

Sir ARTHUR PRIGOT said, that he had consulted with the Counsel on the other side, and understood from them, that it was the fixed determination of Mrs. Taylor to appeal from his Lordship's decision to the House of Lords. From the circumstances of the case, it was particularly desirable that the appeal should be heard as quickly as possible; but it could not in any way proceed, till his Lordship had formally made out the order.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—You may, therefore, take the order that the Master's report, finding that this is not an improper marriage, is by me confirmed; at the same time let the entry of appeal be inserted. I am of opinion that the marriage must be restrained, under the present circumstances, till the decision of the House of Lords be known. With respect to the other restraints, they had as well be put an end to, as I don't see any reasonable cause for their being continued.

Sir A. PRIGOT.—I should suppose, my Lord, that the Master may, in the mean time, nevertheless proceed with making out the proposals of settlement.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Certainly. I can see nothing to prevent him going on with that; but let it be understood that he does so without prejudice.

Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY at this moment came into Court, and addressing his Lordship, said, "I am, my Lord, desired by Mrs. Taylor to thank your Lordship most respectfully, that it is her intention forthwith to appeal to the House of Lords, from the decision now given by your Lordship.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I was just informed of this, Sir Samuel, before you came into Court, by Sir A. Pigot. I am particularly glad that you have adopted this course, because, in a case so painful to me in every point of view as this has been, I shall have the heart-felt satisfaction of being set right by the House of Lords, if I am wrong. Painful as the consideration of this case has been to my own mind, I am happy to think that a superior tribunal will have it in their power to review my judgment, and that any error or inadvertency I have been guilty of will be there redressed. I have just stated to Sir Arthur Pigot what should be done, and I do really think I am in justice bound to restrain the marriage in the mean time. This is the best thing I can possibly do for the parties. Take the order as I have mentioned it, and let it be drawn up forthwith.

SEE V. PRITCHARD AND OTHERS.

Sir S. ROMILLY applied for an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing certain letters written by the plaintiff, Mrs. Jane Gee.—Mrs. Gee was the widow of the late Mr. William Gee, who had lived at Beddington-park. The defendant at that time was a boy, and Mr. Gee had protected him like a father. Mr. Pritchard during his infancy was constantly at the house of Mr. Gee; he was afterwards sent to a public school, and finished his education at the University. Mr. Gee died in 1805, without issue, and divided his fortune between his widow and the defendant. While Mr. Pritchard was absent, Mrs. Gee wrote to him many letters, containing much private and confidential matter, and the defendant was now about to publish these letters, which were intended to form part of a narrative which was about to be committed to the press. All intercourse had been now broken off between the parties; and the plaintiff swore, that she verily believed the sole intention of the defendant, in making the publication, was to give her pain. Mr. Pritchard had sent back the original letters, but had kept copies, which he had intimated his intention to publish in the commencement of June. The plaintiff further stated in her affidavit, that she was the more convinced that it was the intention of the defendant to publish them; as on the 10th of July last an advertisement appeared in the Morning Post to the following effect:—"In the press, and speedily will be published, by William Anderson, bookseller, The Adopted Son; or, Twenty Years at Beddington: containing the Memoirs of a Clergyman, and interspersed with interesting Correspondence."

The LORD CHANCELLOR wished to know whether there was ever an instance of such an injunction as this being granted.

Sir S. ROMILLY apprehended that there were many instances. He particularly recollected the case of Lord Chesterfield's Letters. Here, as in that case, this gentleman was in possession of letters which were transmitted to him for no other purpose than perusal, and not for publication.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I apprehend that if you, Sir Samuel, were to write letters to me, and a person got them out of my possession, and published them, there an injunction might be granted; but here the letters are written to the very person who publishes them.

Sir S. ROMILLY observed, that in the case of Lord Chesterfield, an injunction was granted against the publication by Mrs. Stanhope, the administratrix to the son of Lord Chesterfield, to whom they were written. That case was therefore similar to the present.—Injunction granted.

POLICE.

WORKING-STREET.

On Wednesday, Maria Derby alias Harrison was charged with stabbing Joseph Harrison, a black man, with a knife. John Ward stated, that he is a music-case maker, residing in French-alley, Aldersgate-street. About 9 o'clock yesterday morning he saw the prisoner and Harrison, who reside in the next house to him, coming down stairs. Harrison had a stool on which he sits every day cleaning shoes, at the corner of the alley, in his arms; he is a pensioner, having lost a leg in the King's service. The prisoner, who was behind him, leaned over, attempting to cut his throat with a knife she had in her hand, and struck him in the back of the neck, and inflicted a severe gash. She at the same moment exclaimed, "Take that, you———, I wish I had done it effectually." They were quarrelling in the morning, which was their constant practice. Witness assisted in carrying him to the surgeon's, in Goswell-street, who dressed the wound, and declared him in imminent danger. The parties had cohabited as man and wife about seven years.—William Jennings did not see the blow struck; but he heard the prisoner make use of the words as stated by last witness.—Mr. Beville ordered that proper care should be taken of the wounded man, and committed the prisoner until his fate be known.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

On Saturday se'nnight an alarming fire broke out in Newton-street, High-Holborn. It commenced in the stable of Messrs. Spencer, feather-bedmakers, whose boy had been in the stable, immediately under the manufactory. About ten o'clock he saw no appearance of fire, while he was in the stable, but a short time after he had quitted it, he heard a crackling noise, and immediately opened the stable door, and found the place all in a blaze; which soon communicated to the manufactory and house of Mr. Spencer, whose whole premises and valuable property, worth about 7,000*l.*, were entirely consumed in less than half an hour: he is insured. The whole of the premises between Spencer's house in Newton-street, and the back part of Mr. Jameson's coach manufactory, in Little Queen-street, are entirely consumed, with the whole of the property they contained. The premises of Mr. Mould, a coal-merchant, in which were a quantity of old coach-wheels, &c., were entirely destroyed: as also the premises of a coach-spring-maker, who is the only sufferer that is not insured. The house of Mr. Tombs, a publican, next door to Spencer's, has suffered considerably from the fire, and he has lost a quantity of furniture, &c. to the amount of 400*l.* and upwards: we understand he is not insured for more than half his loss. The shop of Mr. —, a carpenter, was burnt to the ground. Mr. Jameson's premises are not very much injured by the fire, but in removing a number of coaches, &c. to save them from the fire, they are all very much damaged, and some missing. Messrs. Scholls and Davis, coachmakers, have suffered in removing their property in much the same manner as Mr. Jameson. Happily no lives have been lost.—Mrs. P. Spencer was in the house, with six young children, who were safely removed.

On Tuesday an inquest was held on the body of Sarah Johns, aged 12 years, daughter of Mr. J. Johns, of Ratcliffe-highway. It appeared that the father and mother of the deceased left the deceased and her little sister, three years of age, in an apartment together by themselves; it was evening, and the younger sister took up a lighted candle and said to the deceased, "Sarah, I'll set fire to your clothes;" on which she did set fire to her clothes: the deceased then ran into the street screaming, and before assistance arrived, every morsel of her clothes, excepting her stays, which were cut off, were completely burned off her back: her face, neck, stomach, and body, were burned in a dreadful manner; and although every necessary surgical aid was rendered, she expired in the most excruciating torments on Monday night last.—Verdict, Accidentally burnt to death by her clothes catching fire.

On Saturday week an inquisition was held at Camberwell, on the body of Mrs. White, the widow of a military officer. Mrs. Payne stated that she was mistress of the house in which the deceased resided as a lodger. She frequently indulged in excessive drinking. On Wednesday last she went to London, and was brought home in the evening in a state of extreme intoxication. On Thursday morning she got up to breakfast as usual, and appeared tolerably well: about one in the afternoon witness went into her apartment, and found her lying upon the floor, and the blood flowing profusely from a wound in the face, which was occasioned by her falling on the edge of a pewter pot. With assistance she carried her up to bed, and in two hours afterwards found her quite dead.—The Jury returned a verdict—Died from suffocation, occasioned by excessive drinking.

An Inquisition was taken on Tuesday at St. Thomas's Hospital, on the body of George Saunders, a gardener, in the employ of B. Burder, Esq. of Tottenham.—Mr. Burder, of Wood-green farm, stated, that a short time ago his gardens were robbed nightly, and, to protect his property, he sent the deceased, to borrow two spring-guns, for the purpose of placing on his premises. When he borrowed the guns, he inquired whether they were unloaded: he was assured they were, for he did not wish to have loaded guns: his object was to frighten the depredators. The guns were frequently snapt in the lock during the time persons stood before the muzzles. On Friday, the deceased was employed in fixing the guns; about six o'clock he left the deceased, and had not left him more than ten minutes when he heard the report of fire-arms: he ran into the garden, and saw the deceased bleeding in a most dreadful manner from the right arm: he asked him what was the matter? He said, "Oh, I am shot; the gun was loaded, and I did not know it." A surgeon ordered him to be sent immediately to St. Thomas's Hospital.—Thomas Peck, surgeon, said, that on Friday the deceased was brought to the hospital, apparently dying from the loss of blood; it was the opinion of himself and another surgeon that the deceased could not live five minutes. Upon examining the wounds he found the laceration so extensive that amputation was necessary.—The deceased died at four o'clock next morning, from the loss of blood.—Mr. SHELTON observed, that no person had a legal right to have spring-guns on their premises, it being an instrument which caused almost certain death to those who came in contact with it. The offence of robbing a garden was not punishable with death; and therefore, if a thief was to be shot by a spring-gun, and it was to produce death, the owner of it would be liable to punishment, and the Jury who sat upon the body of the deceased would act properly in returning a verdict of manslaughter against the owner of the gun; indeed, he believed they would be justified in returning a verdict of wilful murder. In this case it appeared that the deceased was the servant of the owner of the gun, and that his death was purely accidental. Still the Jury ought to mark their reprobation of having such illegal instruments placed in open premises, because it had produced the death of one of his Majesty's subjects.—Verdict—Accidental Death. Deodand 20s., and the gun forfeited.

Wednesday an Inquest was held in Queen-street, Golden-square, on the body of Mr. Peter Williams. The deceased was only 20 years of age, son to Mr. J. Williams, of Queen-street: he terminated his existence by shooting himself through the head with a carbine, in his father's kitchen. The dreadful act, it is said, originated in an attachment the deceased had formed to a young lady, who slighted his addresses in favour of a rival. Verdict—Died by his own act, in shooting himself, being, at the time he committed it, in a state of mental derangement.

On Friday, an Inquisition was taken at Shadwell, on the body of Mrs. Theodosia Stout, aged 40, who put a period to her existence by hanging herself. It appeared, from the evidence of Mr. George Hawker, brother-in-law to the deceased, that the deceased's husband, Captain Stout, had been at sea, for a length of time, which seemed to prey upon her mind very much; she would at intervals act in a manner like a mad woman. On Thursday night, the deceased, thinking thieves were coming, ran up-stairs to her chamber, and remained there a considerable time, which led witness to go and ascertain the cause. On opening the door, he found the deceased suspended by a cord to the bedpost; he cut her down, and sent for Mr. Blake, a surgeon, but she was quite dead. Verdict—Hung herself in a state of insanity.

On Thursday, about two o'clock in the afternoon, a great concourse of people collected in Holborn, opposite Gray's Inn-lane, round a horse and gig, with two persons in it, which suddenly stopped. One of them appeared quite insensible, as if he had fainted. Medical assistance was immediately procured, and every art employed to rouse him; but in vain, he having breathed his last. The other person in the gig was a son of the deceased, who was so much overcome by this melancholy event, that he fainted at the sight of his father's corpse. The deceased appeared to be about 50 years of age. It is supposed, the being exposed to the heat of the sun in an open carriage, had produced this effect. His name was Wright; he was a fishmonger in Newgate-market. The deceased had gone to the country for the benefit of his health, and, not recovering, came back to town. The body has been delivered up to the family of the deceased.

On Thursday week, while Major Fitzclarence was in his tilbury in the Park, the rein of the bridle got under his horse's tail, and he kicked so violently as to shatter the gig, and strike Major Fitzclarence severely on the breast, who was obliged to lose 20 ounces of blood. On Sunday, when returning from Bushy, the rein again got under the horse's tail, at Hammersmith, and he ran off. The servant jumped out to stop him, but fell, and the Major leaned forward to remove the cause of the horse's alarm. For this purpose, he put his right leg forward on the shaft, and while in this position he received a kick upon the shin, which smashed both bones of the leg, and forced one of them through his boot. The horse ran the gig up against the wall, and threw Major Fitzclarence out between him and the wall, where he lay lying on his back, the shock having upset gig, horse, and all. Major Fitzclarence held the horse's head down with his left hand, while with the other he drew himself along the ground, and succeeded in keeping the horse from going over him until assistance arrived. Mr. Pring, of Hammersmith attended, and set Major Fitzclarence's leg, in a public-house; after which he wrote to his father and the Prince Regent, to acquaint them of the accident that had befallen him. The Prince Regent immediately sent his bed-carriage for him; and the Duke of Clarence came to assist in moving him to his house in the Stable-yard, where he arrived in about five hours after the accident.

About four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, as Mr. Ware, the architect, accompanied by Mr. Dudley, steward to Lord George Cavendish, Mr. Seabrook, the master carpenter, and Mr. King, the foreman, and three plasterers, were on a lofty scaffold, in the interior of Burlington-house, examining the cornices, &c., from the great weight on the scaffold, one of the putlogs snapped in two, and all were precipitated to the bottom, a height of two stories, to the stone floor. Mr. Ware received a severe contusion on the back of his head, and several bruises on his body. Mr. Seabrook and Mr. King also received some severe bruises; but Mr. Dudley had not so fortunate an escape, for he had his left leg broken in two, close to the knee, and before he could be extricated from his perilous situation, a heavy plank fell on the broken leg and shattered it to pieces; he was carried to his apartment in Burlington-house, and surgical aid sent for, when it was found necessary to amputate the leg above the knee, which he bore with great fortitude.—The other three men received each more or less injury, but none of any consequence.

On Thursday se'night a serious accident befel St. Andrew St. John, Esq., of Gayton, Norfolk, by the breaking down of the Lynn and Pakenham coach, near Newmarket, which, falling upon him, unfortunately broke his leg and one of his ribs; he also received several violent contusions, but great hopes are entertained of his recovery. Lord James Townshend and the remainder of the passengers escaped unhurt, except one lady who was severely bruised.

NAPOLEON.

WE again notice the condition of this once mighty conqueror; and we shall always do so, whenever the subject is brought before us, if it be only to shew that those who opposed him on right and sincere grounds in his prosperity, are not the persons to press upon him with mean enmity in his adversity.

The reader saw last week the memorandums which BONAPARTE wrote some time since in noticing the letter of a Sir THOMAS READE. They ended with saying, that if the PRINCE REGENT did not interfere and punish his petty tormentors, he "left the opprobrium of his death to the Regining House of England." The following passages have since appeared in the Courier:

"The latest accounts from St. Helena continue to mention the circumstance of the sailor making his way to the residence of Bonaparte. It was also reported on the Island, that in consequence of representations from Napoleon, or from other circumstances, he would shortly quit Longwood, and reside at a Mr. LEECH's farm, which had been or was about to be purchased for his future residence. The latter is situated to the westward of the only landing place on the Island, about three or four miles in the interior. The only access to it is a winding way up the Ladder-hill, at the top of which is a strong battery. The accounts state that it was considered by every person not only the most pleasant residence on the Island, but that all chance of escape was rendered impossible, as any person approaching could be seen at a great distance; and as there was only one path, a few sentinels would be sufficient for the purpose of guarding it. The fortifications on Ladder-hill are represented to be of the most commanding description, large cannon looking nearly perpendicularly down both on the narrow pass and also towards the sea. Some of them are 32 and 44 pounders; they are swung in chains, and could on the instant be levelled at any object, however much below the range of the guns. By means of a telegraph at the house of Mr. Leech communications could be had in a few seconds with the Governor's house, or with any part of the Island. The greatest attention continued to be paid to all vessels sailing from the Island. On its being made known by signal, that a vessel is about to sail from the Island, the officer on duty makes himself sure that BONAPARTE is at his residence, or, to speak in the language of the Island, "he sights him." The signal is then made for the vessel to depart, and if she does not instantly heave her anchor, the batteries commence firing, and continue till the vessel has cleared the bay."

We need not repeat all the reasons we have given at full length and on more than one occasion, why NAPOLEON ought not to be treated as he is. We have the less necessity for so doing, inasmuch as they have never yet been answered; and we cannot place this omission on the part of the ministerial hirelings to the account of any thing dignified, (dignified!) since not to mention the general chaacter of their writings and proceedings, they always divide their counter-arguments between sheer imaginary abuse and the tenth and least part of the question in hand. Leaving our arguments therefore in possession of all the force, which the ministerialists agree to give them credit for, we shall only observe at present that every day strengthens our opinion of the petty feelings indulged against NAPOLEON; that the circumstances of his fresh removal are very suspicious, connected as they are with the story about a sailor whom nobody brings forward; and that the Government hirelings themselves seem to take pains in their writings to shew us the malignant extremities, to which they and their employers are capable of going.

The real crimes of NAPOLEON, in the eyes of these men, is two-fold;—first, his having raised himself to more than a level with the nonsensical arrogators of divine right; and second, his having raised a million times above their slaves and flatterers, and not in their own way. Having therefore, by the united effects of his own unjust ambition, his rashness, and the physical and moral strength of the descendants of the HAMPDENS and SYDNEYS, got him at last into their power, they set about wreaking upon him all the unwilling half-consciousness of their own inferior natures. Feeble and outrageous, they accordingly get fit and petty instruments for the task, as FULVIA pierced CICERO's tongue with her needle. They commit NAPOLEON to the custody of men infinitely below him in their own notions of rank. They call him (O the magnanimous and self-betraying rogues!) they call him General, as Mr. CANNING, in a very savage fit indeed, once called him Mr. BONAPARTE; which is almost as ludicrous as talking of SCIPIO AFRICANUS, Esq. They compel his retainers to make representations about bread, and meat, and lodging. They give him a Captain to accompany him per force in his walks. They are always reminding him of his birth, though it is highly respectable and fifty times superior to several of theirs,—of which nevertheless, on any other occasion, a gentleman would disdain to remind them. They even repeat the poor extravagancies of the emigrants about his sisters being strumpets and washerwomen,—strumpets, (alas, how irreverent towards many of the legitimate!) and washerwoman, which said washerwomen, by all accounts, set an example of princely dignity to the oldest courts in Europe. "I hates every thing as is low," says the dancing-bear man in Goldsmith.

But NAPOLEON, it seems, is to be removed at last from his residence at Longwood, and the Courier hints, that it is in consequence perhaps of representations from himself. The possibility, however, of "other" reasons creeps out; the old story of the invisible sailor is brought up again; and in fine, the new house to which he is to be removed is "not only the most pleasant residence on the island," but all chance of escape is rendered impossible, and there is a telegraph on the top of it,—a very finishing gratification of course to the prisoner, who complains of intrusion. The idle pretence of such contradictions as these is, that some consideration is paid to BONAPARTE's feelings; whereas the nature of the removal is evident, at least if we are to take the words of those who inform us of it. BUONAPARTE complains of Longwood; he is therefore to be removed, and as the phrase is, removed with a vengeance.

That the legitimate and Christian jailors of NAPOLEON wish him to suffer, is apparent not only from the general tenor of their writings and proceedings, but from their own confession. In another column of the Courier, side by side with the above extract, is the following paragraph:—"For our own parts, much as it may shock the morbid sympathy of the Morning Chronicle" (the writer of which expressed a natural shame at seeing a fallen enemy so treated by his countrymen) "we never reflect upon the murderer of the Duke D'ENGHIEN, of PALM, of PICHEGRU, and of WRIGHT, upon the rancorous enemy of England, the universal foe of liberty, the oppressor of Europe, the fugitive from Moscow and from Waterloo, without lamenting that he is not the tenant of some Russian or Hungarian dungeon, where, stripped even of the pomp and ceremony that yet attend him, he might atone in solitude for the mighty wrongs he has inflicted upon mankind."

Here the Courier, the chief worthy newspaper representative of Government, the scribe who gravely stickles for Christianity, tells us that he never thinks of BONAPARTE without wishing him in a dungeon. And why? Because he is the murderer of D'ENGHEIN, PALM, PICHEGRU, and WRIGHT, the enemy of England, the foe of liberty, the oppressor of Europe, the fugitive, the mighty wronger of mankind,—and omne quod exit in hum. Good. Does he never think then of all other "murderers" for state-reasons, all other imperial and royal enemies of England, foes of liberty, oppressors of Europe, fugitives, and mighty wrongers of mankind, without wishing them in dungeons or other torment? Does he wish the STUARTS in torment for murdering Sir WALTER RALEIGH and for all the real murders they committed by the help of the wild beast JEFFERIES? Does he wish WILLIAM 3rd in torment for the massacre at Glencow? Does he wish LOUIS the 14th in torment for the savage burning of the Palatinate, for all his other tyrannies, and for his being the oppressor of Europe? Does he wish LOUIS the 16th in torment for being the enemy of England, and helping to deprive us of America? Does he wish ALEXANDER's grandmother CATHERINE in dungeon or torment for usurping thrones, massacring Turks, and putting the defenders of their country in dungeons? Does he wish FREDERICK the Second whom he so often calls the Great in a dungeon for keeping Baron TRENCK in one, kidnapping his neighbours, and going to war, as he said, merely because he wanted something to do and to show off with? Does he wish the present King of NAPLES in a dungeon for the "murders" he committed at the yard-arm of Lord NELSON's ship? Does he wish to see the Emperor of AUSTRIA in a dungeon for telling the Italian Deputies, that he had conquered their country, and therefore it had no right to make any claims about freedom? Does he wish the King of PORTUGAL in a dungeon for being a fugitive at the very news of the coming of the French? Or LOUIS the 18th for being a fugitive before BONAPARTE himself almost alone? Or the King of PRUSSIA for seizing Colonel MASSENBACH in a neutral territory, and not bringing him to a public trial? Or any of the "legitimate" mighty wrongers of mankind, who have dungeoned,* wasted away, prisoned, assassinated, hacked and hewed, burnt, slaughtered, and massacred their fellow-creatures, some by twos and threes, some by tens, some by hundreds and tens of hundreds? Not he; and why? Because their fathers and grandfathers were "mighty wrongers before them." One mighty wronger is a very shocking personage, especially if he has any great qualities, such as helped him to get beyond his equals; but a succession of mighty wrongers,—behold the true and venerable arbiters of mankind, free to go where-soever, and to trample upon whomsoever, they please.

No, no: if this were the real question about BONAPARTE, we should be quite ready to meet his legitimate denouncers upon it impartially, and to bring all offenders to account before the just sense of mankind; it is a great desideratum in politics; but they would no more do this, than they would run their own hollow heads against a wall. BONAPARTE was born in an island, oppressed by these very men; his father was one of the gentlemen sent to make representations in its behalf at the French Court; the son was brought up at one of the military schools, founded by the legitimate to inculcate a knowledge and love of war; and so because a revolution came, which they helped to provoke into revenge and ambition, and he became too strong and great for his teachers, all the crimes of war and ambition are to be visited on his head,—their own crimes and their own inculcation!

It is too idle. But the wish for the dungeon still remains true and in full force. And indeed, of late, the writings of the Government hirelings have taken a turn of such extraordinary meanness and malignity, making against any one they please the most ridiculous and groundless charges, and attributing to them whatever they can imagine foulest, that an inevitable recoil takes place upon themselves; and people naturally ask what sort of self-knowledge that must be, which is so ready to believe the worst of others? We have known these persons call their betters worse than house-breakers, assassins, murderers, and God knows what else, with so gratuitous and scandalous a facility, that really at last, when we hear the avowed wishes of some of them, when we know the way in which a prisoner may be trampled upon, if it pleases his jailors to do so, and when we hear BONAPARTE openly attributing to them a wish to kill him by inches, we are at a loss, by their own manifestations of themselves, how to treat it as an impossibility. "His legacy," says the Courier, indeed, in another number, "is the only thing we wish to receive;" that is to say, the opprobrium of his death.

It is very loathsome to us to be driven, even by any trespass upon forbearance, to insinuate personal accusations. How many have been furnished us, our desks only know; and if we followed the example of some wretched men, we might degrade literature and ourselves week after week with scandals of them. But their own extravagancies help to give us a stronger sense of the falshood of these things in general. A thing boasted of however, and of a political nature, is somewhat different. Have our readers heard of a recommendation given in certain quarters, a little while after the Battle of Waterloo, to take BONAPARTE dead or alive,—but “dead, if possible?”

LETTER FROM MR. O'NEARA TO SIR HUDSON LOWE.

Longwood, April 19, 1818.

SIR,—According to your Excellency's directions, communicated to me yesterday by Major Gorrequer, I proceeded to Count Bertrand, and begged him, as I had not preserved a copy of the letter I had written to him on the 12th of this month, to lend it me for the purpose of taking a copy, which he did without the smallest hesitation. Indeed, a little before the interview which took place between him and Major Gorrequer, he asked me if I had any objections to my letter being shewn to Major Gorrequer, and he has since informed me that his intentions were, that he might either keep it or take a copy, as he had done with several other papers some days before.

For ten months your Excellency has several times manifested to me intentions to subject me to the same restrictions as the French prisoners, to which I have always refused to consent; and I must beg leave now to state, that your Excellency has not the right to do so, as Napoleon Bonaparte is not considered as a Prisoner of War, otherwise than by virtue of an Act of Parliament; and the other French (not even the domestics) are not named in the Bill, and could not be subjected to the restrictions which have been imposed on them, if they had not given their consent by a written engagement, the effect of which ceases at the moment of their option, as is clearly shewn by the recent departure of General Gourgaud; therefore still stronger reasons exist that an English subject cannot be submitted to such restrictions without a special and written consent on his part, to which I have always protested, and protest I will never agree to, as it would be signing the dishonour of the naval uniform, and would inevitably draw down upon me the contempt of the brother officers with whom I have the honour to serve. Therefore, in the natural state of things, neither your Excellency nor any other authority can subject me to restrictions contrary to the rights of an officer and the laws of England.

I have also had the honour to observe to you, that independent of the general guarantee of the laws, I had provided a private one in the stipulations which I had made in 1815, when Admiral Lord Keith, then commanding the Channel Fleet, in consequence of the request made to him by Count Bertrand that I should be attached to Napoleon, as Surgeon, in place of the French Surgeon whom the English Government had permitted to accompany him, authorized me to do so, I begged of his Lordship to give me an order in writing, which he declined doing.

I recollect perfectly well his answer, which was—“It is not in my power to order you to accept of it, as it is out of the naval service, and is a business altogether extraordinary, and must be voluntary on your part; but I, as Commander-in-Chief, will authorize you to accept of it, and I advise you most strongly to do so, as I am convinced the Government will be obliged to you, and it is a situation which may with propriety and honour be held by an Englishman.” Although it was impossible for me not to follow the advice of such a distinguished Officer, nevertheless I made some stipulations, viz.—that I should be at liberty to resign, should I find the situation not to be consonant to my wishes; that I should be borne upon the Navy List in my rank as Surgeon, with my time going on; that I should not be paid or considered as dependant upon Napoleon Bonaparte, but as a British Officer (and consequently not subject to any restrictions inflicted upon French prisoners); and I have repeatedly had the honour, verbally, to express to you, that sooner than consent to allow my rights as an English Officer to be violated, I would prefer giving in my resignation; and as you appeared to be struck with my observations and the stipulations which I had made with the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, I therefore concluded that you had given up all idea of putting them in execution. When, on the 12th of this month, I received instructions contrary to my natural rights, the stipulations I had made, and the protestations which I frequently made to yourself, which you caused to be sent to me, I immediately comprehended that it was merely a way of obliging me to quit Longwood. Delicacy, my duties as a medical man, and humanity, alike ordained that, prior to quitting, I should acquaint Napoleon Bonaparte with my intention, and I did so.

In neither the Army or Navy is it the custom, when any officer is desirous to resign, for him to first consult his Royal Highness the Duke of York, or the First Lord of the Admiralty, touching the propriety or otherwise of his doing so; the resignation tendered direct through the proper channels is always the first intimation; therefore, in sending my resignation to your Excellency without first consulting you, I was only acting according to the established customs of both services.

In writing the letter to Count Bertrand, I have not violated the respect which I owe to your Excellency as Head of the Government, as the question contained in it has been frequently agitated before. I have not violated the Act of Parliament, or any written restriction emanating from you. An inhabitant of Longwood, I have not been subjected to the restrictions imposed upon the inhabitants of the Island, either with respect to passes, as I live in the house, or as to communications, because for near three years communications, daily and nightly, verbally and in writing, having taken place between us. There is not a day passes that I do not see the French several times, very frequently by night; and not a week that I do not make written communications to both the masters and the servants upon medical and other subjects pertaining to physic.

I have not violated any written instructions, because I have never received any positive prohibition restraining the nature of my communications. In all the restrictions there was always a latitude, a kind of discretionary power allowed me, by stating, “that I was not ordered not to reply to Napoleon Bonaparte or to any of his family on any other subject not medical; that if I did so, the responsibility must rest upon myself; that I had not his authority for doing so.” Indeed, had a positive prohibition been given, to comply with it is evidently impracticable for any person in my situation; and as to the responsibility, I am content to bear the whole of it.

When frequently required to act in a manner which I conceived to be incompatible with my feelings and profession, and dishonourable to me, I have had the honour to demand clear and positive instructions in writing, in order that I might study, meditate upon, and execute them punctually; or, if I found any thing in them contrary to my conscience, to give in my resignation: I have never had any, except such as were worded in the manner I have described above.

For some months I have been made to lead a most wretched life, by your Excellency's obliging me to proceed to your house twice a week, reviling me, turning me out of doors in a most ignominious manner; once, indeed, having experienced every thing except personal violence, menaced by words and looks, because I did not choose to comply with verbal insinuations.

It is not for me, Sir, to pretend to remain in the situation against your will, but instead of receiving orders to that effect from the Right Hon. the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, means are taken to oblige me to quit, by attacks upon my rights and personal liberty; and for several days I have been oppressed, humiliated, and dishonoured; dishonoured as much as an Officer can be by an arbitrary act, and rendered by indignation nearly incapable of exercising my calling. I have therefore, Sir, the honour to demand from your Excellency—1st, Either the rescinding of your directions of the 10th of this month, and the privilege of exercising my functions at Longwood as I have done for near three years—2d, Or to accept the resignation which I wrote as soon as I found that I was assimilated to the French prisoners, and to allow me to proceed to England—3d, Or, if it is asserted that I have committed a crime, either in writing the enclosed letter to Count Bertrand, or by having done any thing else which I am ignorant of, and which your Excellency has not thought proper to communicate to me, or of not having complied with verbal and obscure directions, or of having in any wise violated the Act of Parliament, I demand to be, according to the provisions of that Act, transferred to England for trial before a competent Court. I further protest against any longer detention in the state of oppression in which I am, which, by rendering me incapable of following my professional avocations, necessitates my being speedily replaced at Longwood; and I appeal to the justice of the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty against the violation of the terms under which I accepted the situation.

I have the honour to be, Sir, with all possible respect,

Your Excellency's most obedient humble servant,

B. O'NEARA, Surgeon, Royal Navy.

To his Excellency Lieut.-Gen. Sir Hudson Lowe,

K.C.B. &c. &c. Governor.

FROM MR. O'NEARA TO MR. FERGUSON.

St. Helena, May 1, 1818.

MY DEAR SIR,—As it is probable that my removal from the situation which I now hold will, ere long, take place (which event, indeed, considering the manner in which I have been tormented and ill-treated for several months past, obviously and evidently with a view to oblige me to resign, is now desirable). I have thought it essential to my justification to forward to you the above letter (which was sent to the Governor the day it was written), and the other inclosures of my letters and the replies to them, in order that you, from whom I have received so many marks of friendship, and whose esteem and good opinion I prize so highly, may not be led to suppose, by any artful insinuations or misrepresentations, arising from malice, revenge, a dread of the truth's being made known in England, or even of mere mistake, that any improper or dishonourable conduct on my part has occasioned my removal from a situation, to which, whether considered in the light of novelty or delicacy, history offers no parallel. To you, one of my earliest and sincerest friends, I am bound to render this indispensable explanation; which obliges me to discontinue the secrecy which hitherto I have maintained, even with respect to my own situation upon this rock.

Believe me to be, my dear Sir,

Your most sincere and obliged friend,

To Wm. Ferguson, Esq.

BASSYL O'MEARA, Surgeon.

BRITISH CONDUCT IN INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE EXAMINER.

SIR,—While Reform is so much needed in the present system of Parliamentary Representation,—whilst we hear and are convinced of its necessity in our expenditure and finances, our morals, manners, and judicial proceedings,—I feel astonished that no one has noticed our conduct in the East Indies, and the reform necessary in our ferocious system there. In the absence of what is termed, in the slang of Ministers, official accounts, it is necessary to ground our remarks on intelligence derived from sources, perhaps more correct in the main, as to truth, but unsoftened by the artful colouring with which those concerned know how to disguise the real picture. It is obvious that I allude to our conduct in the island of Ceylon, and the indiscriminate massacres, even to extermination, that are said to be carrying on there. We are informed that the natives, young and old, of all classes and conditions, are dragged from their places of refuge, and hung and shot without mercy; and that the head and front of the offending for which this indiscriminate vengeance is inflicted appears to be nothing more than an attempt to shake off the yoke of foreigners. In short, that an endeavour of the natives to recover that which God and Nature gave them for an inheritance in common with the rest of mankind, has exposed them to horrors like those committed by the Spaniards in their conquest of Peru. In spite of the thousand falsehoods forged against the French Government during the reign of the Emperor Napoleon, by the agents of heaven-born Ministers,—in spite of the horrid atrocities of Frenchmen committed on those innocents the Prussians, Austrians, and Russians, during the four or five coalitions, in which these kind Powers endeavoured to benefit France, by affording her the comforts of legitimate rule, and the laws of her ancient tyrants,—there has been nothing even attributed to them of a worse character than the actions we are reported to have been committing in the East. Lured by thirst of gold, and by an ambition for aggrandisement, equal to that which has been displayed by any other nation,—an ambition not growing from successful efforts made in self-preservation, but springing from the most debased motive, the love of lucre,—how can we dare arraign the conduct of France or of any other country on the same score? Can that be a virtue in Asia which is a crime in Europe? or is the magnitude of the mischief the rule by which we judge, and because Ceylon contains only 800,000 inhabitants; are we licensed to slay and kill because we are the greater numerical power? If we look over Europe, and consider the extent of territory, and the number of human beings over whom the ambition of France bore rule, we shall find that the natives of the East who have been for a long time exposed to the mercy of the Agents of an English Company of Merchants, are more than equal. This Company and its agents have destroyed Sovereigns, rooted up Empires, plundered Princes, oppressed millions*; grasping at extent of empire and gold at the same moment, they have been charged, too truly I fear, with what humanity would shudder to hear. One of their agents, who was daily haunted with the stings of conscience, could no longer bear the load of life, but destroyed himself; Lord Clive†, if what is reported of him be true, was not over-blessed with the milk of human kindness; what must then have been the magnitude of the guilt that made him feel remorse! The monopolizers of rice in the midst of starving millions, in the midst of those who were dying around them for want of food, coolly calculated the profits of their villainies, and the objects they should attain in England from the wealth they were accumulating. One, perhaps, who had left England ragged and ignorant, counted on his extended estates and his legislative efforts on his return, saw coronets and titles dance in his mind's eye before him, and raised the staff of life another moiety, in the very centre of suffering and desolation. Yet the ambition of France, her Spanish invasion, her conduct in Prussia, &c. are daily sounded in our ears; and the Alien Act has been made permanent, to keep out of England her late agents in war and council, for fear, no doubt, of polluting British purity! What can more clearly prove the necessity of a reform in our ideas of justice and equity? Bad men trumpet forth the crimes of their enemies, and conceal their own. It becomes the duty of honest men to unmask them. Was the great political crime of Bonaparte, namely, the attack upon Spain, worse, or indeed half as bad, as the villanies of the execrable despots who partitioned Poland? Yet the British Rulers cared nothing about the fall of that ill-fated nation; they never interfered to save her!

As the public stock of knowledge encreases, public virtue will encrease also. In time, I trust, it will be seen whether such inconsistencies as are displayed by the Governments of christian nations will be allowed to exist by the people, and whether a thorough reformation must not take place in these respects. In regard to the accounts from the Island of Ceylon, they cannot be read by any feeling man without horror. It is strange that while England values herself at home on her freedom, she should be so careful not to dispense a particle of that blessing to any portion of territory that falls under her sway. In her colonies, almost without exception, the law is little more than the will of the governor, who is generally some favoured military man, fitted for any thing better than the office he holds. A free Constitution was said to have been given to the Ionian Islands; but it displays the cloven foot, and shews that the base aristocratical spirit which made war with France, and cursed our posterity with debts which it can never discharge,—a spirit as far from regarding the true interests of the nation, as governed by the law of reason,—still unhappily sways in our counsels in but a little less degree than in the old despotisms of the Continent.

* The young and innocent Princes of the House of Tippoo Saib are now languishing in dungeons, guarded by military, in a state of imprisonment that will end only with their lives. Can the cant of Englishmen about liberty be credited, when they thus destroy that of innocent persons whom they have conquered and oppressed—legitimate Princes too!—Perhaps this example in our eastern possessions furnished the Vienna Congress, or rather some members of it, with the idea of removing Bonaparte from Elba to St. Helena, and confining him for life, or as long as they might suffer him to live—a measure they have since effected in a way so honourable to the character of the English nation!—The usurper of the Carnatic and Omdut ul Omrah has scarcely a parallel for perfidiousness and iniquity in any annals.

When further news shall reach us from Ceylon, I may perhaps, Mr. Editor, again trouble you. I must conclude at present with hoping, that the period is not far distant when Englishmen will view the crimes of their own nation with as little indulgence as they view those of others. Let them picture North and South America, become one great nation, and taking possession of England as we have done of Ceylon; let them then fancy their families butchered, their estates wasted, and all the devastations of the savages of war let loose, for endeavouring to shake off a yoke which force alone had laid upon them, and then draw their conclusions.—I am, &c. FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JULY 18.—The most extraordinary reports have been for some time in circulation. They relate to a conspiracy so odious, to attempts of a nature so criminal, that we abstained from mentioning them to our readers, not wishing to hazard anything on so serious a subject. Machinations are spoken of, the success of which would have compromised the safety of the State, and the existence of a constitutional Government. We now learn with certainty, that 10 or 12 days since a procedure was instituted against the Sieurs de Chapedelaine, Marechal de Camp, on the retired list; Romilly, Chef d'Escadron; Songis, Staff Officer; and the Count de Juannis, a manufacturer of charcoal at Berci; who were arrested in pursuance of a Mandat of the Juge d'Instruction (M. Meslier). It is further said, that General Cannel has absconded from his residence, since which a Mandat has been issued against him. Seals have been put upon his papers, and witnesses examined. It appears that the conspiracy of which this instruction affords the details, must be classed with those political projects, in which we recognize rather fallacious hopes and guilty desires, than any real means of disturbing the order of things in France, established by a charter conformable to the general wish, and by a monarch friendly to liberty.—Journal de Commerce.

SPAIN.

IRON, JULY 2.—The news from Cadiz and Corunna is very serious, with respect to the depredations of insurgent privateers. There is a squadron consisting of six vessels on the coast, one of which carries 30 guns. It is said, that a frigate loaded with ingots and piastres has been taken a few days after she sailed from the Havannah.—Letters from Madrid give occasion to much uneasiness as to the state of our relations with North America; some even speak of war as inevitable. Our differences with the Court of Brazil are also far from being so completely arranged as we supposed they were.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

ASSIZES.

OXFORD.—MRS. BET BURRETT v. DIXON.—Mr. JERVIS said, the plaintiff was a widow, a very respectable woman, who for 20 years kept the White Hart Inn, in Henley-upon-Thames. The defendant was a young man, the son of a person in the same situation of life, his mother being the occupier of a still more considerable inn in the same town—he meant the Lion. The defendant's father showed the greatest kindness to the plaintiff's husband, and was frequently heard to declare his anxious desire that a nearer connexion might take place between the families. The husband of the plaintiff died about four years back; shortly before or after this event, the young lady in question, who had received a very elegant education, returned to her mother's house. She was at that time sixteen. Very soon after her return, she attracted the notice of the defendant, and he became extremely attached to her. He was received in the manner which his declarations demanded, and the plaintiff placed every confidence in him, whom she considered was to be the future husband of her daughter. Besides the inn the plaintiff kept, she was in possession of a farm, in a very retired situation, near Henley. To that farm she had frequent occasion to send her daughter, whose name was Tabitha. Upon these occasions the defendant was permitted to accompany her without scruple, as his views were supposed to be honourable. For 12 months he thus continued to visit and ride and walk with the object of his ardent affection. Upon one of those occasions he thought proper to make a very rude attack upon her person, and to assault her chastity. He was repulsed in a manner becoming the young lady; but having possessed himself of her affections, he succeeded in persuading her not to make a disclosure of what had taken place. Unfortunately, the young lady was prevailed upon to forgive this attack, and to keep its occurrence a secret from her friends. The event produced a degree of coolness for some time, till at length the defendant succeeded in gaining the complete possession of her person. The barriers of virtue being thus once broken down, the intercourse was repeated whenever the opportunity offered. These opportunities were very unfrequent, for there never was a more attentive mother to the honour of her children than the plaintiff. About six months after this sort of intercourse had commenced, a person of the name of Bullock, a half sister of the young lady, and daughter to the plaintiff by a former husband, happened to come to the house, and it was observed she attracted the notice of the defendant in a very particular manner. Miss Tabitha was present, and knowing what had passed between her and the defendant, was so shocked to see his attentions devoted to another, and more especially to her own half-sister, that she suddenly fainted and was carried out of the room. Her sister called the defendant into the garden, and charged him with having had a greater degree of intimacy with her sister than was consistent with propriety. This he denied, but declared upon his honour that his intentions were to marry her sister. Not satisfied with this, she taxed her sister, and stated her opinion, when, with considerable difficulty, she induced her to confess what had passed, upon an imprudent promise not to disclose it to her mother. Thus the plaintiff remained still in ignorance, and thinking the defendant had trifled with the feelings of her daughter, she desired him to discontinue his visits. At this time the mother of the defendant made some objection to the match. The moment the plaintiff heard of this, she wrote to the defendant, and forbade his future visits. The unhappy girl, however, still continued her intercourse with him in private, and he would now read a letter from the defendant to her. It was evidently an answer to a letter written by the young lady to him, and was thus worded:—

“DEAR TABITHA,—I am really half inclined to be angry with you for writing [and here he quoted a passage from her letter.] After what has passed, you can't love me so well as if I had not confided in you. Indeed, my dear Tabitha, I wish I was at liberty to convince you to the contrary [alluding probably to his not being in a situation to marry her.] I should wish to have five minutes' conversation with you alone. I hope you and Kitty are good friends.—Yours for ever, “Geo. Dixon.”

This allusion to Kitty referred to the fact of her not treating her sister so well after the discovery she had made as antecedently. After this the defendant continued to visit the house of the plaintiff occasionally, still keeping up his intercourse with the young lady, who was but 17 years of age, in private. The eldest daughter of the plaintiff, whom he would present to the Jury as a witness, married a young man of the name of Burford, who was in the same line of life, and was nephew to Mr. Coster, who horsed many of the stages upon these roads. Mr. Burford was the most intimate friend of the defendant, and felt it his duty to call upon him to know what were his intentions towards Miss Tabitha; when he declared them to be most honourable, and that he intended to marry her. After this he was admitted to visit as before, without any disclosure of passed events to the plaintiff. At last the situation of the young lady became such as to prevent further disguise. She became pregnant. In this situation of things it became necessary to send for Mr. Smith, the coach proprietor of Chelsea, near London, her guardian, who applied to the defendant to perform his promise; he, however, refused, declining to assign any reason for that refusal. In this stage of the business it was determined to see what could be got from his justice, and an action was instituted against him before the young lady was delivered. He ridiculed the action, and said he could pay the damages by going to prison for three months. She had since been delivered of a child. This was the nature of the case; and it might now be fairly asked what apology the defendant had to make for his perfidy? They were to be told, he understood, that the reason why he did not marry her was, because she had been unfaithful to him; because she had been a wanton. This was exactly the seducer's course; he first betrayed, and then traduced. This was to be expected; but who did they think was the person that was to prove this charge? Why Mrs. Bullock, her own half sister, who had excited her jealousy by the attentions which the defendant had paid her! He was told that Mrs. Bullock was to prove, that this young lady had permitted indecent familiarities from two common soldiers, and in the presence of the servants of the family too. He challenged her to come forward and state this, for he would confront her, not alone with the two soldiers themselves, whom he had in Court, but with every servant in the house; and if Mrs. Bullock was not struck to the ground by such evidence, he could only say she possessed more nerve than usually fell to the lot of her sex. These persons would all declare that they had never seen the slightest impropriety in the conduct of the young lady. With respect to the question of damages, he thought the Jury would, upon hearing the whole circumstances, feel them selves fully justified in giving to the plaintiff the whole sum claimed by the declaration, namely, 1,000*l*.

Here the Learned Judge, who had had some private conversation with the Counsel in the early part of the cause, again interposed, and it was agreed on all hands, that the justice of the case could be as well met by reference to a gentleman out of Court, as by a public examination, which must be alike disagreeable to both sides.—Mr. Jervis and Mr. Dauncey finally consented to refer the case to Mr. Peake.—The young lady whose conduct formed the subject of inquiry was put into the witnesses' box. She was well dressed, but did not exhibit any striking features of beauty or elegance. A verdict was then taken for 1,000*l*. subject to a reference.—The case had it been gone into in public, it was thought, would have produced some singular disclosures. At the Crown Bar there were 14 cases tried of no public interest.

YORK, JULY 16.—William Bailey, otherwise Knightson, aged 27, was charged with having administered poison with intent to kill Joseph Dodsworth, his brother-in-law.—(Our readers doubtless recollect the particulars of this case, which we gave at length when it was investigated before the Magistrates. The same clear evidence was now adduced.)—The Prisoner made no defence; but called several persons, who gave him a good character.—The Jury retired, and in a quarter of an hour returned and gave in their verdict—Guilty.—Mr. Justice BAILEY immediately proceeded to pronounce sentence. (The prisoner seeing this, dropt on his knees, and earnestly prayed for mercy.) His Lordship addressed him thus:—William Knightson, I pronounce your sentence thus early, that you may be assured that you can expect mercy from God alone. No doubt can exist on your case. (The convict muttered something.) It is impossible that such a crime as you have been convicted of can fail to be visited with the last punishment of the law. It was not done rashly and in heated blood. It was a cool, deliberate, and frequently repeated attempt to murder a man who had done you no injury. I hope this case will be a warning to all. Deeds of darkness generally, if not always, come to light. The law allows you more time to prepare for your awful end than could be given if your attempt had been successful. The sentence of the law is, that you be hanged by the neck till you are dead.—The Convict looked steadily in his Lordship's face during the time his Lordship was addressing him.—The Court was excessively crowded.

WINCHESTER, JULY 18.—Mr. Justice BURROUGH, having gone through the calendar, proceeded to pass the sentence of death upon the following persons, convicted for house-breaking, cattle-stealing, sheep and horse stealing:—Wm. Cooper, John Collier, Alex. Fabian, James Carter, John Biddlecomb, James Pink, James Holdaway, Thomas Ayres, George Gover, Stephen Framp-ton, John Smith, Samuel Robinson, Samuel Hidditch, William Rawlins, Henry Reynard, Nathaniel Carter, James Williams, William Benham, Harry Sherwood, Job Stanley, and George Carter, all of whom were reprimanded, except John Biddlecomb, Nathaniel Carter, and James Williams. The former has, for a series of years, lived in a cave in the New Forest, was the captain of a gang who kept the whole vicinage in terror; and many farmers have often put up with the depredations committed upon them, rather than expose themselves to personal danger, by an attempt to bring this desperado to justice. Some time since, it was strongly suspected that he had committed a highway robbery under very aggravated circumstances, and the officers of justice were despatched to apprehend him; he eluded their vigilance, however, and, as it afterwards turned out, took refuge in a wood near Salisbury, where, in a very remote spot, he erected a place to sleep in, and continued there for no less a period than five months! He was tried and convicted upon an indictment for a burglary committed in the month of September, 1817, in the house of Mr. John Bolton, at Highclere, and stealing therein several bank-notes, guineas, half-guineas, a gold ring, &c. Upon entering the house in question, the first person with whom he came in contact was the prosecutor, an aged man, of whom he demanded to know where his money was, but on being told he possessed none, the ruffian procured a large hay knife, and throwing the prosecutor down, put it to his throat, and with horrid imprecations, swore he would sever his head from his body if he did not afford him the information he required. Under this threat, the prosecutor was compelled to yield to his mandate. The Learned Judge, in passing sentence upon him, adverted to these circumstances in a very impressive manner, and conjured him, if he regarded an eternity hereafter, to devote that space of life he had remaining to penitence and prayer, in order, if possible, to obtain forgiveness from that just God whom he had so much offended. The unhappy delinquent appeared hardened and unconcerned, and on going into the goal, said to one of his female acquaintances, who was crying, "Why do'st not cry heartily, as my neck will be stretched this day fortnight."—Carter and Williams were convicted of stealing five sheep, and Mr. Justice BURROUGH observed, that the offence had become so general, not only in this, but in other counties, that it was the determination of those to whose lot the administration of the laws fell, to make public examples of offenders of this description. His Lordship entreated them to endeavour to obtain forgiveness by contrition and prayer, as he should most certainly leave them for execution, in order that they should be an example, and to deter others from the commission of similar offences.

CHELMSFORD, JULY 21.—SEDUCTION.—FITCH v. WING.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a butcher, residing at Helion Banstead, in this county, against the defendant, a master, of small property, for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, per quod servitium amisit.—The case was this:—The lady in question, a nymph of thirty-two, had received the addresses of the defendant for more than four years. The courtship had been carried on with much ardour, and she had been suffered to sit up with her lover after the families had retired to rest, and she admitted that reciprocal familiarities had taken place to almost every imaginable extent. These liberties, however, had passed after a promise of marriage; and the result of the amour being a fine boy, the present action was brought for its support, and the loss of its parents' services to her father.—The uncle of the lady being interrogated by Mr. GURNEY, as to the defendant's property, stated, he had no more in the world than the coat on his back.—Verdict for the plaintiff.—Damages 150*l*.

JULY 23.—SEDUCTION.—GROVE v. HARDMAN.—This was an action against the defendant for seducing the plaintiff's daughter. Mr. GURNEY stated the case. The plaintiff was a respectable farmer, now in decayed circumstances, residing at Warley; the defendant had been a Captain in the 10th Foot. The defendant, who was 40, some years since married a lady of considerable fortune, with whom, it seemed, he had lived for a short time, not in the most perfect state of felicity, for, after a cohabitation of a short duration, articles of separation were agreed upon, the lady being provided with a handsome separate maintenance, and the gentleman being left in possession of an elegant establishment. The plaintiff was the father of two daughters, but his means were so limited that he declined almost all intercourse with his more wealthy neighbours, although he had given his children a liberal education, and so much were his circumstances reduced, that his children had become his domestic servants. It appeared that the plaintiff, at the time of the unfortunate affair in question, was unknown to the defendant, and consequently neither had seen the other at their houses respectively. The unfortunate acquaintance which led to the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter commenced by the casual civilities arising from the lady and the defendant frequenting the same church. In the result an intimacy was formed, which ended in the seduction of Miss Grove, and the birth of a child. It was pressed as a circumstance of aggravation on the part of the defendant, that the seduction was effected at a time when the plaintiff's daughter was labouring under a state of mental derangement. In the statement of the case, it was admitted that before the acquaintanceship of the de-defendant with Miss Grove, the latter had the misfortune to experience an intercourse with another person, who had accomplished his object by violence. Criminal proceedings had been adopted towards that person, but the cause of injury having been compromised by a suitable compensation, those proceedings were dropped. This circumstance was conceded, as a matter of which the defendant might make the most in mitigation of damages, but the feature of the case which pressed most strongly against the latter, was, his having taken advantage of Miss Grove, at a time when she was labouring under mental derangement.

Miss Grove, who appeared to be a young woman bordering upon thirty, emaciated in person, and preserving few personal attractions, stated all the circumstances of the defendant's courtship, and her final ruin, which produced the birth of a child, now living.—On her cross-examination, she admitted that her first intercourse with the defendant was effected under very peculiar circumstances, too indelicate to mention. She stated, that on one occasion she received a pound note from the defendant in Church, and on another, that she received two bottles of Cape Madeira in the same place, which she afterwards drank in her own chamber.

Mr. MARRYATT addressed the Jury with considerable ability and emphasis, on the part of the defendant, contending, under the circumstances of the case, that there could be no difficulty in seducing a Lady who had gone through the ordeal of a previous violation, which had never been punished with the severity of the law.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 250*l*.

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, JULY 27.

THE BOURBON Court, finding that it could not hinder the news of the conspiracy from getting abroad, has at length let it transpire, though in as cautious and indifferent a manner as it could contrive. A few persons are named, of a subordinate description; and a trial is talked of; but so are trials talked of in other quarters and countries, and none take place, or the persons are allowed to escape. The funds have risen, fallen, and risen again, according to appearances at Court. The conspiracy is at all events reported to have been odious with regard to its object, as well as foolish in reference to its means; "which," says the Courier, "is pretty nearly the character we gave of it at first." Yes; with the pretty little exception of its being too foolish to exist at all.

In consequence of several outrages committed on the part of ships pretending to be authorized either by the King of SPAIN or the Independent Government in South America, a Circular Order has been issued to the Admirals on foreign stations, requiring them to seize such offenders in future, and send them in safe custody to any port, in England or elsewhere, competent to bring them to trial. This is very good and proper, if impartial justice is really to be done; but the wording of the order is worth attending to. It treats "his Catholic Majesty" with all due respect; whilst it even goes so far as to make a difference between his "dominions," and the provinces of Spanish America; but in speaking of the South American Governors, it calls them, in a strange language, "persons assuming to exercise the powers of government." Now in what light are admirals or other officers to consider any kind of commissions signed by persons thus described?—At all events, the South Americans are getting on;—they can talk as well as fight better than the doting pretenders to their soil, and we have no doubt will handle sword as well as pen unanswerably. We again express our hopes that the Chili Manifesto will be published as a pamphlet. The Courier meanwhile is "happy to observe; that the system of mutual instruction is expected shortly to be established in Madrid, whence it will necessarily diffuse itself over the whole of Spain. It is to be introduced," says our happy and lucky friend (for he would be equally "happy" if the King had forbidden it) under the patronage of the King, the enemy of all knowledge, according to the liberal judgment of a party who can never mention a crowned head without violating decorum." To say all knowledge is saying too much. His Majesty would no doubt extend a knowledge of the Lives of the Saints, the Art of Religious Embroidery, &c.; and the re-favoured Order of Jesuits is, in his opinion, to extend this blessed kind of learning. But no matter; any real means of knowledge put into the hands of the community is the first step to real knowledge of every kind, however intended. LÜTHER and CALVIN, in opposing the dogmas of the Papacy, cleared the way unwittingly for opposition to their own dogmas; and if mutual instruction be admitted into Spain, it will soon be too wise for the wretched creatures who defend the Inquisition and the Slave Trade, and who publish lists of prohibited books, including the Spectator!

We have received some New York Papers to the 20th ult. An article in the National Intelligencer states, that General JACKSON took possession of Pensacola on the 21st of May. It appears he made certain requisitions, which either were not or could not be complied with, and in consequence he carried the fortress by storm. If this account be correct, war is substantially declared against Spain by the United States; but we still think it probable the latter would not precipitately embark in such a contest, for she must know, that it would be more injurious to herself than her antagonist. That the acquisition of these territories is a favourite policy with the American Government, is known from facts, and might be inferred from circumstances. It would make the southern portion of the United States compact, while the different stations and harbours along the Mexican Gulph would be of incalculable advantage in a maritime point of view. The latter consideration, indeed, might suggest the propriety of England watching the progress of her trans-atlantic rival in this affair.—Courier.

The capture of Pensacola by storm is generally credited by the best informed American merchants in the City. The letters received yesterday give the intelligence without affecting any doubt on the subject. The British Consul at Philadelphia, on mentioning the news, states, that it is reported 500 American soldiers were killed or wounded in the assault.—It will be remembered that General JACKSON, in a dispatch which we inserted a few days ago, said, "I am now on my march to Pensacola, which place I shall probably have to occupy with an American garrison." If, therefore, the aggression has been committed, it was at least not an unforeseen difficulty; and assuming the fact to be as stated, which seems now hardly disputable, WAR MAY BE CONSIDERED AS ACTUALLY SUBSISTING BETWEEN SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.—Courier.—Saturday.

The same Paper adds,—“We have received an important letter from Spain, by which it appears that FERNAND having presided at several State Councils, in which the subject of the Spanish Colonies was agitated, Couriers were dispatched to several of the Allied Powers; there is little doubt but that they related in some measure to the occupation of the Floridas by the troops of the United States.”

The following (says the Courier) is an extract of a letter from Ceylon, dated March 1, 1818:—“The war in the interior seems to be spreading very much, and it is greatly feared that the English will be obliged to relinquish the conquest of Kandy, and be content with their old possessions.”

The number of New Members already returned to Parliament amounts to 123.

It seems, in spite of all that has been said, and all that has appeared, in proof of the necessity of appointing independent, impartial, and unbiassed Commissioners, under Mr. Brougham's Act, to inquire into the abuses of charitable establishments, that Ministers have been filling up the list with their own creatures. It is stated, by one of our Morning Newspapers, that some of them are nearly related to Noble Families, noted for their support of Government; others are themselves known as literary advocates of the Ministry; while the two gentlemen are passed over, whom the last Report of the Education Committee recommended earnestly to the notice of Parliament.

A Commission has just passed the Great Seal, appointing a Board to inquire into the means of preventing the Forgery of Bank Notes, to examine evidence, and to receive any plans that shall be offered. The Members are—Sir JOSEPH BANKS, Sir WM. CONGREVE, WM. COURTENAY, Esq. M.P., DAVIES GILBERT, Esq. M.P., JEREMIAH HARMAN, Esq. Governor of the Bank, WILLIAM HYDE WOLLASTON, M.D. and CHARLES HATCHETT, Esq. The first sitting took place on Tuesday last.

BANKRUPT SYSTEM.—In all cases where censure falls on a part of any profession, it is but justice to the other part of such profession to mention the individuals who are implicated in the charge of error or misconduct. We therefore feel it our duty to name the List of Commissioners in the case of Mr. CROWLEY. We understand it is the fourteenth List, which by the Calendar is composed of the five following gentlemen:—Griffin Wilson, Archibald Elijah Impey, Montague Farver Anstie, William Villers Surtees, (a relative of Lady Eldon) and Robert Grant, Esquires.—This list, we believe, has got the name of “the Committing List.” We may add, that the fourteenth List of Commissioners of Bankrupts is spoken of with some freedom in the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons on the Bankrupt Laws. The country is annually disgraced with 12 to 15 hundred Bankrupt Petitions, which are so many appeals to the Chancellor against the judgment of the Commissioners; and these, at an average of 20*l.* each on the latter number, occasion a transfer of 30,000*l.* per annum from the pockets of Creditors and persecuted Bankrupts, into the pockets of the Lawyers! The moral effect of this litigation is to create confusion and discord; and the commercial effect, to occasion discredit, and curb that honourable confidence and consideration which are the soul of trade. If Commissioners were better informed, or more attentive to their duty, will any reasonable man say, these appeals would come so often before the Court?—(A letter on the case of CROWLEY, in our next.)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER has granted a sum of 500*l.* for the relief of the inhabitants of the Scilly Islands. It is stated, however, by the Cornwall Gazette, that 1,000*l.* at least are necessary to satisfy their present urgent wants; and from 2,000*l.* to 3000*l.* to establish mackerel and pilchard fisheries, as the only measure of permanent support. The same paper strongly recommends the opening of subscriptions for that charitable purpose.

The prevalence of considerable differences of opinion on the subject of religion at Geneva was announced some time back. It appears by an article dated from thence the 9th instant, in one of the Paris Journals, that these differences had produced, in no small degree, riot and disturbance; a numerous mob assembling at the door of a house where the Puritans (as they are called) held their meetings, who insulted the persons attending them. A military force had in consequence been called out to preserve tranquillity.

THE WEATHER.—The average of six Thermometers in the Sun, at two o'clock, on Friday, was 114 deg. FAHRENHEIT, or two degrees above fever heat. Thermometer in the shade, northern aspect, 87; ditto southern aspect, 88.

The Duke and Duchess of CUMBERLAND have left England for Germany. Her MAJESTY continued to the last in her resolution not to see her Daughter-in-law.

The QUEEN, it is said, is getting better.

On the 15th inst. the Bishop of LINCOLN confirmed the young people of Spalding and other parishes in the district, amounting to between eight and 900: one of whom was afterwards sent to prison for drunkenness and riotous conduct.

Mr. Burr's period of confinement will expire on the 23d of next September.

The Nottingham Review says,—"Two handsome and commodious chapels have been recently erected at Birmingham, one belonging to the Wesleyan, the other to the Primitive Methodists, commonly called Ranters."—An announcement of the "deservedly far-famed Indian Jugglers" immediately follows this theological notice.

A Neapolitan artist has succeeded, by means of address and patience, in detaching three beautiful frescoes of DOMINICHI from the damp walls of the Palace Farnese, and affixing them to canvas, whereby they will be no longer exposed to the same danger of destruction.

The Wheat harvest has already commenced in this neighbourhood, and in various parts of the county, and farmers are with cheerfulness looking forward to a golden harvest. A season more favourable to the growth of wheat was never experienced. The quality, from present appearances, must be excellent, and the quantity most abundant.—Bath Chronicle.

The Leeds Mercury announces, "that the late Dr. PRIESTLEY has a venerable brother now living in the village of Birstall, and that his circumstances are very far from being comfortable. He is himself a man of most excellent character, and his situation is rendered more deplorable by the severe illness of his wife, to whom he has been married upwards of fifty years."

The late Judge ROOKE, in going the Western Circuit, had a great stone thrown at his head, but, from the circumstance of his stooping very much, it passed over him. "You see," said he, good-humouredly, to a friend, "if I had been an upright Judge, I might have been killed!"

PUFF EXTRAORDINARY.—In a shop-window in Saffron-hill, is posted up a bill, of which the following is an exact copy:—"Fresh eggs laid every morning by me, Patrick Murphy."

The Courier has entered into a laboured defence of the humane and sensitive Mr. Huggins.—Its ground of objection to inquiry—Catch it, ye winds!—the impropriety of disputing the verdict of a Jury—Och Hone! But the admissions of this curious document form the principal curiosity. It appears that the two pilfering slaves were flogged by their own father—no fault of Mr. Huggins, says the Courier, mildly, for if he had known it, he would have been aware that the father would have spared the flesh of his children. Neither did he know that the two girls were related to the offenders for whom they so unnaturally wept. Very excellent all this! Fathers may be ordered to flog their own children and Sisters be flogged for weeping for brothers, and no one be acquainted with the relationship, a fact, which we suppose is to be accepted as a proof of the great interest taken by Masters in their Slaves. Such cases are doubtless unfrequent; but that they exist at all, perfectly vindicates the watchfulness of the African Society. As to Mr. Huggins, let him consign over a hog's-head of Sugar to the Courier Office, and request the Editor to be silent.—Chester Guardian.

Both Houses of Parliament are now undergoing the decorative repairs of painting and white-washing. In the House of Commons a new stair, leading from the upper-lobby to the gallery, and parallel to the former, has been constructed; and an additional small door has been opened in the centre of the gallery, for the accommodation of the gentlemen who attend to report the debates.

FARRINGDON WITHOUT WARD.—On Friday, the election of an Alderman for the above Ward, in the room of Sir CHARLES PRICE deceased, came on in St. Bride's Church, the Lord Mayor in the Chair.—Mr. Deputy HERRING, in a short speech, proposed Mr. ROBERT WATTHMAN, as a fit person for the office, which was seconded by Mr. REEVES, and unanimously carried. The Church was crowded extremely.—Mr. WATTHMAN returned thanks in an appropriate speech, and hoped his future conduct would be such as would merit a continuance of that friendship they had so uniformly shewn for the last 22 years.—A motion was then put by Mr. THOMPSON, and unanimously adopted, expressive of the high respect the meeting had for their late Alderman.

DEAR Shade—if injur'd Spirits wander near
The cold Couch where their Victim-forms recline,
Oh come at ev'nings twilight hour, and hear
And breathe thy last farewell to me on thine—
For here I sit and think at day's decline—
Thy early bloom—sweet hours—for ever gone—
So mild—so tender—e'er thou did'st resign
Thy whole heart up to Passion's thrill alone—
All lov'd and mortgag'd thee, hapless youth, save one!

And she was all to thee—till thou to her
Wert mock'ry's sport—so sad and so subdued—
As wanton winds the stealing lock bestir,
She took and toss'd thee from her bosom rude—
The reel of triumph met the eye that woo'd—
Ungentle Conquerer; when the prize was won,
To break the bruised reed!—'twas then we view'd
Thy gentleness—thy reason—all undone—
All mourn—for all did love thee—all—saye one!

THEATRICAL EXAMINER.

No. 329.

HAYMARKET-THEATRE.

THIS pleasant little theatre opened for the season on Wednesday week. It has been cleaned and whitened up; and the audience not being crowded though numerous, it really felt cool. We were always struck with the great sense of snugness in this house, though its performances are confined to the summer-time; but we enjoyed it with too summer-like a satisfaction to care for enquiring into the cause, which however is undoubtedly this;—that the stage running a good way to meet the spectators, and the boxes coming with an open look down to their very sides, there is a feeling of sociality produced, like sitting in a private assembly.

The performances of the first night were the Poor Gentleman, Blue Devils, and A Day after the Wedding; and we never saw three pieces run merrier on their wheels. Our old friend Blue Devils has a most excellent moral in his hips; and the Day after the Wedding a still better one. At least it is more generally useful. And we do not know how it was, whether in the new and smiling look of this old summer-house, or in the summer itself (which, by the way, is a new and glorious ally for the theories of this paper), or in ourselves whom the summer-time laps up in enjoyment; but we never saw the actors to such advantage before. They all seemed inspired, down to the very square toes of old house-keepers. JONES was never in finer butterfly condition; Mrs. GIBBS looked young again, especially as she is one of those who will never be truly old; TERRY was very merry, after his crab-stick fashion, and very feeling nevertheless; TOKELY gave a touch or two of very quiet and natural pathos in the old Corporal in the Poor Gentleman;—the old innkeeper in Blue Devils looked Frenchified and staring to his very side-curls, and at least deserves to have his name mentioned in the play-bills: there were two new performers of considerable merit; Mrs. DAVENPORT digged at us with her syllables to more than usual purpose, and pronounced the name Mac Tab like two stabs of a dagger;—and what do you think happened to our gentlemanly though somewhat stiff friend Mr. BARNARD? Why, at one part of the play, where he hears of good news, he absolutely took three jumps into the air,—three positive ascending jumps! The last accounts of him are promising.

One of the new performers on this occasion was a young lady of the name of BRANCHARD, who performed once before for a benefit of the actor of that name, and is supposed to be his relation. Young lady she may well be called, for we never saw more gentle, unaffected, and interesting manners. She is not perhaps very handsome, or very strikingly made; yet she is far from being either plain or awkward; her countenance is pleasing and intelligent, and she carries herself with that kind of submissive and retiring yet self-possessed air, which creates at once a wish to pursue and to respect. Her performance may be imagined accordingly. It was remarkable chiefly for propriety and femineness. Nor are these kind of performers ever likely perhaps to become eminent on the stage, though highly useful as well as pleasing; for the stage and its exhibitions carry with them something opposite to their natures, or at least habits; and it is only genius, which with a still higher utility can at once perform and sanction something apparently contradictory to those.

The new actor in Ollapod was a Mr. J. RUSSELL, from Scotland. He is a shrewd goodish looking man, with a longish face and sparkling eyes. (These ishes, by the way, are very modest and useful, and we recommend them to the peremptory critic, as at once proper and authorized, being good old Saxon English.) His performance was on the upper side of what is called respectable,—that is to say, the next to something a good deal better. He seemed to understand his part well, and gave it all which a commonly intelligent reader would fancy in perusing the part; and we suspect that he would be still better in a character which required less practical vivacity,—less written for such actors as FAWCETT. Some of his varieties of emphasis, when he repeated his usual applause at the imaginary good things of those he conversed with, were extremely judicious and knowing; and the difficulty with which he brought out the information of his being an apothecary, in the scene with the old maid of quality, was excellent, and well accompanied with little forward and then retiring flutters, and an uneasy twirling of his cane upon the floor: but his tones are too grave and clergyman-like for such parts as these, and he wanted altogether pertness and volubility. He was encored in the Cosmetic Song, to the great honour of the good-nature of the audience; but as one of the daily papers said, he has a better voice and a worse talent at this sort of thing than any other comedian.

We must not forget to notice on this occasion a performer whom we do not remember to have seen before, and who acted the blunt old confidential servant of Sir Robert Bramble in a manner which we do not hesitate to call admirable. The down-cornered fixed mouth, the up-staring but not impudent eye, the quiet waiting demeanour with the hands crossed, the plain Chelsea-pensioner sort of garb, and the apparently toothless yet stout voice, were all in the very highest and most real style of what you might imagine of such a character.

LYCEUM.
We have not left ourselves time or room to give such an account as we could wish of the Lyceum. We can only briefly mention, that the manager has added to his performers Miss CAREW, a very mild yet effective singer, with a pleasing carriage, and fluty kind of voice;—that she and Miss KELLY, and Mr. PEARMAN, not omitting Mr. BROADHURST who is one of the best acting singers we have, make the pleasant pastoral opera of Rosina go off excellently well;—that the new farce of the Bull's Head is not worth much, though the misplaced Ws and Hs of the cockney in it, and the persecutions he endures from the waiter at dinner, are laughable;—that Perouse is very well got up, and exhibits to advantage our new stage friends the Americans, whose quaint barbarities we have yet to describe; and lastly, that the saloon is a considerable improvement upon the good idea of last year, and has two fountains which at least seem to refresh the trees as well as spectators. The sight is certainly very pretty, and the sound very refreshing; but is there no way of keeping these trees a little better alive? We like them so much, that we really cannot help feeling for their thirsty hearts, albeit of deal-board.

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

"Thou see'st thou neither art mark'd out nor nam'd,
And therefore only to thyself art sham'd;
Now if thou stir'st at best thou shalt but make
The country of thy faults more knowledge take."

G. WITNER'S Abuses Stript and Whipt.

No. 1.—ON THE DECLINE OF ELOQUENCE AT THE ENGLISH BAR.

In commencing a series of critical articles upon the various qualifications of those who practise as Advocates in our Courts of Justice, it is far from my intention to controvert the general opinion, that within the last 20, or even within the last 10 years, the eloquence for which the English Bar was once so celebrated has greatly declined: on the contrary, it is my wish in the outset to advert to a few of the causes which I think have led almost to its banishment. Men who possess many of the most important requisites of accomplished orators are not wanting, nor are the occasions few on which they might display their powers. Among the younger members of the profession there are several of distinguished talents in this kind; and from the seniors, bursts of energy and feeling are sometimes heard, and not unfrequently a very successful employment of the better or, at least, the more useful parts of eloquence. Compared however with a remoter period, the instances are rare, and serve principally to shew, that did Advocates yield more to their natural impulses, and less to the trammels by which circumstances have surrounded them, they might restore the Bar to something like the rank it formerly held in public estimation.

Fathers of families, and particularly those tolerably advanced in life, are often heard to assert, that the only profession in this country, where talents can ensure success, is THE LAW. If they mean talents of a popular kind—the power of giving effect to comprehensive views of justice and the bonds of society—a command of language, and a faculty of bringing to bear upon one point all the resources of intellect and knowledge, they are mistaken: they speak from former experience, not from present observation—from a recollection of what they have witnessed at an early age, without being aware, that since that time the employment of a Barrister has almost completely changed. They refer to the days of MINGAY and ERSKINE—not to those of MARRYAT and BELL;—to the time when Juries were wrought upon by the united influence of zeal and talent, not when they were governed by precedents and practice—when men were allowed to feel a little as well as to think a great deal, and were not required for ever to shut up their hearts in the dark recesses of their understandings.

With regard to the tedious and often unmeaning forms of the law, there perhaps never was a time when the shrewd satire of RABELAIS upon the proceedings of Courts of Justice could be better applied than at the present moment—all the learned arguments, all the citations from books, applicable and inapplicable—all the references to the dicta and to the decisions of Judges, according to his humorous account, terminate but in the casting of a die; from which he intends it to be inferred, that while learning and industry are exhausted and wasted on the means, they are perfectly useless as to the end.—In making this reference, no imputation is of course intended to be cast upon the decisions in our Courts: in indifferent causes, the determinations are indifferent; but justice would be quite as faithfully and much more speedily and effectually administered, if the greater part of the expensive forms, processes, and pleadings, so recently enlarged, if not introduced, and so carefully observed, were entirely disregarded:—it is not too much to assert, that one fifth of the causes that come before our Courts are decided upon mere matters of form, without the slightest reference to the merits. So much have they been multiplied of late years, that a new branch of the profession has actually sprung out of them—the business of a Special Pleader:—a young man who studies for the Bar is now compelled to go through all the complicated drudgery of the office of one of these underlings* before he is qualified for any higher walk:—all the knowledge he has acquired, in twenty years at school and college, is thrown away; general principles and enlarged notions of law and justice are smothered in laborious and absurd technicalities; and the enervated mind becomes gradually so accustomed to these shackles, that the endurance of them amounts to a habit: they not only cease to seem burdensome, but cease to be so; for instances are not unfrequent, where the natural vigour of the intellect has been so reduced as to make it even depend upon its bondage—as emaciated TRENCCK is said at last to have received support from the very chains that fixed him to the walls of his dungeon.

A second cause, no doubt, is the vast accumulation of business within the last few years, which has necessarily compelled advocates, even of high talents and attainments, to be contented with the appellation of mere men of business: the number of actions tried in the Court of King's Bench has of late nearly doubled, while, generally speaking, the management of them is entrusted to four King's Counsel, and to about twice as many assistants behind the Bar. At the last sittings at Guildhall, more than two hundred suits stood for decision, and the time that could be allowed for hearing the whole was at the utmost fifteen days; so that as the Court usually sat for only six hours each day, supposing them all tried, there would be less than half an hour for the determination of each cause, a space much less than was formerly occupied by the opening speech of a Counsel. This calculation is however by no means fair, because, perhaps not more than half, or at most two-thirds, of these actions came before a Jury. Besides, in the other Courts, and especially in the Common Pleas, the business has not increased in the same proportion.

But independently of these two considerations, which may perhaps be thought of comparatively minor importance, I do not scruple to say, that the present dearth of eloquence at the English Bar is chiefly to be attributed, on the one hand, to a depressing spirit in the Court, and, on the other, to a submissive spirit in the Counsel. "Pack-bearing patience" is quite as indispensable a requisite for a Barrister, if emolument be his object, as a knowledge of the laws of his country. Young men who start on their career, who have just mounted their wig and gown, of late years have obtained practice not by any extraordinary display of the energies of mind or language in resisting oppression and vindicating those who have been falsely accused, nor by an exhibition of penetration or acuteness in discovering and extracting truth from reluctant witnesses; but, generally, by the publication of some treatise upon a particular branch of the law, or by a volume of reports of decided cases, accompanied by a fulsome dedication to an individual, who has the means of advancing them in their progress by smiling upon their labours. This is what is termed "obtaining the ear of the Court;" this is — "that trick of Courts, to wear

"Silk at the cost of flattery;"

James Shirley's Poems.

for by such means not a few have risen to the highest rank and highest emoluments of their profession; for prudent Attornies are sure to employ those who are sure to be heard with most indulgence. The undaunted and repeated refusal of ERSKINE to discontinue an address he felt it his duty to make, when imperiously commanded by a haughty Judge to sit down, is not yet, and we hope will never be, forgotten; it has illustrated him and his successors more than the patrician robes by which he has been since invested; but let me ask, has it ever been imitated, or who would have dared to imitate such a fearless discharge of duty, had the necessity occurred? The blunt fortitude of honest JACK LEE, (as he was familiarly called) and others whom we could name, is also still remembered—but only remembered apparently to be avoided.—It would be unfair however not to allow, that some part of the business-like, mechanical mode, in which causes have been recently conducted, is to be attributed to a reluctance on the part of the Court, that any imposition, or attempt at imposition, should be practised on the Jury. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of the Court of King's Bench is a man of a strong and piercing intellect, and of uncommon powers of language: he often penetrates to the very bottom of a cause, when others, even the Counsel themselves, are only upon the surface. His intuition in this respect is astonishing, and he cannot endure that valuable time should be wasted in endeavouring to deceive the good sense of a Jury, or on preliminary or immaterial points, while the true and only question is disregarded or forgotten. This indeed is one source of the ordinary complaint against LORD ELLENBOROUGH (more especially by young Barristers) that he is hasty and severe—that he will not listen with becoming patience and forbearance: he certainly often will not: it is however but doing his Lordship justice to add, that in many cases those who are forcing themselves upon his attention have no right to complain of more than perhaps a needless degree of rudeness, in the manner in which they are interrupted or repulsed. I am no admirer of the general deportment of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, either on or off the Bench; but it is not unfrequently a very useful lesson, and a very fine display of power, to witness the manner in which he drives directly onward to the just end of a cause—like a mighty elephant in a forest, trampling down the low brushwood under his feet, and tearing away all the minor branches that obstruct his impetuous progress.

* Their business is called practising under the Bar, and two or three years are scarcely sufficient for the acquirement of the intricacies, not to say chicanery, of this department.

It cannot however be denied, that there is a servile and a crouching spirit in the Bar towards the Bench, inconsistent with the equality on which all gentlemen are placed, and with the liberal nature of their early education and attainments. It may perhaps be conceded, that a small portion of this subserviency may arise among the younger Barristers, from timidity or misapprehension, without attributing it to a baser motive; but in causes of importance, more especially where political questions are involved, where the reputation or the liberty of an individual is concerned, it is impossible to trust to them; they will not speak out with decision and fearlessness, for the consequences of doing so stare them full in the face; they therefore shrink from the performance of their duty, and rather abandon a man to a dungeon than abandon their own hopes of success in their profession*. None of them seem to think that any thing can be got by a straight-backed though a respectful and decorous demeanour; and it cannot but excite a melancholy feeling, when we see so many young men every term flocking from our Universities to our Courts, to embrace a profession that requires such a perversion and prostration of intellect,—such a deadness to the most generous impulses of our nature, and such a desertion of all dignity and independence of spirit. Not that the Bench should not be treated with all becoming deference, but there is a deference due to ourselves and to the cause of truth and justice. When HONE, in the course of his late trials, asserted that there was not a single Counsel who would venture to support his own conscientious conviction against the opinion of a presiding Judge,—I will venture to say that there was not a single Barrister present, whose hollow bosom did not echo the sentence, and silently admit its truth!

How this state of things must make us long to see some gifted and high-hearted spirit rise from among the submissive crowd of wigs and gowns, to vindicate his profession, and prove that a great respect and veneration for the Judges of the land is consistent with a greater respect and veneration for his own independence of mind, and for the sacred principles of truth and impartiality!

It is necessary to apologise for postponing, until next week, the discussion of the merits of Mr. SCARLETT: the preliminary remarks have occupied a larger space than was originally intended or expected.

AMICUS CURLE.

* This remark is general: what exceptions may be made to it, and how far they will apply, we shall have an opportunity of stating, when we speak of individuals who, on particular occasions, have shewn more or less fortitude.

FINE ARTS.

MR. NEALE'S WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

WE had the pleasure of assisting to introduce this work to the public on its first appearance, since which it has attained half its intended growth, forming a large quarto volume of six parts, each with 40 letter-press pages, two etchings, and three finished plates. The beautifully printed pages are full of architectural and ecclesiastical information relative to the Abbey, brought together in an apt manner by Mr. BRAYLEY. The etchings and finished plates are of the first order of their class of Engravings. Were there a National Gallery of Engravings, which there ought to be, as well as another of Paintings, these Etchings and Engravings would deservedly have a station in it, as will the entire volumes, we trust, in our public libraries. Such beautiful works as this, so honourable to the assiduity and the talent of Mr. NEALE, the designer and proprietor, and to the other Artists, are not, in their multiplication on the eye of the man of taste, among the least of the substantial pleasures of life, for they are derived from Nature, the great store-house of those pleasures. Genuine Art, like Nature, its divinely wrought original, gives too a continued as well as fervid pleasure. We inspect engravings, paintings, sculptures, and architectural edifices, with repeated delight. We are never tired in looking at such prints as the Death of Wolf, or the Carbons, or PIRANESI'S Ruins, as they hang in our rooms, or as we turn them over anew in our folios. A genuine and continued gratification like this is produced by such Architectural Engravings of Gothic Architecture as are now before us, because they give us that elegant and pensive pleasure which is the element of those features of Nature, of which they are the refined imitations. They are in fact the more ordered arrangement of those forms which so solemnly strike us in the overhanging and meeting arcade of trees, in their green alleys, and outspreading arms, and such as what are homogeneous with that love of order, and of the various and vast, implanted in our minds. On these accounts, we are delighted with the immensely lifted roof of the Abbey, and its regular and diverse lines, either analagous or contrasted, curved or strait, parallel or intersecting. There are besides various moral associations of thought that mix up with these pleasures of the imagination in such venerable places; such as their being the depositories of the ashes and partly of the fame of the renowned, their bringing to our remembrance the respected and loved of our departed fellow-creatures, their reminding us of our own eventual destiny, and a crowd of solemn musings, peculiar to these still and stony sequestrations. On all these accounts, these fine Engravings are morally and tastefully valuable. They affect the heart—they stir up the fancy. But the beautiful and every way proper manner in which they are wrought, completes the recommendation. Thus the character of stone, corroded with the tooth of time, is seen with true effect in The Screen of Abbot Islip's Chapel, the View from the Chapel of St. Edmund by Mr. SANDS, the Ornamental Sculpture and Capitals by Miss E. BURNE, the Monument of William de Valence by Mr. ARMSTRONG, and the Ancient Shields by Mr. ROFFE, whose Elevations and Sections, after the Admeasurements of Mr. THOMPSON, are exemplarily neat and exact. The precision and richness of Mr. SANDS's etching tool is singularly favourable to the final development of a forcible Engraving. It was the very advanced and well-drawn Etchings of BROWN that materially contributed to the beauty and celebrity of WOOLLET's Engravings, though the latter lost in the working up, by a kind of metallic stiffness of style, more than he ought of the freedom of BROWN's etching—so much so, that we confess that we prefer the best Engravings of VIVARES, who was a delightful etcher of landscape, with all their comparative roughness, to the best of WOOLLET's. But Mr. SANDS preserves as much as possible the fluent play of his etching needle, with the full effect of the Engraving. This is seen in the View of Poets' Corner looking south, and View from the Chapel of St. Edmund. He wants, we think, a little more diversity of aerial perspective.—Mr. NEALE's judicious employment of the best Engravers affords us an opportunity of praising the remarkably various powers of Mr. J. SCOTT, who we here find shines in Architectural Engraving, as well as in Landscape, Animals, &c. Mr. WOOLNOTH appears to more advantage in his latter Engravings, were it only from his having omitted those cross lines, which deteriorated the stony character in his former plates. But how, without appearing enthusiastic, shall we speak of the Messrs. LE KRAEX. It would be scarcely too eulogistic to say, that they are a phenomenon in this class of Art, and that they are without fault. They have reached that most difficult point in their Art, of uniting the greatest possible refinement with perfect freedom of execution, for their most finished works, and none can be more finished, have all the multiplied touchiness and unconstrained manner of the completest Etchings. They give us the Poetry of their Art, for they affect our minds in a similar way with the real objects, because what they represent is so decisively the look of those objects, either of sharpness or mistiness, of nearness or distance, of smooth or rough, of plain or enriched, of preservation or decay, of illumination or shade, of wood or stone, of height, length, and breadth, that the eye, one of the prime outlets to the mind of the causes of perception, recognizes with almost as much exactness as in the reality, the objects which in the reality raise those perceptions.

The Casts sent as a private present to the President of the Academy at Petersburg, M. OLENIN, by Mr. HAYDON, have arrived safely, and been received by the Russian Artists with the most unbounded enthusiasm—indeed they were never more ardently spoken of in this country. The first shipment of the great body of casts for the Russian Academy are on their passage.

COURT VENGEANCE—MR. JOHN WILLOCK.

"There is a generation, whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw-teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men."—Proverbs, chap. xxx. v. 44.

Brompton, Wednesday.

MR. EXAMINER.—I beg permission to send you the following further instance of Ministerial depravity, which is alike conspicuous for its imbecility as for its consistency in tyrannical cruelty. In revenge for the daring insult offered to Ministers by the independent Electors of Westminster, in rejecting the Court hireling, warrants of distress for unpaid Taxes in St. James's have been issued against those who had courage to vote for men who are able and willing to check (if possible) the grasping rapacity of a worthless Administration. One collector had, on one day last week, from 40 to 50 warrants against so many who had given plumpers to Sir F. Burdett, and who consequently have fallen victims to their independence and integrity.

It will swell the grievous tide of lamentation, and exasperate the indignation of many a feeling heart, to learn that these warrants were signed by Mr. W—*, who sat as Chairman on the Government Committee. Would the Candidate for Court favour have used an enemy thus, even if he had struck his colours?—Your's, faithfully,

AN ADMIRER OF THE EXAMINER.

* If Mr. Willock, of Golden-square, "landsurveyor, auctioneer, and sworn appraiser," be the Magistrate here alluded to, we can readily believe him to be capable of lending his aid to any such legal vengeance. The political conduct of this individual has excited the surprise of some, who well recollect how noisy and bustling he was, some years back, while, tricked out in a livery of blue and buff, he was employing his unsolicited exertions in favour of "Fox and Liberty."—But what is there at all surprising in such changes? Men even of respectable families, possessing both accomplishments and talents, when assailed by the temptations of wealth and power, have too often abandoned their political principles. There can be nothing therefore remarkable in the tergiversations of such a man as Mr. Willock, whose parents, being in the humblest rank of society, could not be expected to give him any very high notions of independence or consistency. What perhaps may seem a little singular in Mr. Willock, is his want of sympathy with the plebeian class from which he sprang. If indeed he himself possessed any powers not belonging in common to the mere vulgar, (high and low)—if he were master of anything like humour, or wit, or eloquence—or real talents indeed of any kind—then there might be some reason, however inadequate, for his giving himself airs of patronage and superiority. But as it is,—enjoying from nature, as he does, a very moderate capacity, and not having received from the hands of benevolence anything but an extremely limited education, it is not a little ludicrous to see him aping the manners of gentlemen, and thrusting himself forward in matters of public importance. Mr. Willock has doubtless been a very industrious person, and he should learn to be content with the possession of the full advantages of his industry. His understanding and his acquirements enable him, we dare say, to measure and put a proper value upon an estate, and even to dilate in his pulpit, in English intelligible to the brokers, on the superior merits of "a four-post bedstead, with green morine furniture, lines, laths, and tassels;" but much beyond this, we humbly opine, Mr. John Willock should not soar; for in matters of science, the fine arts, or literature, we are greatly in error if he be not deplorably deficient. Indeed, the writer of this note once heard him sell some books, the titles of which this would-be Orator and Statesman most sadly mangled—though, to say the truth, on this occasion he seemed himself rather conscious of his defects. Why, then, should he thus assume the character of a politician—and, above all, why, in his old age, should he be so fierce in his persecution of principles, which he for years endeavoured to make triumphant?—However painful in the exercise at times, there is in real power, whether intellectual or physical, always something that commands respect. It may be bad enough, to be sure, to be torn to pieces by the King of beasts; yet in his bristled mane, his lashed tail, the glare of his eye, his loud roar and animated spring, we recognize a noble enemy, to whom we may submit without disgrace. But to be pushed down and trampled to death by one of the dull, plodding, braying, long-eared tribe, is equally fatal, and so superlatively mortifying, that the very idea only excites ones scorn.

LAW.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Monday, July 20.

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.—CASE OF THE BANKRUPT CRAWLEY.

This was an application for a writ of Habeas Corpus, to discharge the bankrupt out of custody; the motion had been opposed on the ground that there existed no power in the Lord Chancellor to grant writs of Habeas Corpus in the vacation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he should now proceed to declare the opinion he had formed, after a very long and laborious examination. The maxim of the law was, that the writ of Habeas Corpus was a very high prerogative inherent in the Crown, by which the King had the right of inquiring into the cause why any of his subjects were deprived of their liberties. The first authority to which he should refer was that of Lord Coke, who, in his Readings upon Magna Charta, had declared that the Court of Chancery had the right of issuing writs of Habeas Corpus, in the vacation as well as in Term-time; giving as his reason, that this Court was officina justitiæ, and was never adjourned. Lord Coke also took notice of this power of the Court, and observed that "this Court is the rather always open;" and gave the special reason, that if a man be wrongfully imprisoned in the vacation, the Lord Chancellor might do him justice. Neither the Court of King's Bench nor the Common Pleas could grant writs of Habeas Corpus out of Term, but the Court of Chancery could grant them at any time. His Lordship here noticed various other high legal opinions, and then proceeded to state, that previous to the restoration, the instances were very rare indeed of any writs of Habeas Corpus being issued by the Judges of the King's Bench in vacation; and it was quite clear that, until Borchell's case, the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas had no idea that they had any power to issue Habeas Corpus in criminal matters in term time; and until the statute 32 Car. II. had passed, they had no power of issuing any writ of that nature out of term. If, therefore, he found in these judicial writers not only the doctrine laid down, but the method of proceeding pointed out, he could have, he thought, little hesitation in deciding in favour of the application: and he might ask, (the answer to which would be a confirmation of this opinion) what was to become of the liberty of the subject between the passing of Magna Charta, and the passing of the Act 32 Car. II., if the Judges of Westminster Hall thought that one Court only had the power of issuing writs of Habeas Corpus in Term-time? The case of Jenks was certainly a positive authority that the then Lord Chancellor could not grant the writ in vacation; but it did not appear to him, that all the consideration which might have been given to the subject had been given in a case which was of so doubtful a nature. He did not think that Jenks's case was one of sufficient strength to bear him up against the current of doctrine which he had found in so many able writers, and particularly in a case in which the liberty of the subject was so matecially concerned. It appeared, therefore, to him to be his duty to grant the application for the writ; but at the same time he could not help observing, that there was great inconvenience in applying for such an instrument to this Court; if the subject, however, thought proper to avail himself of this right, as he understood the law, he could not salvo juramento refuse it.

Tuesday, July 21.

CASE OF THE BANKRUPT CRAWLEY.

Mr. ROSE appeared on the part of the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, in support of the warrant of commitment. He represented, that the commission issued on 7th March, 1815, but up to the present time no account had been obtained from the bankrupt. An examination was taken upon the case of the bankrupt upon the 4th of June last, and Mr. Crawley then declared that on the 14th of that month he would produce his accounts. On the 14th a meeting took place, but no accounts were produced; and the only reason assigned by the bankrupt for their non-production was, that they were now at the house of Mr. Hamilton, a friend of his; that he had two petitions before the Lord Chancellor, and that he doubted the validity of the commission. The question was, whether this was such an answer as the commissioners ought to have been satisfied with. He humbly conceived that it was not, and that the commissioners were quite authorized in the step they had taken.

The LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that the question was, whether, if to make a new warrant a good warrant, fresh statements were necessary, the warrant was not sufficient in point of substance.

Sir S. ROMILLY, on the part of the bankrupt, knew of no instance of a commitment upon any thing out of the examination of the bankrupt himself. The Commissioners could only proceed upon the examination of the bankrupt himself, and this examination should appear upon the warrant. But, in this case, it had been omitted, and it was quite impossible to say that this was a matter of form which ought to be supplied by the Court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that as to what might have been the conduct of the bankrupt, or what effect that conduct might have produced upon the creditors, he should not consider. The duty he had to discharge was, 1st, to determine whether the warrant was a sufficient warrant of commitment; 2dly, whether it was insufficient either in substance or form; and 3dly, if it were only insufficient in matter of form, how it should be rectified. He was upon the whole of opinion, that the warrant of commitment was insufficient, inasmuch as it referred to depositions which the Court had no power of examining, and it was impossible for himself to know that the Commissioners had acted rightly in the decision they had come to of committing the bankrupt to prison. As to the distinction, whether this warrant was insufficient in form or in substance, he took it to be defective in substance, and therefore he was not required to issue any new warrant, nor would he be justified in doing so. He therefore ordered that the bankrupt might be discharged, so far as regarded the warrant in question.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

In consequence of representations from the Rangers of St. James's and the Green Parks, of the disorderly conduct of persons, both men and women, Sir Nathaniel Conant issued a search warrant to Perry, Nicholls, and others of the Park constables, to apprehend all persons of a disorderly description found in the two Parks on Sunday night, between 11 and 1 o'clock, when they apprehended no less than 47 men, women, girls, and boys, in the Parks, and confined them in different watch-houses. When brought to the office, on Tuesday morning, they displayed a most motley group: some of them being respectably and even elegantly dressed; others most filthy, and some with scarcely rags to cover their nakedness. One of the females had the appearance of a housemaid in a gentleman's family; some were mere children, and several far advanced in years, but of a most abandoned description, nightly resorting to the Park for the most indecent purposes.—Such of them as could give a reasonable account of themselves the Magistrate discharged, with admonition.—A fellow of the name of Gunter was recognized as a well known thief, by Humphreys and several others.—Several were ordered to be committed as rogues and vagabonds for 14 days, or to find bail.

Jeremiah Kirk was committed for trial on proof of having defrauded the porter of Mr. Coatts, the banker, of several shillings by a fictitious tale of distress. His fabricated story was, that his wife was lying dead in a hospital, and that he wanted money to bury the corpse.

Mr. James Pidding was charged with an offence, under the Act of Parliament for regulating the dividing Lottery Tickets into shares, viz. halves, quarters, eighths, and sixteenths, being the 57th of Geo. the 3d, cap. 74, and the prisoner was charged with a breach of this Act, he being a licensed Lottery-Office Keeper, by issuing twentieth shares, contrary to the statute, from his office in Holborn. Mr. Pidding, on being called upon to answer to the charge, pleaded guilty.—Mr. Hesse, the Secretary to the State Lottery-Office, agreed that the judgment should be respited on condition that the defendant promised not to offend again in a similar way, which he did most solemnly.—He then left the office.

GUILDHALL.

On Thursday, Robert Hall and John Hooper were charged on suspicion with being the perpetrators of an extensive robbery in the house of Mr. Chandler, salesman, West Smithfield. The following were the circumstances as detailed by the prosecutor and two young females, sisters to the prisoner Hall:—Hannah Hall, lived with the prosecutor, who on Sunday went out early, leaving her in the house, with permission to invite her sister to spend the day with her. He had several times expressly forbidden the brother to come to the house, as he was aware of his character. The sisters were sitting together, when about eleven o'clock, the bell rung, and Hannah, upon opening the door, found it to be her brother. The other sister wishing to avoid him, ran to another room, but was afterwards induced to come and speak to him. He seemed much altered in his behaviour; and in a very affectionate manner begged pardon for former misconduct towards them, and Hannah said she would get some porter, but could not leave the house. The prisoner then offered to go, and took the key of the front door. He returned after an absence of a few minutes, and called from the top of the stairs:—“Hannah, do you want any bread?” She replied in the negative; and, after remaining about a minute at the top of the stairs, he came down, laid the key of the street door upon the table, and seated himself in such a position against the kitchen door, that no person could pass without his rising; continued conversing for some time in a manner highly pleasing to his sisters, who imagined him to be completely reformed. After a lapse of about twenty minutes, he rose and observed that Mary seemed uneasy, and he supposed it was because he was there. He would therefore leave them, and saluting her very affectionately, he went part of the way up stairs, and returned. Mary then attempted to pass him, but he prevented her. After a struggle, however, she got up stairs to Mrs. Chandler's room, where she found all the drawers open. The other sister in the interim came up, and finding the street door open, called out that she was ruined for ever, and attempted to run up to her sister. Her brother, however, begged “for God's sake she would not, for she would be murdered.” She replied she did not care, and running up the stairs, and from one room to another, she discovered that every drawer and cupboard in the house had been forced open and stripped of their contents, which were very valuable. Among other things missing was a ring valued at 50 guineas, and 40 new shirts. The prisoner came up, and, apparently much agitated, inquired what had been lost, and looking into the place where the plate was kept, exclaimed, “thank God—, they have not taken the plate!” He then begged they would not be uneasy, as he would go to Hatton-garden, and soon get back the property. He left the house but did not return. At four o'clock, Mary Hall went to her father, and by his desire proceeded to Bow-street, where she gave information of the robbery, and described her brother's person. On Wednesday, he was apprehended, together with the prisoner Hooper, who was known to be his constant associate in vice. On being taken, Hall said, “I suppose this is for that job of my sister's in Smithfield.”—Hannah Hall, who bears an excellent character, was dreadfully agitated, and fainted during the examination. None of the property had as yet been traced.—The prisoners were remanded.

WORKSHIP-STREET.

CRUELTY OF PARENTS.—Daniel Thomas, and Sarah his wife, were examined on a charge of cruelty to Frances Otterway, a child 10 years old; It appeared that the unfortunate girl was the daughter of the female prisoner by a former husband, and since her second marriage she (the mother) resides with her present husband, at 6, Prince's-street, Gibraltar-fields, Bethnal-green. The neighbours had been continually annoyed by the piercing screams of the child. Some of them remonstrated with the mother, but without avail. The screams were still heard rather more piercing than ever, till Saturday, when the cry became more heart-rending than usual, and the neighbours flocked before the door, when it was discovered that the mother was holding her for the father, who, with all his might, was flogging her with a cane till her body was covered with bruises. The neighbours gave information, a warrant was obtained, and they were examined at great length, as were the several witnesses. The prisoners, who were methodists, pleaded, in defence, they would not use any stranger's child in so brutal a manner as represented, much less their own.—The Magistrate observed, that he feared they were wolves in sheep's clothing; it was evidently more than proper correction, and consequently a case fit to be brought before a Jury.—They must find bail.—The prisoners were committed in default of bail.

UNION-HALL.

The following charge was on Thursday preferred against Mr. Yates, stockbroker, of Nelson-square, Blackfriars-road:—Sarah Page stated, that she was employed as a charwoman in the family of the defendant. On Sunday evening last, he kicked and assaulted Mrs. Yates most violently, in consequence of that lady not carrying a jar of water up stairs, which from its weight she was unable to do. Complainant went up stairs, and found Mrs. Yates weeping in the most affecting manner, and begged, for God's sake, to know what was the matter. Mrs. Yates stripped up the sleeve of her gown, and exhibited her arms, which were covered with bruises; and pulled down her stockings, and showed her legs, which were also dreadfully bruised, and which she stated to complainant had been occasioned by Mr. Yates kicking her for the reason above mentioned. While Mrs. Yates and the complainant were in conversation, Mr. Yates entered the room, and struck complainant a violent blow; she ran out and caught hold of the banisters; he followed, tore her forcibly from her hold, and threw her down the stairs; she ran into the wash-house, to which place he followed her, and beat and kicked her in a dreadful manner. The floor was covered with blood, and he only desisted when her cries of murder had collected a mob in front of the house. She attempted to make her way into the street, but the defendant had locked the door and taken away the key.—The complainant is a respectable looking woman, about 60 years of age; her face was dreadfully bruised, and she was scarcely able, from her weakened state, to detail the circumstances of the case. Mr. Yates declined making any statement in justification; he expressed a wish that the business should be taken to the Sessions, and entered into a recognizance to appear there to answer the charge.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

SINGULAR STORY.—Friday se'nnight, Mrs. Peat, the landlady of the Carpenters' Arms public house, in John-street, Tottenham-court-road, retired to rest about 12 o'clock, but had not slept many minutes before she says she dreamt that some person had given three knocks at her chamber door, and she fancied she heard a female voice exclaim—"Misses, Misses, here's some one putting a child down the privy!" During the whole of the night the idea haunted her, and she arose extremely troubled. On coming to the breakfast table she related the circumstance to Mr. Peat, the brother of her late husband, who treated the idea with ridicule; but seeing that it had made more than a common impression on her mind, he endeavoured to divert her from such an improbable circumstance. In order to gratify her curiosity she determined to explore the drain of the privy. For this purpose she provided herself with a stick, and after about a minute's search succeeded in bringing the arm of an infant above the surface of the drain!! This terrible confirmation of her dream had such an effect on her as nearly to overpower her;—she could only call her brother-in-law, who, with another person, came immediately to her assistance, and after a few minutes trouble succeeded in getting the body out, which had every appearance of a full grown child, and did not seem to have been long placed there. As the story got wind, various were the conjectures formed. Information was sent to the summoning beadle. The Coroner came, attended by Mr. Raynsford, the Magistrate, and other Gentlemen. The first witness was Mrs. Peat's servant-maid; but, after laborious examination, nothing could be elicited to throw the least light on the subject. Mrs. Peat detailed her dream without hesitation, and was confirmed by her brother-in-law in its material points.—Mr. Upham, a surgeon, deposed, that the child was full grown.—After a long consideration of the case, the Jury returned a verdict of—Wilful Murder against some person or persons unknown.—[Mrs. Peat (who is doubtless innocent of any crime) we should certainly think could throw some more light on this strange occurrence.]

One of those melancholy events which have of late occurred but too frequently, happened on Saturday evening to the regular Hemel-Hempstead coach, belonging to Mr. Hearn, of the King's Arms, Snow-hill, which was overturned in passing the corner at Hunton-bridge, Herts, owing to the wanton behaviour of the coachman in endeavouring to make a fine angle, and literally ground to shivers by the horses subsequently drawing it after them. A woman on the outside was killed on the spot; another outside passenger and the coachman are so mutilated that little hopes are entertained of their recovery; and eight or nine other passengers have been so severely cut and bruised, that a considerable time must elapse before they can again follow their usual occupations. The inside passengers, among whom was a gentleman of great property and consequence in the county of Herts, were more fortunate, but did not any of them escape without injury, though comparatively of a slight nature. There were no less than seventeen passengers on the outside at the time, which no doubt materially contributed to the fatal accident.—We have received from a respectable correspondent another account of this:—"On Saturday afternoon Hearn's Hemel-Hempstead Coach was overturned at Hunton-bridge, about three miles below Watford, owing principally to the carelessness of the driver, in dashing rapidly round the corner of the bridge, with the overpowering weight of seventeen outside passengers, when, shocking to relate, a respectable young woman and a young man, the servant of a gentleman in the neighbourhood, were so dreadfully injured that they survived only a few hours, and several other persons were also severely wounded."—Times.

EXECUTIONS.—On Wednesday morning, Timothy M'Namara and Thomas Buttery, for forging a seaman's will, and Richard Fernandi, alias Richard Clarke, for highway-robbery, were, pursuant to their sentence, executed at the usual place before the Debtors' door at Newgate.—Fernandi was convicted of a highway robbery committed by him and two others, upon the persons of Mr. and Mrs. Hancock Rood, who were returning to London in a one-horse chaise. Clarke had protested his innocence of the robbery, and denied the justice of his sentence, until a short time before he ascended the scaffold. His conduct was most unbecoming on Sunday, during the time the condemned sermon was preaching: he got up, and declared that he was a murdered man, and the prosecutors had sworn his life away. At a quarter before eight, the Sheriff, the Under Sheriffs, and the Sheriff Elect, arrived at Newgate, and the criminals were brought from their cells into the Press-yard. They mounted the scaffold precisely at eight. Clarke was greatly agitated—the other two were composed and firm, and did not evince the slightest fear. After a short prayer from Dr. Cotton, the unhappy men were launched into eternity. Clarke was convulsed for a long time, the other two died almost instantly.—A respite was received for William Evinson, who was found guilty of forgery last Sessions, in uttering a bill to Mr. Powell, coach-maker, purporting to be drawn by Messrs. Francis and White, in payment for a carriage. He came to town a few months ago, and became connected with a gang of swindlers, and was made a tool of by them, and brought to the dreadful situation in which he now lies. He has mortgaged his property, and lately led a very dissipated life. It is a fact that his relations have all come to untimely deaths; his father broke his neck when hunting, and his two brothers were shot. He has kept the first company in the kingdom until lately, and was very much respected. Great exertions are making by some of the most distinguished persons in the kingdom to save his life. The respite was granted on account of Counsel having given an opinion that the offence for which he was convicted was a fraud only, and not forgery; and also on account of his desiring longer time to prepare himself for death, he being convicted last Sessions, had no idea that he should have been so early reported to the Prince Regent.—Evening Paper.—Two out of the three unhappy beings (says the Times) who suffered the awful sentence of the law were executed for forgery. Devoutly do we wish that the secrets of the prison-house, and what passes within those dreary walls, could be made to claim more general attention. The conduct of the two poor men during their confinement was so correct and even exemplary, that it is highly probable, if their lives had been spared, they would have become useful members of the community. We seem, however, to act as if we thought that justice could only be satisfied by blood; the thought, that means for reformation might be discovered, seems never to enter our minds; while on many parts of the Continent of Europe the public would feel just as much shocked at such an execution as was witnessed on Wednesday, as if murder had been committed. That such scenes should have been transacted in the dark ages is not very surprising; but that they should at this time of day be so frequently exhibited in one of the most enlightened countries of the earth, is indeed matter of astonishment. To exterminate instead of using every effort to reclaim, resembles the policy of a barbarous State,—barren in expedients to save,—strong only to destroy.

On Sunday morning, between one and two o'clock, as an aged couple named Hunt were asleep in their cottage, at Nazing, near Waltham-abbey, the wife was aroused by a noise at her window. She arose, and perceived a man endeavouring to lift up the sash. She exerted all her strength to prevent his entrance, but her attempt was ineffectual; the villain forced open the window, plunged in, and put a case knife to the throat of the terrified female: happily in her struggle she knocked the knife from his grasp, and it fell to a distant part of the room. She was, however, unable to rise from the spot where the wretch had knocked her down and attempted to perpetrate the murder. In the meanwhile Mr. Hunt, who is 84 years of age, came from his bed, and contributed his feeble assistance for the preservation of his wife; but the robber by a single blow, stretched him on the floor. The villain, perceiving that he had nothing to apprehend from resistance, rifled the pockets of Mr. Hunt, in which was 27*l.* in Bank-notes, which the poor old man had received at the Bank on Saturday; and then escaped through the same window by which he entered. The height from the ground is twelve feet, and, to facilitate his entrance, he had broken off the arm of a large tree, and placed it in such a direction as to form a species of ladder.

As Mr. Robert Derby, of Tower-hill, was coming to town from Edmonton, on Monday night, in a one-horse chaise, he was met by a man on horseback, who suddenly turned round, followed the chaise, and, when within two miles of town, blew a whistle: the vehicle was immediately stopped, and surrounded by five others, who dragged Mr. Derby from his seat, gagged him, and robbed him of his pocket-book, containing Bank of England notes to the amount of 20*l.* besides his watch, and 12*s.* 6*d.* in silver, with which they made off, having previously cut the reins of the horse. Mr. Derby succeeded in taking the gag from his mouth, and proceeded home, having in vain given an alarm.

A labouring man last week, whilst working in the fields in the neighbourhood of Chatham, fell under the influence of a stroke of the sun, which produced phrenzy, and from which he has not yet recovered.

A few days ago, a youth, named John Thomas, who resided with Messrs. Croft and Parsons, in the Strand, went into the Serpentine River while in a state of perspiration—after he had dressed himself, he felt a languor and chilliness, and the moment he arrived at home, he was attacked with violent fever, attended with delirium, of which he died in three days. He was only 18 years of age.—A Gentleman, while bathing at Greenwich on Sunday, was seized with the cramp, and before assistance could be given, he had sunk to rise no more. His name was Askin.—On Wednesday morning the son of Mr. J. Spalding, of Mary-le-bone-street, and another boy, went to bathe in Serpentine River. Both could swim a little, and they in consequence ventured out some distance; but on returning, the former sunk, which being perceived by the other, he went to his assistance, and they both sank, which being perceived by a drummer, he plunged into the water, and succeeded in saving the life of the latter, but the other lad was drowned.

Wednesday an Inquest was held at Woolwich, on view of the bodies of John Wright, John Donovan, and Hugh Jenkins, who were suffocated in a privy on the preceding night.—Richard Kingsland said, that he was assisting in emptying the soil from the privy of the house occupied by the Master Attendant in the Dock-yard, when James Brooks fell down on the soil, upon which Hugh Jenkins, one of the deceased, went down to the assistance of Brooks, when he also fell, and was soon suffocated by the stench. Before Jenkins was known to be dead, Isaac Pitcher went down to assist, when he also was overpowered by the vapour, and became insensible. Hereupon John Donovan went down, and the effluvia had the same effect on him; he fell, and was also suffocated by it. Geo. Parish then went down with the intent of rescuing his fellow-labourers, when he was attacked in the same way, but was caught up and saved. Soon afterwards, John Wright, a watchman, being anxious to extricate the five poor men, went down the ladder, but he was affected in the same way, and suffocated.—Denis Daley then ventured down the ladder, when he also fell. By this time several of the yard watchmen had come to their assistance; and the bodies of Hugh Jenkins, John Donovan, John Wright, James Brooks, George Patish, Isaac Pitcher, and Denis Daley, were taken out of the hole. The first two were found to be dead, John Wright lived about two hours, and then died, and the remaining four were recovered by the Surgeon of the yard and his assistant. The time that was occupied by this melancholy event was about two hours.—Mr. Dunn, Surgeon, said he had no doubt their deaths were occasioned by suffocation from the stagnant vapour.—Verdict, Accidentally smothered by the noxious vapour of the vault.

THE LONDON MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, JULY 27, 1818.

The supply of Wheat to this day's market, both English and Foreign, was very considerable, for which there was scarce any demand, and sales were exceedingly heavy, at a decline of from 4*s.* to 5*s.* per quarter from the prices of last Monday.—Oats are also 4*s.* per quarter lower, in consequence of the immense arrivals from our own coast as well as from abroad.—Beans nearly support last week's prices.—White Pease are 5*s.* per quarter cheaper, having an increased supply of that article.—Barley is from 2*s.* to 4*s.* per quarter lower.

No. 553. SUNDAY, AUG. 2, 1818.

THE POLITICAL EXAMINER.

Party is the madness of many for the gain of a few. POPE.

No. 538.

SEIZURE OF PENSACOLA.

A CIRCUMSTANCE has taken place which has very much puzzled the politicians, especially the "legitimate" ones, who are exceedingly frightened just now at the sound of a gun. The reader knows the long dispute between Spain and the United States relative to West Florida. The American General JACKSON has taken possession of its capital Pensacola; and our ministerial editors draw their quills instantly, in great horror of mind. They ask, How is this? What right have the Americans to seize Pensacola? Why didn't they issue a manifesto beforehand, instead of imitating Napoleon's mode on these occasions? Are these your republican cabinets?—So saying, they sheathe their quills for the present as rather useless, and sit down, looking, (as the legitimate custom is) lofty yet lack-a-daisical.

The ingenious allusion to NAPOLEON, affecting to think that he was the sole practiser of a summary mode of proceeding, of which the old Governments had set him so many examples, has been sufficiently answered by the Morning Chronicle. It is curious to see how these gentlemen break their forgetful heads wherever they run, till against NAPOLEON's ambition. They affect to reply that NAPOLEON was the only Sovereign who was in the habit of acting and then explaining, instead of explaining and then acting; and they add, that the instances in preceding Sovereigns were only exceptions to the rule, and have also been "execrated by history and public opinion." We are glad to see for the first time this modest concession on the part of time serving writers,—that history and public opinion are things different from their own productions and sentiments; but it is impossible to help being disgusted at their making this momentary use of "history" which they seem to forget at all other times, and of "public opinion," which they are so often in the habit of denying, or of shutting their ears to, or of representing as Jacobinical. Do they execrate LOUIS XIV. for his unexplained seizures, or FREDERICK II. for his, or the Empress CATHERINE and her brother of Austria for theirs? Do they ever execrate these legitimate setters of bad examples for their seizures, cruelties, kidnapping, and partitions? Do they, in short, ever execrate them for any thing? Not they; and if you do, they call you a Jacobin, though you have execrated NAPOLEON into the bargain. And now they would quote history and public opinion! and for what? For a petty time-serving purpose. So little principle have they in any of their feelings about history past or present; and so far removed are they from the spirit of truth, when they make brief and unwilling use of the truth itself.

But in answer to something else, they have shewn themselves aware that the United States have expressly said "they would make no appeals to other governments in their concerns with Spain." At least, they said they must decline soliciting or acceding to the interference of any other Government, "in justice to that fundamental system of politics, which forbids them from entering the labyrinth of European politics." In other words, they despise the chicanery and faithlessness of these politics, and can afford to do without them and be above them. And this is one of the greatest reasons, why the legitimate pretenders of all sorts hate the American republic, which nevertheless, like prodigious wise-acres as they are, they are teaching the rest of the world to like better every day.

As to the reasons of the United States for seizing Pensacola; they will perhaps refer the world to the variety of State Papers which they have already published on the subject of Florida. We cannot refer to them as we could wish, just at this moment; but we trust and believe that they will make out a good case, as we take exceeding interest in the honour, welfare, and illustrious example set by the United States. The dispute on the subject is an old one; the circumstances, which retain or forfeit the right of possession in such cases are of various descriptions; and we know, that some years back America expressly claimed a "right" to West Florida, and said it was only waiting the result of negotiations with Spain to have it finally given up. Probably it thinks it has waited too long; but at all events, we shall expect to hear why, whatever we may think of the right of the Allied Promise-breakers to hear it.

In the mean time, the politicians are much perplexed. Some think that General JACKSON has exceeded his commission; some, that he has acted upon a discretionary one; and others suppose, that the business has been concerted between the two disputing Powers themselves, in order that Spain may be able to put some money in her pocket by the sale of Florida, and yet avoid a rupture with the Court of St. James's, by appearing to yield it on compulsion.

We think there may be some truth in this latter supposition, except that America would be paying for goods to which she says she has a right, and which must inevitably fall into her hands before long. At any rate, we conceive there is little option of any sort on the part of Spain. The Court of Spain, it is true, grievously wants money; and would willingly part with a colony to get some. The King can scarcely raise any, even for his Court expenses. But then, would he willingly part with a colony so ticklishly situated as the Floridas, considering the state of his revolted colonies in the South? Yes, willingly, though not willingly; for the fact is, even he must perceive at last, that there is no hope of keeping these colonies at all, and he may choose to make the best of a bad bargain, and get the last maravedie out of America while he can. Besides, in spite of the renewed efforts of the Allies, the people of a state are found to be of some consequence still, and will more or less make their way upward into their rights, especially in America, where such a glorious example has been set them; and for aught we know, the inhabitants of Florida may have specially applied to the United States to be taken under their protection. The Floridas as well as the other Spanish colonies are wretchedly governed, subject to martial law, and to be drained by Governors who go to squeeze fortunes out of them. "Public opinion," of which the Courier talks, is known to be so discontented there, that when the Venezuelans declared themselves independent, they appealed to it as on their side.

SPANISH AMERICA.

Agès pass away, and the most useful undertakings are, through some strange and unaccountable blindness, neglected by that people to whom they would procure incalculable advantages, until at length, perhaps, some fortuitous event rouses the slumbers of apathy, and excites an attention to benefits, which, by the by, are at this moment often reaped by those who have all along possessed the least opportunity of appreciating or of applying them.

These reflections cannot fail of being excited, when, on looking over the map of that most favoured part of South America, New Grenada, we find, that on no one spot of the shores of the Gulf of Darien has any European power yet bethought them of forming a permanent settlement*, while every inch of that coast is certainly of the greatest value and importance in a political as well as in a commercial point of view.

Of all Spanish America, comprehending a surface of 5500 miles in length and 3000 miles in breadth, the Viceroyalty of New Grenada, in which are situated the Isthmus and the Gulf of Darien, is by far the most important, and presents the greatest advantages, from its geographical situation, both for the enterprizes of war and for those of commerce.

When we consider, on the one side, the efforts of the South Americans to shake off the yoke of the Spanish Government, the rapid progress of their revolution, and, on the other, the great interest which all nations have to partake directly of the rich commerce of that part of the new world, we cannot doubt of the ultimate emancipation of that extensive and fruitful country, nor of the establishment of a new, powerful, and independent empire, probably under the form of a representative and federal government, which uniting and disposing of its great resources, according to circumstances, can prevent intestine divisions, and effectually maintain its independence,—a government which, by its rapid advancement towards order, will procure happiness to nineteen millions of people already civilized, and prepare the same advantage for a vast number of Aborigenes, who are yet in their primitive state of independence,—such an event cannot fail to influence the commerce, the policy, and even the power of other nations, to an extent at this time not easy to calculate; but to England, such a change must be above all interesting.

It will soon become then highly important, both for the statesmen and the merchant, to be mutually acquainted with the different governments and departments of commercial administration into which Spanish America is divided.

* About the year 1785, the Viceroy Archbishop Gongara, of New Grenada, founded four villages, named Cayman, Concepcion, Carolina, and Mandinga, which the subsequent Viceroy, Lemas, caused to be suppressed in the year 1789! The village named Carolina was situated in the harbour called New Caledonia, the same spot on which, a century before, the Scotch founded their unsuccessful Establishment of New Edinburgh.

Providence, with a bountiful hand, has bestowed its choicest gifts on that happy land: Intersected in all directions by the loftiest mountains, and watered by the finest rivers of the universe, the fertility of its soil is beyond comparison or conception. In these provinces, blessed with endless variety of climates and temperatures, vegetation is perpetual. The vine, and the different species of grain, yield two, three, and some four crops a-year. Here are produced trees of an enormous size, of great durability, and excellent for the construction of ships; some of them being quite incorruptible under water: here grow numberless plants and woods famed for medicinal virtues, as well as those used in dying: the productions of the West India Islands are cultivated in these provinces at a third less expense and trouble, and with the only difference of their being all produced here of a superior quality.

The annual exportation of the produce of the mines of South America exceeds sixty-three millions of dollars; and that of the produce of the soil, thirty-four millions; that of hides and tallow, four millions more. On the other hand, it consumes yearly the value of one hundred millions of dollars in articles of foreign manufacturing industry. Is this a country, then, that we should look upon with indifference? Is the present glorious struggle of its inhabitants for liberty and independence only important, inasmuch as it regards themselves alone? The Spanish Government have always considered the ignorance in which they strove to keep the South Americans in every branch of useful knowledge, the unacquaintance of foreigners with the topography of South America, and the total interdiction of passage up its navigable rivers, as the best support of its tyrannical and debasing authority in that country. But, thanks to the diffusion of liberal ideas, their yoke is broken; the dark veil of ignorance and bigotry is torn by the hand of freedom, and the admiring world beholds, with mingled feelings of indignation and surprise, how idiotic despotism could so long succeed to debase a country blessed by nature with means and advantages above any other part of the globe. NETHERLANDS.

BRUSSELS, JULY 27.—The Court of Cassation, having met this day in an extraordinary sitting, has decided in the appeal of the Duke of Wellington against the sentence passed by the tribunal at Ghent in favour of the Editor of the Journal of East and West Flanders. After a discussion of four hours, in which Messrs. Tarte, sen. and Joubert, as Counsel for the Duke, and M. Beyens, for M. De Busscher, warmly advocated the interests of their clients, the Court annulled the decision of the tribunal of Ghent, and declared that the article inserted against his Grace bore the character of calumny. In consequence, and conformably to the articles of the penal code, the Court condemned M. de Busscher to one month's imprisonment, to the interdiction of his civil rights for five years, to a fine of 25 florins, and to the costs of the two trials instead of damages. Five hundred copies of the sentence may also be printed at the expense of M. de Busscher in whatever part of the kingdom the Duke of Wellington shall please.—We shall give tomorrow some details of this important affair, in which the most unequivocal homage was paid on both sides to liberal principles.—Oracle, &c. 28.

NORTH AMERICA.

(From the National Intelligencer.)

WASHINGTON, JUNE 23.—Our readers are doubtless impatient for further accounts of Gen. Jackson's movements; but we have nothing further to offer them. No direct intelligence has reached the seat of government from Gen. Jackson's headquarters, since he took up the line of march from St. Marks. We have thought proper to notice this absence of information, to account for the silence we have observed on the subject, since announcing, the other day, the reported capture of Pensacola. This report reached the city from two different sources, remote from each other, and nearer to the scene of action than to this city. We have little doubt of the correctness of the fact of General Jackson's having entered Pensacola; and it is equally probable, if he entered at all, it was by assault, as it is not to be supposed the Spanish authorities would have given up so important a post without at least a show of resistance.—The motives of this step General Jackson's despatches will disclose. It is presumed such a measure was not in the contemplation of the Government, although it may necessarily have resulted from the discretion vested in the Commanding Officer to take such lawful steps as the safety of the frontier might appear to require. If the Indians in arms against us led the way to Pensacola, there can be no doubt of General Jackson's being justified in following and dislodging them.

MONTREAL, JUNE 17.—On Friday sentence of death was pronounced by the Chief Justice in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, on Charles de R. R. Hart, for the murder of Owen Keeney, in the Indian territory. It is, however, understood that execution will be delayed till the decision of the Prince Regent in Council is obtained on a question connected with the jurisdiction of the Court.

DORSET.—THE KING v. BOWDITCH AND OTHERS.—This was an indictment charging James Bowditch, William Bowditch, Joanna Bowditch, Susanna Bowditch, Elizabeth Gibbons, Susanna Mulrairie, Jane Marks, Thomas Paul, Juliana Paul, and Elizabeth Snell, with having conspired to carry away Maria Glenn, the daughter of Anne Fenton Glenn, widow, of the island of St. Vincent's, being then sixteen years of age, from the care of her guardian, Mr. Tuckett, and to procure a marriage between her and James Bowditch, a labourer and person in a low condition of life.

Mr. Serjeant PELL addressed the Jury on the part of the prosecution. Mr. Tuckett, under whose care the young lady had been placed, was a gentleman at the bar, resident at Taunton. Of the defendants, Joanna Bowditch rented a small farm near Taunton, and was the mother of James and William Bowditch, as well as of three of the female defendants. This last class consisted likewise of Susannah Mulrairie, a person in a low station of life, of Jane Marks, the cook, and Elizabeth Snell, the housekeeper, of Mr. Tuckett. The conspiracy charged upon these individuals was that of conspiring to withdraw Miss Glenn from her natural protectors, in order to bring about a marriage between her and James Bowditch. It might be right in him to state, that the evidence of this young lady constituted the main foundation of the case, and that if they disbelieved her, it was at an end. He would add also, that if the story which would be heard should turn out to be false, she could be nothing less than a monster of treachery, and had, at the age of scarcely seventeen years, arrived at a climax of infamy unexampled in the annals of human guilt. She was the daughter of a widow lady in St. Vincent's, and in 1811 came to England for education. She was placed in the family of Mr. Tuckett, who had married a sister of her mother. In January, 1817, Miss Glenn, who had been for some time extremely indisposed, was directed to try a change of air, and in a most evil hour, she was removed to the house of Mrs. Bowditch, at a small distance from Taunton. (Here the Learned Gentleman stated the particulars, which will be better gathered from the evidence.)

George Leman Tuckett said that Miss Maria Glenn had been intrusted to his care. In July, 1817, having been very ill with the whooping cough, she was removed to Holway-farm, attended by a nursemaid; and his two infant children. The farm was occupied by a Mrs. Bowditch, and he was ignorant at that time that she had any son living with her; he was in the habit of visiting her, accompanied by Mrs. Tuckett, sometimes twice a-day. Miss Glenn had very great expectations; her mother had property, and her grandfather, to whom she was heiress, possessed two large sugar estates in the West Indies. She was also an only child. With regard to her mind and disposition, she was of the gentlest nature he had ever seen.

Maria Glenn, a young lady of the most elegant appearance, was then introduced into the witness box; and being accommodated with a chair, underwent a very long examination. After stating the circumstances of her going to Holway farm, she deposed, that she was ignorant of James Bowditch residing in the house till about three weeks after she had been there. When she saw him before in the garden, she had considered him merely as a labourer. Mrs. Bowditch had a daughter married during her stay at the farm. On the Saturday before the 2d of September, Mrs. Bowditch and Mrs. Mulrairie, a visitor, came into her room, and inquired whether she really intended to return home. She replied, "Yes;" upon which Mrs. Bowditch observed, that her son was then lost, and she knew not what was to become of him. This she repeated; and on the witness's asking what she meant, Mrs. Mulrairie said she could not have been so long in the house, without being sensible of J. Bowditch's attachment. The witness expressed much astonishment, asked them what her uncle and aunt would say, and begged them to say nothing more as it greatly distressed her. She then took her little cousins and walked away. On the following day Mrs. Mulrairie entreated her to speak to Mr. J. Bowditch, who was like one distracted at hearing she was going. She added, that his family could not reason with him, but that if witness would speak to him he would be contented, and made sensible of the difference in their condition. She thought it wrong to go, but at length yielded, and mentioned to him her surprise at his conduct, as his sister had shortly before assured her that what his mother had said was in joke. He made no reply; upon which Mrs. Mulrairie observed, that it was no wonder if, when so nice a young lady was in the house, a young man should become attached to her, but that she need not be uneasy, as it would come to nothing. The next day she returned home. On the 15th Mrs. Mulrairie and Mrs. Gibbons, sister of J. Bowditch, called on her, and whilst alone with them, they begged her to ask permission from her aunt to walk out with them, as they had something particular to say. She applied for leave reluctantly, and it was refused. One of them said, "I thought so," and introduced the former conversation relative to J. Bowditch. She said, he was quite distracted, that he had declared he would not live without her, but would rather murder both her and himself. Mrs. Gibbons observed, she was sure he would do it, for she never knew any one so resolute as her brother. Mrs. Mulrairie said she had a great regard for witness, and that induced her to communicate this; for Mr. Bowditch had declared he would follow her to any part of the world, and destroy her; and added, that if she told her uncle, her danger would only be the greater. The effect of this was to terrify her exceedingly, for she believed all she heard to be true. Mrs. Mulrairie desired her to reflect what a shocking thing it would be to be murdered, and to swear on her life and soul that she would do what Mr. Bowditch wished her. In her alarm she promised to do so, and they left her. On the same day she met Jane Marks, the cook, on the stairs, who said she had just seen Mr. Bowditch. The witness took no notice, but was followed by her into her bed-room, where she began to talk of Mr. Bowditch's great regard, saying, he was to be sure too low in life, but she had never seen any body so resolute, and desiring her not to mention it to her uncle or aunt. Elizabeth Snell, the housemaid, often addressed her on the same subject. On Monday Snell found witness crying, and told her not to vex herself. She replied, she was quite miserable, and to relieve her mind must speak to her uncle about it. Elizabeth Snell said, "What, and be murdered; I would not for Indies of gold." Mary Whitby, the nursemaid, sometimes spoke to her in a similar manner. On Saturday, the 20th of September, as she was walking alone in Taunton, having been sent by her aunt to the market place, she was met by James Bowditch and Mrs. Mulrairie. The latter said, "Come with us; I want to tell you something." She refused; when Bowditch waved his hand, and with a fierce look cried out, "Go, go; you know what I have declared, there is no occasion to repeat it." Mrs. Mulrairie said, "Why not go?" and Bowditch, "I'll do it." She followed them up a court in East-street, and they led her into a house where the only person she at first saw was the wife of W. Bowditch. They took her into a parlour, where Mrs. Mulrairie produced a paper, and observed that they wished her to sign something. They then led her into signing it, the substance of the contents being that she would comply with all that J. Bowditch might wish her to do. Immediately after this, a man entered with W. Bowditch, whom she had since seen and now knew to be Mr. Oxenham, an attorney at Taunton. He had a large paper in his hand written in a character that appeared to her like Greek. He desired her to sign it, and placed her hand at the bottom of it as she trembled a good deal. James and W. Bowditch stood one on each side of her, and she left the house, Mrs. Mulrairie observing, that she would not now be molested. The next day as she was returning from church with her aunt, she informed her she was to go in a day or two to a boarding-school at Chelsea. The elder Mrs. Bowditch was with them at this time. Witness felt the greatest pleasure at learning she was so soon to leave Taunton. In the course of that day, Jane Marks brought her a note from Mrs. Mulrairie, stating, that Mr. Bowditch was determined to take her away at the end of that week or the beginning of the next. She went to bed between nine and ten, wholly unaware of what was to happen, and feeling quite tranquil and happy at the idea of going to school, and escaping from danger. Her bed-room door was shut, and her cousin slept in the same room, which was adjoining to that of her uncle. She soon fell asleep, and the first thing she recollected was that of her being awoke by Jane Marks, who came without a light in a long black dress, and said, "Get up, they are all waiting, and you know what Mr. Bowditch has said." She then lifted witness, who was unable from fright either to speak or cry, out of bed, threw some cloathes on her without facing them, and pulled her down stairs. She was just able to pronounce in a low tone, "Oh! Jane," as she was hurried down. She saw her uncle's study window and door open, and being taken through the window she saw James Bowditch, W. Bowditch, and some others, in the garden. The two former took her by the arms, and she could remember nothing farther till she found herself sitting on a step, and Mrs. Gibbons putting on one of her slippers. Mrs. Mulrairie said, "Only think of her walking so far without shoes." They then took her to Mrs. Bowditch's house, and thence to Holway-farm. She went up to a bed-room, where she saw a lady, named Mrs. Owens, and cried out, "What will become of me; Oh, that I was at my uncle's." Mrs. Mulrairie said, "You had better not let Mr. Bowditch hear you say that: however, I have had nothing to do with it." Mrs. Owens remarked, that "it was a most scandalous and abominable thing, that so young a creature should be left in this situation." Old Mrs. Bowditch then said, "You must come with me directly," led her into the kitchen, and forced her to drink a cup of something black and bitter like medicine. James and W. Bowditch afterwards led her through a field, and played her in a gig. Before they drove off, she was obliged to drink a cup of similar liquid, which she was sure was not tea, and which caused her to fall into a deep stupor. She could recollect nothing further till she heard James Bowditch, in the middle of the night, asking what o'clock it was. They soon after arrived at Thornford, at the house of Mr. Paul, who had married a daughter of Mrs. Bowditch. Mr. Paul walked up and down, and said in an exulting manner, "We shall now have all the bells in the parish ringing." Mrs. Paul asked if they had not had a tiresome journey, and James Bowditch replied, "Yes, I could hardly keep her in the gig; she was one minute laughing and another crying all the way." They afterwards conducted her into a room where a tall man was sitting in the window, reading some papers very earnestly. He asked her what was her age? she answered 16 years; and whether she had the consent of her friends or parents to be married; and she said no. He then observed it was plain this marriage could not be lawful. J. Bowditch gave her a severe look, but said nothing. The other added, "Never mind, you may be married just as well." She felt ready to fall, and was carried up stairs, where she remained till dinner time, going down just now and then for a short time. A Mr. Feniphar, a clergyman, dined that day at Mr. Paul's. She was induced much against her will to sit down at the dinner table, but could eat nothing. Being in the kitchen in the course of the day, she endeavoured to write a letter; but J. Bowditch entering, he snatched it from her, and said nobody could blame him if he used her ever so unkindly, and called her "a little b—h."—Cross-examined. "When at Holway-farm she sometimes rode out on a pony, and J. Bowditch occasionally assisted her on and off, as she was a bad rider. She walked out twice with him at her aunt's desire. He walked behind her, and they had no conversation. They were accompanied by her aunt's servant, Whitby, and the children. Two letters which were now shown her she declared were not in her hand writing. The rest of the witness's evidence under this head consisted chiefly in the simple denial of several questions put, touching the personal intimacy between her and the defendant, J. Bowditch."

Mr. Tuckett was again called, and deposed to the alteration in

Miss Glenn's manner after Mrs. Mulrairie's call. After being made acquainted with the design of sending her away to school, he was surprised to find her again tranquil and apparently in excellent spirits. She was the most affectionate creature he had ever known, and devoted to her mother and to his children. He was the more surprised that she should have exhibited so sudden a cheerfulness at the prospect of going to school, as she had never before appeared happy when separated from him. He saw J. Bowditch talking to his servant Whitby, on Sunday, near his premises, and on addressing them the former looked red in the face, and, slightly touching his hat, went away. His niece went to bed between 9 and 10 o'clock, and it was about 4 the next morning that Mrs. Tuckett, being much indisposed, went into her room, and discovered that she was gone. He adopted every means of sending in pursuit of her, and met Mrs. Mulrairie, who, with much agitation in her manner, informed him where Miss Glenn had been carried. He told her she had been carried off by a foul conspiracy, to which her reply was, that she had nothing to do with it, being a mere visitor at Mrs. Bowditch's, and that out of friendship to the young lady she had already written to acquaint him with the place to which she had been conveyed.

Maria Glenn was now again called, and being confronted with Mr. Oxenham, swore positively that he was the man she had seen at William Bowditch's house, and who there produced the second paper which she had been compelled to sign. Before Mr. Oxenham appeared, she described him as a short man, with black hair, and a greasy face.

Mary Whitby, the nurse-maid, confirmed all the material points of the preceding testimony, and directly negated the insinuation of any familiarity having subsisted between her and the defendant, James Bowditch. She undressed her, and saw her in bed on the night of Sunday, the 21st, and firmly believed that she entertained no idea of an elopement.

The Rev. Blakesby Cooper proved that he granted a license of marriage to James Bowditch, on his representation and parole oath, that Maria Glenn was of age, and had the consent of her relations.

This was the case for the prosecution, and

Mr. CASBERD addressed the Court on the part of the defendants; admitting that, if he could not overthrow the evidence of Maria Glenn, his case was necessarily hopeless.

John Oxenham is an attorney at Taunton; has been first copying-clerk to Mr. Kinglake, then articled clerk, and lastly, his successor in business; had seen Miss Glenn about four times, once when she came to the office with Mr. Henry James Leigh, the prosecutor's attorney; this was the latter end of last January. Swore most positively, that he never produced any writing to Miss Glenn before the meeting in January.

Mr. Sergeant PELL inquired for the letters which had been shown to Miss Glenn, but Mr. Casberd said he should not offer them in evidence.

Mr. Justice PARK observed, that it was for the Counsel to judge; but if they were not given, both he and the Jury must necessarily draw their own conclusions.

Mr. Casberd then reluctantly sent for the letters to Mr. Oxenham, and asked if they were the letters shown to Miss Glenn?

The letters were read; they were as follows:—

"MY DEAR JAMES,—In answer to your last letter, I writ you to buy the license, and assure you that I was 21 the 28th of last August; remember that I have no independent fortune; can there then be blame in our forming this alliance, when love, not interest, actuates the deed?—Yours, truly, Sept. 14, 1817.

MARIA GLENN.

"Mr. J. Bowditch, Holway-cottage."

The other was a note to Mrs. Mulrairie:—

"Miss Glenn sends her kindest love to Mrs. Mulrairie, and informs her it will be perfectly out of her power to see her before half-past twelve, to night, as her aunt and uncle both will be with her if she goes out to walk. She understands that she has something to communicate to her of consequence; if so, she would be obliged to Mrs. Mulrairie if she could write and inform her of it by the bearer.—Sunday morning."

Mr. Oxenham said, that when these were shown to Miss Glenn, she admitted the letter to James Bowditch to be her's, all but the direction; but totally denied the note to Mrs. Mulrairie.

Charles Paddy saw Miss Glenn almost every day; saw her accompanied by Mr. James Bowditch, generally resting his hand upon the mane of the horse. He had seen them more than ten times in that situation; he considered him a little in the sweet-hearting line. He had seen Bowditch take those liberties which a sweetheart would take; witness told Mr. Bowditch that he thought the young lady had a liking for him; and advised him to try for her: she came to him once, and asked him to catch the horse for her: witness asked her why Mr. James Bowditch would not do it: she said he was sulky and would not do it: he heard her ask him to go up and fasten the window for her; he did not go immediately, and whether he went up or not witness could not tell; they appeared upon terms of familiarity.

Samuel Mansfield had seen James Bowditch and Miss Glenn walking many a time arm-in-arm together in the farm and about the fields. He saw them in July and August; he had seen them in the summer-house many a time; they were very loving indeed. Witness had seen them in a waggon together, and Bowditch kissed her in the waggon: he had seen her in the kitchen sitting on his knee. He did not know Miss Glenn before she came to Mr. Bowditch's family.

Miss Glenn was again called in.

Mr. Sergeant PELL.—Now turn round to that lady.

Witness looked at her impudently.

Mr. Sergeant PELL.—Is that the young lady that did all that you have described?

Mr. J. PARK.—Is that the young lady who sat on his knee?

Witness.—Not in my presence: he saw her sitting on his knee; he saw Miss Glenn do so.

Mr. Sergeant PELL.—Was it that young lady?

Witness.—No; this is not the young lady. (At this answer, a strong feeling of indignation was manifested.)

Mr. J. PARK.—Then this is not the young lady you saw kissed in a waggon?

Witness.—No; I don't think it is. (The feelings of a crowded court could scarcely be suppressed.)

Mrs. Warren knew James Bowditch and Miss Glenn; that is her (pointing to her); she saw them together in September in the evening. Witness saw Mary Whitby come out and speak to J. Bowditch, and Miss Glenn came afterwards, and she spoke to him; Miss Glenn nodded with her head. J. Bowditch went on, and Miss Glenn followed, looked through the rails, turned up the steps, spoke to Mary Whitby, and ran after Bowditch as hard as she could, she overtook him, looked back to her uncle's house, took hold of his arm, and walked on. She could not tell the day, as she did not think she should ever be called on, although it occurred to her to be highly improper; she did not trouble herself about it. James Bowditch was a good looking young man.

Samuel Poole knew Mr. James Bowditch and Miss Glenn; he saw them walk together; she ran towards him; they talked a word or two, and then walked away arm in arm.

John Burroughs, a gardener, knew Miss Glenn and James Bowditch. He had seen them together in Northtown and other places.

Mary Priest, wife of Aaron Priest, lived at Taunton. Mrs. Mulrairie was staying at her house, and during that time Miss Glenn called, and asked if Mr. James Bowditch was there, and they called together once, and once she called when he was not there; and she sent witness to Mr. William Bowditch, to see if Mr. James Bowditch was there; she found him, and he came in about five minutes afterwards, and they walked away together; they seemed very fond of each other. She remembered the christening of Mrs. Mulrairie's child, and Mr. James Bowditch stood godfather, and Miss Glenn godmother; they all went to church, and witness carried the child; Miss Glenn dined with them in the kitchen. The christening took place at St. Mary Magdalen Church; and she was sure it was Miss Glenn who stood godmother, although she never saw her before; she was sure it was the young lady who sat near the place where she stood. Mr. Long was the clerk's name.

James Scarlett recollected being at Mr. Bowditch's house, when Miss Glenn was there: he saw them walking in the garden together one Sunday morning; he had seen them together in the kitchen many times; he recollected their going to a place called Gofton, together, about three miles off; they appeared very familiar.

Joseph Brown, a labourer, knew Miss Glenn. Miss Glenn came to witness and said she was going to be married to Mr. James Bowditch; and said, there he is in the passage, and she went to him again; she came back again, pulled out a ring, and said she was going to be married with it. Witness afterwards saw them go out towards St. Mary Magdalen Church; it was about ten o'clock when they went out, and they returned about twelve through the field. Witness said, "Miss, is the knot tied?" She said, "Yes, thank God, and it cannot be untied," and witness wished her joy.

Rev. George Templar, a clergyman and magistrate, was at Thornford in September: he dined at the house of Mr. Paul; there present Mr. Paul, Mr. James Bowditch, and two ladies, whom he never saw before; the lady in Court (Miss Glenn) was there; there was no sadness in her appearance; but, with respect to her, upon an observation made upon some man, Miss Glenn smiled, and the ladies afterwards withdrew from the table. Miss Glenn ate a hearty dinner; she ate some of the roasted beef and some apple pudding. The impression upon his mind was, that she ate her dinner in an ordinary way. He would not swear that he never told Dr. Thoopson he did not know whether she ate a good dinner or not. Mr. Paul is witness's uncle, and Miss Julia Paul was the sister of J. Bowditch.

Edmund Jones, sergeant to the last witness, remembered going to Mr. Paul's. Miss Glenn made a hearty dinner. In the evening witness saw Miss Glenn sitting on James Bowditch's knee, playing at dominoes with her arm round his neck. She appeared to be in good spirits.

Miss Sarah Bowditch said, she was acquainted with Miss Glenn's hand-writing. The letter produced she believed to be her hand-writing; it was letter A. The letter D. produced she believed to be also in her hand-writing. She had observed a great deal of impropriety in Miss Glenn's conduct, such as treading on her brother's toes, throwing handkerchiefs at him; &c.; she had seen her on his knee, and this kind of conduct continued until she went away. She was surprised to hear that her brother had taken her off from her uncle's house. Witness heard Miss Glenn's voice, but she did not get up, she put on her gown; she was surprised that Miss Glenn should be there at that time of night; she was in very good spirits; Miss Glenn used to play on the harp, but she did not play that night; Miss Glenn said she would have her brother; witness thought her a lady of very loose behaviour, indeed, she did; but she never said anything to her mother about her bad behaviour. It was not all that Miss Glenn could do that would corrupt her (witness's) morals.

Mary Orben knew Miss Glenn: was at Mrs. Bowditch's on the 22d of September. Miss Glenn came there between one and two o'clock, and she heard Mrs. Bowditch ask Miss Glenn why she took so imprudent a step, and in about ten minutes afterwards Miss Glenn came into her bed-room; and she appeared full of spirits. Mrs. Mulrairie had taken part of her clothes off to lie down with witness; Mrs. Bowditch had then got up. Miss Glenn asked Mrs. Mulrairie if she would go with her; Mrs. Mulrairie said she could not, as she was going to her husband the next day; Miss Glenn then said, "If you will not go, I must go by myself."

Francis Smith was at Mrs. Bowditch's on the night of the 21st of September. Mr. James Bowditch fetched him, and he went over at ten, and went from thence to town for the horse and gig, which he got and put it under the hay. Witness fell asleep, and Mr. James Bowditch told him he should not go to sleep. Shortly afterwards a young lady came out of the house, and got into the gig, and then James Bowditch went up into the gig, and the young lady said to William Bowditch, "Come up into the gig, and ride; there is plenty of room;" but he said, "No, he would come on upon his pony."

William Criddle was near the church-yard at Bradford, on the morning of the 22d of September, between six and seven o'clock, and he saw a gig coming up with a gentleman and lady in it, and a gentleman was riding. The lady and gentleman got out, and the lady took a small trunk from under where she sat, and handed it to the gentleman; they asked witness the way to Thornford, and they pursued that course, the lady taking hold of the gentleman's left arm.

Miss Glenn was again called and examined, never stood godmother to Mrs. Mulrairie's child; she never came out of her uncle's house, and went to French Wear-fields, arm-in-arm with James Bowditch; she never left her uncle's gate to walk with Bowditch; she was never in St. Mary Magdalen church at the christening of any of Mrs. Mulrairie's children; she never came out to meet James Bowditch, and to walk with him; never recollected having said that she was going to be married to Mr. James Bowditch. At the dinner spoken to by Mr. Templar, she ate very little beef, and saw no pudding; she never threw her arms round James Bowditch, never played blind man's buff with him; never trod upon his toes, or threw handkerchief at him; she did not say she would go by herself, if Mrs. Mulrairie would not go with her; she did not get into the gig first. Indeed, this young lady deliberately contradicted every important fact spoken to by the witnesses for the defence.

Mr. Long, parish clerk at St. Mary Magdalen, said, he knew Mrs. Mulrairie's child was christened; he believed the Bowditch family stood to her. Miss Glenn was not there. She was not the person who stood godmother.

Mary Whitby again examined.—Mrs. Mulrainé said, she should say that Miss Glenn was at the christening, and that she stood godmother to her child.

Mr. Tuckett said he had closely examined the letters A and B, and a small note, with the greatest minuteness; and he verily believed them not to be in the handwriting of Miss Glenn. Witness stated, that Mr. Templar said he had helped Miss Glenn to beef, but whether she ate it or not he could not tell, as he did not take much notice of her. He was positive that one of the Bowditch's stood godmother to the child. The Rev. Mr. Hunt Clapp was the clergyman, but he was in a bad state of health at present.

Sarah Northam lived nearly opposite Mr. Tuckett's house. Witness was called out by Mrs. Warren, who said, "Now you may see Miss Glenn and James Bowditch;" and witness came out and saw a young lady, who was in the road with Bowditch; she went over to the railing and shook hands with the nursery-maid with great eagerness; and she returned to Bowditch, took him by the arm, and went over the weir. Witness said if she saw any more of this, she would acquaint Mr. Tuckett of it; but witness's daughter was present and went to the weir to wash her hands, and to see if it was Miss Glenn; and, in the presence of Mrs. Warren, her daughter said it was not Miss Glenn.

Sarah Northam, daughter of the last witness, knew Miss Glenn. She was sure Miss Glenn was not the young lady with James Bowditch.

Here Mr. Sergeant PELL proposed to put two ladies into the box, who superintended Miss Glenn's education; and who would speak to the propriety of her general conduct.

The Learned Judge said, he could not receive such evidence. Mr. Sergeant PELL was about to reply, when Mr. Justice PARK suggested that the young lady might withdraw.—The Rev. Mr. Cooper, who had attended her during the day, said he was really afraid to go out alone; he requested Mr. Tuckett to accompany them. The Sheriff ordered the javelin-men to accompany them.

Mr. Sergeant PELL was about to reply; when the Jury begged him to afford them a few minutes' consultation. The Court acquiesced, and the Jury having consulted a few minutes, the foreman (Mr. Banks) observed, that it would be unnecessary for the Learned Sergeant to reply, or for his Lordship to sum up, they being satisfied that a conspiracy existed. However, they did not see any thing that implicated Elizabeth Snell, the housemaid. She was certainly, in some degree, concerned in the transaction, but without being so highly culpable.

Mr. Justice PARK acquiesced in the opinion of the Jury, as regarded Elizabeth Snell; and Mr. Sergeant PELL agreed that she should be acquitted.

The Jury then returned their verdict of Guilty against all the defendants, except Elizabeth Snell.

Mr. Justice PARK observed, that his own opinion perfectly coincided with that of the Jury. He was sorry to have occasion to observe, that the defence set up was so marked with infamy, that it seemed like a continuation of the same conspiracy against the happiness of the young lady; whom he could not but compliment for the firmness which she had displayed on the present occasion. He never saw a witness give better evidence, or one who better sustained a severe cross-examination; or one who listened with more patient resignation to the gross and abominable aspersions which the defendant's witnesses were continually throwing out against her character for modesty and virtue.

John Gullop, aged 29, was capitally indicted for assaulting Priscilla Brown, and by squeezing her throat, mouth, and nose, caused a suffocation, whereof she almost instantly expired.

Charles Brown is only eight years of age, but knew he was bound to speak the truth. He is the son of Priscilla Brown. He knew the prisoner; he had often seen him at his mother's house. The prisoner called him out; he was pretty sure it was he by his voice. His mother was at work; he could not tell what the prisoner said. Before he heard the voice, there were stones flung three times against the door, and his mother went first to the front door, then to the back-door, and then the prisoner spoke to her; she went out at the back-door, and went up the garden. She had no bonnet on; she never came back any more. Some time afterwards she was brought home dead.

Thomas Homer said, in May last he saw the prisoner (it was on the 14th) go by his house between nine and ten at night. Witness's house is about one hundred yards from the house in which the deceased lived. The prisoner was going towards Priscilla Brown's; he had on a brown great coat, which he did not often wear—it was a loose coat, dark brown, and rough. In about a quarter of an hour afterwards witness saw him come back.

John Serry deposed nearly to the same effect.

Ann Loveridge lived about 20 yards from the house of Priscilla Brown. On the 14th of May, about 10 o'clock, she was standing at her door, and heard a very loud cry; it was the cry of a woman, and witness believed it to be Priscilla Brown; it appeared as if the person was in distress. Witness heard it say distinctly, "Oh! the Lord have mercy upon me." She heard no more words, but heard one groan. She immediately communicated what she had heard to Elizabeth Rose, who lived next door. The voice appeared to come from the Back-lane, about twenty yards from the house.

Benjamin Romain lived in Bere-Regis; the prisoner lodged with witness. The prisoner quitted his lodgings about sun-set on the 14th of May; witness went to bed at half-past 10 o'clock; he lay awake a considerable time, and the prisoner never came home before without his hearing him, but he had not returned before witness went to sleep. The prisoner was taken up on the following morning, and the body of the deceased was before the Coroner at the time. The prisoner put his mouth to witness's ear and whispered, but spoke plainly, "Say I was in bed by 10 o'clock."

Mr. Thos. Nell, a surgeon, examined the body; he observed marks on the throat, mouth, and nose; and a blackness on the throat. From what he saw, the appearances were such as to induce him to believe she had come to her death by the violence. He should think that she was six or seven months gone with child.

Page Ross knew the prisoner: on the 1st of May he saw him thrashing. Prisoner asked witness if he had heard any thing about him that morning; witness told him he had not. The prisoner said, "They have got it about town that Cil Brown is with child by me; but I will be d—d if I know her a man from a woman, and if she swears it to me, d—n my eyes, if I will not murder her the next minute."

Elizabeth Harris was acquainted with the prisoner; he said to witness, and six or seven more, that he could kill a person in five minutes in a company, and nobody never the wiser, by taking of them by the throat and the nose. Witness said, "How can you do that?" and he said, "I will show you." Witness went towards him, and the prisoner put one hand to her throat, and the other to her nose, pressing the nostrils together and the throat at the same time.

Mr. Justice BURROUGHS.—Did he hurt you materially?
Witness.—Oh yes, my Lord, but he did not kill me. (A laugh.) I was obliged to fight him off with one hand.

The Prisoner being called on for his defence, entered at great length into a narrative of the manner in which he had been employed during the evening and night, but he did not call any evidence to bear him out in the assertions he so solemnly made. He declared that he was as innocent as the first moment he came into the world.

Two or three persons were called to speak to his character, but they appeared to know very little that was favourable to him.

Mr. Justice BURROUGHS summed up the evidence, and the Jury, after a short consultation, pronounced the prisoner guilty.—The learned Judge observed to the prisoner, that he had been found guilty of one of the foulest crimes that could be committed by man. The case was a horrible one, for he had destroyed a fellow creature with whom he cohabited, and it was much to be feared that he was too familiar with the mode by which that unfortunate woman came to her death. God forbid that he should have exercised it before. He begged him to look narrowly to the short space he would have to live, as he would certainly be executed on Monday, and he would implore him to remember, that his death would not clear his account hereafter. His Lordship then passed sentence on him in the usual way, and ordered that his body should be anatomized.—The prisoner received the verdict and sentence with an apparent indifference, and on quitting the dock, declared himself as innocent of the crime imputed to him, as he was when he was born.

MAIDSTONE, JULY 29.—Thomas Farrier was indicted for manslaughter, in killing Henry Richard Daniels, a child of three years and a half old, at Minge-ham, in this county.—The witnesses for the prosecution stated, that the prisoner had married the mother of the child, who was her son by a former husband; that on the 4th of April last, the child, having given some cause of offence to the prisoner, he shook it by its two arms, asking the child at the same time, if he was not ashamed of himself? The child answered, "Yes," and almost immediately after fell down, when it was observed that its eyes were fixed as if in convulsions. A surgeon was sent for, who arrived about two hours after, when he found the child in a dying state, having symptoms of concussion.

sion of the brain, and it died in about 40 hours after. A physician also attended, and, coinciding in opinion with the surgeon, directed the head to be opened, when an extravasation of the brain was discovered, which he considered caused the death. Both concurred that the shaking only could not have had that effect.—On cross-examination, it appeared that the shaking was not so violent as to excite any observation; that the prisoner was habitually fond of the child, and kind to him, and was much grieved at the occurrence.—He was therefore acquitted.

TRIAL OF HUSSEY FOR THE MURDER OF MR. BIRD.

FRIDAY, JULY 31.—The Court was this morning crowded to hear the trial of Hussey, for the murder of Mr. Bird and his housekeeper at Greenwich. Hussey was dressed in a black coat and waistcoat, and mixed pantaloons, and appeared composed. He is rather a tall man, with a mild-looking countenance, and possessing much the appearance of a person above his rank in life.—When the Clerk put to him the usual questions, "guilty or not guilty," and how would he be tried, he answered with a firm tone, and with something like a practised man, "Not guilty," and he would be tried by God and his country. A model of the premises was exhibited, representing the situation of Mr. Bird's house with respect to the academy where Hussey deposited his box with Litton, and the other buildings mentioned in the evidence.

Mr. Sergeant Oxlows detailed the circumstances of the case: he dwelt particularly on the late discovery of the hammer, and the evidence which contradicted the statements made by Hussey in his own defence, both in his examination before the magistrates, and in two letters found on his person, the one addressed to Mrs. Wamsley, and the other to his brother. These letters said, that he had embarked for America, though he was then in Oxfordshire, and that he had been all the Saturday night, from seven o'clock downwards, when the murder was committed, at the Tiger's Head, among the society that met there, called the Lodge of Odd Fellows. This last statement he would disprove by the evidence of persons who were there.—The whole evidence, he reminded the Jury, was circumstantial; but, according to a trite observation, circumstantial evidence was sometimes stronger than direct testimony, as circumstances could not be so easily falsified.

David Thomas lives next door to the late Mr. Bird; Mr. Bird, was 83 years of age. On the Sunday morning of the 8th, Mr. Bird's brother gave him information of his alarm at the house being shut up; they tried a door and broke it open. When in the kitchen, he went to the hall; he opened the back door to let in light, and then saw the body of Mary Simmons lying in the passage. Witness then saw Mr. Bird lying dead on his back in the parlour. Upon examining further, he observed blood on the floor of the hall. There was a track of blood by drawing the body; the head was cut, the ear was slit in two, part of the hammer was broken by her. When he saw Mr. Bird, he saw a candle and candlestick near his knees; between his arms lay his spectacles, which were broken. He went to Mr. Bird's bedroom, and found a double chest of drawers open, and every drawer was half open; the things in them appeared to have been turned over, and left in disorder.

Richard Smith, a magistrate, gave similar evidence.

Frederick Finch, a surgeon, found Mr. Bird slaughtered in the most horrible manner. He observed two remarkable indentations on the forehead about the size of a halfpenny. He observed a fracture from the front to the occiput. Any one of the wounds would have produced death, and from the parietal bone the brain had escaped. He had no doubt that the wounds were inflicted by an instrument, like a hammer, with a blunt cutting edge and a smooth. He observed also the head of Mary Simmons. He observed a depression on the os frontis which would have produced death. He observed other severe wounds. They were evidently produced by the same instrument, as the wounds were of the size of the cutting edge of a hammer. He had since seen the hammer, and he thought it would exactly produce the wounds he had described.

Kesiah Bell, a washer-woman, saw two shirts produced by Hodges, the constable, after the murders, and she was very sure she had washed them on the Monday mentioned. A handkerchief was likewise produced, which she thought Mr. Bird's.

John Litton lives at the Greenwich Academy. He knew the prisoner a year, who left a box at witness's house. The box was placed in a room not occupied by witness. Prisoner frequented witness's house, and knew every part of it. Witness kept his cooper's tools close by the kitchen. He had a cooper's hammer in the place before the murder of Mr. Bird, which he missed about ten days before that event. He made inquiries about it, but could not find it. It had a particular mark: its handle was split. Mr. Bicknell's clerk shewed him it in the presence of the Constable Hodges. He had previously described it to the Magistrates, and when he saw it, was certain it was the same hammer. Witness had frequently seen prisoner come to the box in the room. The box was not locked, only secured by a cord. The cord was changed, but witness did not notice when. It remained with witness three months.

Maria Litton, the wife of the last witness, remembered the loss of the hammer, and the search made for it. She did not think that matting or rubbish could be in the situation where the bundle was said to be deposited, without her perceiving it.

Jane Goddard was called. She appeared much agitated. She is related to the prisoner by marriage. Remembered a box being brought to her house. The box stood in the shop, and remained there three weeks before it was opened. Her husband opened it; and found the silver ladle, then sheets. The box was again opened about two or three hours afterwards, in the presence of some Gentlemen. Hussey came the next day after the box was brought, and opened it.

Joseph Goddard deposed to the contents of the box. He first saw a bundle, with a silver ladle. There was a pair of loose pantaloons, with a wine-strainer in the pocket. He saw also a waistcoat with sleeves. He saw on one of the sheets the letters G. S. B. L. He then gave information, after having corded up the trunk. Hussey was reckoned a humane honest man.

Thomas Hussey, the brother of the prisoner, who was exceedingly affected, lives at Peckham; he saw him about 4 or 5 o'clock on Sunday, when the murder was discovered. He had asked him to come and dine with him on that day. He did not come to dinner, but afterwards. When he arrived, he said he had taken something that had turned on his stomach, and asked witness if he had heard of the horrid murders. Witness said, no. Prisoner then said an old gentleman and his housekeeper had been murdered opposite where he lived. Witness asked why he did not come to dine, and he answered that it was owing to the shocking murder, which made Greenwich like a fair. Prisoner was dressed in a black coat and waistcoat, with mixed pantaloons. He received a legacy of 60*l* on the Wednesday after the murder.

Thomas Smith, High-constable, received pieces of silver-buckle from Thomas Hussey.

Thomas Hussey, being called, said he delivered the pieces to Mr. Smith the magistrate, and not to Smith the high-constable.

Thomas Smith, in continuation, said, that he received the pieces of buckle not from Thomas Hussey's wife, but from himself. He showed the pieces of buckle to the prisoner, who said those were part of the things that were in the bundle, that he found, remarking at the same time that they had been in the fire.

Elizabeth Goodwyn, the sister of the prisoner, much affected, deposed, that she lives at Peckham. The box came about the 8th of February; the prisoner had access to the box: he opened the box twice: she opened the box herself on the Thursday following, and found in it the two watches and the notes. Her husband and brother took them. There was on the watches the name of Bird.

James Goodwyn is a tailor, and the husband of the last witness. He saw watches which came from the box, but did not see them in the box. He examined the watch-papers, and on one of them was the name of Bird.

George W. Bird, the son of the deceased, identified the watches to be his father's, which were afterwards shewn to the Jury. The last time he saw it in his father's possession was ten days before his death.

Thomas Larkin is a constable: went to the house of Mrs. Goddard on the 14th March, and found a trunk. He found in it two shirts, three sheets, a silver wine strainer, a silver soup ladle, a pair of gaiters, a cotton pocket handkerchief, a pensioner's ticket, with the name of Charles Hussey on it. One of the sheets was marked R. B. another was marked B. at top, S. and G. forming a kind of triangle. Witness was at Mr. Bird's house about twenty minutes after the discovery of the murder. The gaiters had marks of blood and vomiting, and witness observed vomiting near the body of the housekeeper when he first went to the house on the Sunday of the murder.

Mrs. Litton said, the gaiters appeared to be those of Charles Hussey, but she could not say they certainly were his. She had seen on the strap on one of his gaiters, and remembered that the gaiters she sewed were the same colour, and every way the same as those produced, but she could not swear that they were the same.

Kesiah Bell deposed to the sheet marked B. G. S. being George Bird's, his wife's name being Sarah. She had washed the sheet many times. She remembered the sheet marked R. B., which belonged to the family. She knew the shirt likewise to be one of those she washed on the Monday previous to the murder. The other articles found in the trunk were said to be the prisoner's by Mr. and Mrs. Litton, to the best of their knowledge.

Richard Hodges, the constable, deposed to the other articles contained in the box deposited at Goddard's. The Bank notes were identified to be indorsed by his father. On every one of the notes was the signature of the deceased. The witness, Hodges, saw the hammer found in the pond in Mr. Smith's garden. [The hammer was produced, and identified by Mr. Litton, the cooper, to be his, one which he had lost before the murder. It was mended in the handle.]

John Poulton, the constable, in Oxfordshire, deposed that he apprehended the prisoner on the 1st of April, at Deddington. He took from him a watch and a pocket-book, with two letters. After the witness had searched the prisoner, he asked him for the rings he had heard he possessed. The prisoner said he put one of them down the privy at the King's Arms. It was searched for and found. It contained an inscription, "To the memory of six children." The prisoner said, this was the ring he had put down the privy. Mr. Bird identified the ring to be his father's, together with the watch, its seal, and chain.

John Vickery, the Bow-street officer, deposed to the prisoner's being brought to Bow-street by the last witness, and to a ring being found in searching his person, which dropt from his boot or pantaloons. Mr. Bird identified the ring to be his father's.

George Young was a servant at the Tiger's Head; he knew Hussey; he came to the Tiger's Head and stayed a fortnight after the murder. Witness knows a person of the name of Hazleton, who was a friend of the prisoner's. Witness recollected the Saturday when the murder was committed, but did not see Hussey till half-past 10 at night. There was a club called Odd Fellows that met at the Tiger's Head. He passed by the tap-room at half-past 10, and saw Hussey.

Mrs. Walmsley, who keeps the Tiger's Head, deposed; she did not see Hussey till within a few minutes of ten o'clock at night on Saturday the 7th of February, but that he might be in the tap-room an hour before.

John Sparks, a bricklayer at Greenwich, was in the tap-room of the Tiger's Head on Saturday night of the murder, from 8 to 11 o'clock. He saw Hussey in the tap-room first on that night about 20 minutes or half an hour past 10 o'clock. If the prisoner had been there before, he must have seen him.

Wm. Halkibone is Secretary of the lodge of the "Odd Fellows." The prisoner was there that night about a quarter past 9 o'clock. The lodge meets generally at 7 o'clock, but that night they did not meet till near 8, and the prisoner did not come till a long time afterwards.

Stephen Epsom was at the Odd Fellows' Lodge on Saturday, Feb. 7. He did not know what time Hussey entered, but it was about an hour before the lodge closed, which was at 10 o'clock.

Wm. Coulter was at the Odd Fellows' Club on Saturday night. Hussey was there, but he did not arrive till 20 minutes before 10 o'clock.

Mrs. Bennet proved that he dined with her about one o'clock on Sunday the 8th of Feb., and left her house about three.

The Prisoner was then asked what he had to say for himself. He declared his innocence. He said, about 7 o'clock on Saturday he went to sell some clothes at a woman's house, though she could not recollect any thing of this. He went then to an eating-house called Perret's. He stooped to hear some singing in the street, and went then to the Tiger's Head about half-past eight o'clock. He then stated what had happened in the lodge at the Tiger's Head. He then related a long irrelevant story about his conduct on Sunday, and afterwards. He repeated this string of incoherence with considerable fluency and composure. No look of terror appeared in his face, but he seemed fatigued by standing in a crowded Court for so many hours, from 10 in the morning till 6 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Serjeant Lens, who sat as Judge, then summed up. The Learned Serjeant had said that the evidence of circumstances was stronger than testimony, but still it must depend upon testimony. The circumstances of the murder could not be doubted; but the question was, were they brought home to the individual at the bar? The time within which the murder must have been perpetrated was nearly fixed. The murder must have been committed between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock. The deceased was a man of regular habits, and went to bed before 10. The supper was prepared; the potatoes were in the oven; the water was boiling; and the table-cloth was about to be laid on the table. The Jury had heard a circumstantial account of the state in which the bodies and the house were found. There was almost no doubt that the woman was coming to the door when the crime was perpetrated, and that Mr. Bird was in the attitude conjectured. The Learned Judge then went over the evidence. He made towards the conclusion a very solemn charge to the Jury, desiring them to make up their minds, and pronounce their conscientious conviction, however fatal it might be to the prisoner at the bar. He spoke two hours.

The Jury, without retiring, after a consultation of a few minutes, returned a verdict of Guilty. The prisoner, who had during the whole day maintained a firm and intrepid aspect, now became agitated and pale. He exclaimed that he was as innocent as the Judge who sat on the bench, and that he was ready to meet death to-morrow with such a conviction.

The Learned Judge then prepared to pronounce the awful sentence of the law, which he did with great solemnity and feeling. It was a painful duty to him to attend to this day's proceedings, and the most painful part of it still remained to be performed. After what the Court had heard he wished the prisoner had spared the declaration he made of his innocence. He hoped he would still be brought to repentance for his crime, of which there could remain no doubt in the mind of any reasonable man; and in the few hours which yet remained, that he would make his peace with God, from whom all disguise was ineffectual or impossible. In this way he might secure pardon above, while there was no chance of it here. Nothing now remained for him but to pronounce the sentence of the law, which was; that the prisoner be taken hence to the place from whence he came, and on Monday be carried to the place of execution, and there hung by the neck till dead, and his body given to be anatomized, and the Lord have mercy on his soul.

At the conclusion of the sentence, the prisoner cast an anxious agonizing look towards the bench, apparently wishing again to address the Judge. He did not do so however, but retired under charge of the officers without speaking. His composure and firmness of nerve during the whole trial was remarkable. If any thing could have affected him, it was the conduct of his sister and brothers, who were so overpowered by their feelings in giving their evidence, they could neither look towards him or the Court. His sister especially seemed overwhelmed, and wept bitterly. Towards the evening the crowd without the Court was immense, and their anxiety to know the verdict extreme; but there were no testimonies, either of satisfaction or disapprobation, shown at the result. The trial lasted from ten o'clock in the morning till near ten at night.

[An action was tried before the above, in which Mr. Clement, the Proprietor of the Observer, was defendant. It was for a libel upon Mr. Lewis, an Attorney, alleged to be contained in an article in the Observer, respecting proceedings in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, which charged the plaintiff with gross oppression and cruelty towards an insolvent.—The declaration contained a great many counts, to which there was as many pleas—1st, the general issue, not guilty; and 2dly, a justification that the alleged libel was a correct report of what occurred before the Court. To these pleas there were replications traversing the truth of the report, on which issue was joined.—After a full hearing, the Jury found for the defendant generally; upon which it was agreed that the verdict should stand for the plaintiff on the 1st, 2d, and 6th counts, and for the defendant on the remaining counts.]

THE EXAMINER.

LONDON, AUGUST 2.

THE Paris papers again allude as little as they can help to the conspiracy; but there are uneasy symptoms at Court. Baron VITROLLES has been struck off, in a very summary manner, from the list of Ministers;—a paper has been circulated at Paris, in which MONSIEUR, the King's brother, is made to talk of the conspiracy as our conspiracy; and the King, on Monday last, was to go to a palace which he has not visited since his return, and where he was to meet the members of his family. That the family could conspire against each other, may be easily imagined, both from their past history, and from present agitations. But it is now supposed by some, that the conspiracy has been "got up," as an additional excuse for keeping the Allied armies in the neighbourhood of France, and familiarizing Europe at large to the sight of a standing army. Oh America, America! No wonder they are jealous of thee.

America Papers to the 4th ult. arrived yesterday morning, containing the articles of capitulation agreed upon between General JACKSON and the Governor of Pensacola. By these articles it is stipulated that the garrison, and some persons connected with the civil administration of Pensacola, shall be conveyed to Havannah, the troops to march out with all the honours of war. It appears from a Proclamation issued by General JACKSON, dated the 28th of May, that the atrocities of the Seminole Indians, upon the frontier settlements of the United States, have occasioned this proceeding. Spain was not able to restrain those incursions, therefore Pensacola was seized, and is to be held by America till the former Power "can furnish military strength sufficient to enforce existing treaties." The National Intelligencer of the 4th July, talks of a rumour that General JACKSON was "proceeding to capture the almost impregnable fortress of St. Augustine, the garrison of which consisted only of about 100 men." St. Augustine is the capital of East, as Pensacola is of West, Florida; and the possession of those two places would render the ultimate acquisition of the Floridas themselves of easy performance. "Unquestionably (says the Courier) the operations of America in that quarter ought not to be viewed with indifference. Spain is the country which would be least affected with regard to national interests, by the loss of the Floridas."

A letter from the Cape of Good Hope, dated the 9th of May, states, that by an arrival there from Calcutta, accounts were received of the 20th February, "that Lord HASTINGS had signed a Peace with HOLKAR and SCINDIAH, and that the troops were ordered into cantonments.—Courier."

No disturbances have actually broken out at Manchester, or its neighbourhood; but, in consequence of the continuance of so large a body of journeymen voluntarily out of employ, the Magistrates of Manchester have thought it prudent to have a military force near at hand, lest any riot should break out; and at their desire, Sir JOHN BYNG has detached some troops to Manchester and its vicinity.—Courier."

Reports being in circulation that the soldiers have been sent into Manchester to suppress riots which had arisen in that town; we have authority to say that they are without foundation. No riots had arisen; but on account of so large an assemblage of unemployed people, troops had been sent from Liverpool and Chester, to be stationed in the neighbourhood of Manchester, as a measure of precaution, in order to assist the Magistrates in case any disposition to rioting should actually appear.—Sun."

One of our contemporaries observes, and we fear truly, that "The illness of her MAJESTY is a total decay of nature, and a daily increasing morbidity in all those parts, the energy, or at least the regular motion of which, is necessary to the functions of life. What usually occurs in this disease, and which is always the last stage of it, has some time since commenced in her MAJESTY. A quantity of water has already accumulated in the chest and stomach."—Courier."

The Marquis of HERTFORD and family left town on Wednesday last, for Ragley-hall, in Warwickshire, where they meant to stay until October, when the Marquis and Marchioness will return to Manchester-square, preparatory to the usual trip to Shrubburne-hall, in Suffolk. The latter place is expected to be more than usually gay during the sporting season. The PRINCE REGENT and a large party are already invited.—Courier."

The PRINCE REGENT dined with the French Ambassador on Thursday; and in the evening, M. Comte, the celebrated Ventriloquist, had the honour of offering some of his samples of ventriloquism. At the same time he executed a number of tricks, which drew from the PRINCE applause at different intervals. His Royal Highness was principally struck with surprise at finding in his own pocket some jewels, which M. COMTE, by his dexterity, had taken from different persons, and for which he deigned to compliment M. COMTE!—Daily paper."

CASE OF CRAWLEY.—It is right to state, that though Messrs. WILSON and SURTEES belong to what is termed "The Committing List" of Bankrupt Commissioners, they were not on service when Mr. CRAWLEY was sent to prison two years ago, who has just obtained his enlargement by order of the CHANCELLOR. As far as we are enabled to judge of this case, it is one of peculiar hardship. The Commissioners required Mr. CRAWLEY to bring his account books before them. He told them that he could not, for they were kept from him by a creditor (whom he named.) Without, apparently, the slightest inquiry into the truth of the bankrupt's assertion of his inability to do that which they required, these Commissioners ordered him to prison, where he has been shut up for two long years,—though, as we learn, it was quite true that he could not prevail on the person who had his books to give them up for examination. It was this person, if he acted illegally, and not Mr. CRAWLEY, who should have been punished by the Commissioners—but they will doubtless be made to answer for their conduct in due time.

Most of our readers are doubtless aware, that Mr. HONE, who so successfully defended himself against the Crown and its Law Officers, has commenced business as a bookseller upon Ludgate-hill. He adds to this employment that of an auctioneer, and he possesses a very good room for the sale of pictures and articles wanting light and space. We notice Mr. HONE's present pursuits, thinking that it may possibly be of some use to him in his honest endeavours to support his large family. He has at this moment some pictures on view, and among them one attributed to L. DA VINCI, of Christ among the Doctors, which is exactly the same in size and subject as the one in the British Institution last year; but which is the original we cannot say,—perhaps neither.

Madame V—, of Caen (says the Journal de Paris), who was declared by the Tribunal of that city guilty of adultery, has been condemned to two years imprisonment.—Another spouse of the same city, not choosing to leave to justice the task of avenging an infidelity of which he believed his wife to be guilty, threw her over the window.—The French Journalist does not think it worth while to add what became of the Lady after this extraordinary exit; but states, that the brute of a husband has been sent to jail, to answer for this new mode of getting rid of a faithful wife.

WINE.—“Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes?—They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine.—Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright:—At the last, it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.”—Proverbs, ch. 23. v. 29, 30, 31, 32.—We recommend the perusal of the whole chapter to Sir WM. CURTIS and men like Sir WILLIAM. He may possibly remember the beginning verses:—“When thou sittest to eat with a Ruler, consider diligently what is before thee; and put a knife to thy throat if thou be a man given to appetite.”

In the shop-window of a Pawn-broker near Clare-market there have been exposed, within these few days, two 1*l*. Notes, which, on being presented at the Bank, have been declared forgeries. The face of them has the word “forged” in large characters stamped thereon; they are tolerable imitations, and appear executed in a style easy to deceive. From this circumstance, it seems the Bank have discontinued detaining these things, and are content to mark them in such a manner as to prevent their circulation. This alteration in their proceedings has arisen, it is said, in consequence of the verdict obtained against them for false imprisonment, in an action before Lord Ellenborough, during the late term, in which damages to the amount of 50*l*. were awarded.

HUMANITY TO DUMB ANIMALS.—The Governors of the Free Grammar School, Birmingham, have received from the Executors of the late THOMAS INGRAM, Esq. of Ticknell, near Bewdley, a legacy of 600*l*. the interest of which they are directed to apply to the payment of a Clergyman or Clergymen, who shall annually preach in the Parish Churches or Chapels of Birmingham, or elsewhere, as the said Governors shall direct, Sermons to encourage and enforce merciful and kind treatment towards all dumb animals, but more especially towards the horse.

Abraham Thornton, whose trial for the murder of MARY ASHFORD excited such deep interest, has since his discharge been living in the house of his parents at Castlebromwich. He has not yet returned to any employment, but passes his time in a kind of moody inactivity, and almost entirely alone; whilst his miserable father (a most respectable man, and steward to a gentleman of property in his neighbourhood) is fast sinking into a premature grave with a consumption, brought on by intense anxiety of mind.

We give a full account of the trial of Hussey, at Maidstone, for the murders of Mr. BRAD and his housekeeper. After a very patient investigation, the crime was fully brought home to the wretched man, who will be executed on Monday.

MR. JOHN WILLOCK AND THE WESTMINSTER DISPENSARY.

SIR,—When a man of humble birth, and limited education, starts forth to the wonderment of mankind, a meteor of Learning, Eloquence, and Patriotism, an example of all that is liberal, noble, and dignified, he is fully entitled to a niche in the Temple of Fame, as an example to future ages.

This tribute of applause, so justly due to Mr. John Willock, of Golden-square, House Agent, Sworn Appraiser, and Esquire, will no doubt occupy a distinguished place in the next edition of Mavor's British Nepos, for the benefit of the rising generation, when such a name cannot fail to eclipse all the celebrated characters there recorded. But praise so justly due ought not to be delayed an hour: that old age and youth may derive every benefit from this sublime example, your paper in the two last numbers, catching the glories of the day, has so far only done justice to such peerless magnanimity and consistency.

Every circumstance connected with an individual so highly distinguished must be deeply interesting to the public. I therefore beg leave to send you the following account of the conduct and feelings of this singularly amusing personage, as “Vice President and Treasurer of the Westminster General Dispensary,” whose government, until a few years ago, had become nearly despotic, under this mighty Monarch of St. James's.

During his happy reign, matters were managed in such a manner, that it might be said there was no Committee. At the annual election in June 1815, the general meeting, as usual, consisted it is said of four or five persons, one of whom observing, from the minute book, that a quorum of three, to form a Committee, could seldom be obtained, found, on inquiry, that no proper means were adopted to secure active members; they were generally the same persons nominated by the Secretary. Notice of their being elected was given, it is true, but no answer being required, no responsibility was incurred, and no one felt himself bound to attend. The Secretary said this was the usage and the law, in which last, it afterwards appeared that he was altogether mistaken. Being required to turn to the law in the books, he could not point out where a single law was to be found! there was no index, and, for twenty years, even marginal notes had been discontinued. The laws had never been extracted for the guidance of meetings, in consequence of which the experience of past years was entirely useless, the result of discussions not being tangible. On the recollection of the Secretary, therefore, and on the will of Mr. Willock, the whole government depended of an Institution, relieving until then upwards of 3000 poor objects annually.

This being the root of decay in the Charity, directions were given to the Secretary to require a distinct answer from individuals, whether or not they accepted of the office until an efficient Committee should be completed. By what means the Secretary (a most worthy man) was induced to disregard this order, whether of his own accord or by the will and command of a superior power, is not known; it was disregarded—the measure however was insisted upon—and from that time to this, meetings have been fully attended, and the utmost activity has prevailed. Thus was a Committee or little Parliament forced on his mock Majesty of St. James's, and in violation of every principle of divine right.

Now came the tug of war between King and Parliament, and, as will ever be the case, the latter prevailed. King John had been accustomed to issue his orders to his Secretary of State, from the Palace of Golden-square, to attend meetings being quite unnecessary. His name therefore did not appear on the books, as present, for many years, except at an election, or when it was proposed to change a tradesman; or when he might appear to command the patronage of the Institution. Feeling, however, that Church and State were now in danger, and probably afraid that even Popery itself might creep into the Charity, he felt it necessary to present himself, and take his place on the Throne, that he might crush and extinguish his rebellious subjects by the thunder of his eloquence, and reduce them to ashes by the lightning of his eye. The state carriage was accordingly ordered out to bring his Majesty from Golden-square to Gerrard-street,—a distance of at least 200 yards, where it remained at the door, in terrorem, and that he might offer some one a cast in “his carriage,” if only to the distance of 20 or 30 yards.

His Majesty had for so many years condescended to preside in person at the annual dinners, that he often boasted of being permanent Chairman. At the above meeting, when means were to be adopted to elect a new Secretary, it was communicated that his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex had consented to take the chair at the next anniversary. “The Duke of Sussex!” exclaimed the indignant Monarch, “The Duke of Sussex!”—what have we to do with the Duke of Sussex? “If he is to be there I’ll not attend.”—O tempora, o mores! I’ll not attend! I—myself—Mr. John Willock, of Golden-square, House Agent, Sworn Appraiser, Auctioneer, and Esquire, would not disgrace myself by sitting down at the same table with his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex!—When the day arrived, his Royal Highness being taken ill, the chair was filled by — Byng, Esq. M.P. for Middlesex; and not being offered to Mr. Willock, he, for the first time, did accordingly absent himself.

In the mean time, at different meetings the exertions of one gentleman were particularly directed to obtain a resolution, that an index to the books should be prepared; but in vain, for his Majesty had still a strong party in the Committee. It was urged, that, without an index, records were of no use; that real business was and must ever be impeded by repeated discussions on mere matters of form, which, during 40 years, had been settled again and again; while, by referring to them, business might proceed; whereas the best friends of a Charity would soon become tired of such endless and unnecessary debates; that at least the laws ought to be extracted for the direction of meetings.

“Laws! Laws!” exclaimed King John, in the triumphant tone of Divine Right, “what have we to do with Laws! as if we were a Parliament of the Nation! Laws! I must insist upon it that the word Law shall not be mentioned in this house—we want no Laws—we have gone on very well for 40 years without Laws, and we don’t want no Laws—not a word about Laws! Laws!—Laws indeed!”

But, Sir, said Mr. —, shall it be said that this Institution is governed by no Laws—that we are a lawless assemblage?

“Order, Order!” thundered King John, knocking loudly with his hammer thrice, “I will not have the word Laws—I have said so.”

Well, Sir, said Mr. —, what word shall I use? may I say Regulations?

Yes, yes, Regulations is quite another thing—Regulations is good—that’ll do—but as for Laws—did any one ever hear of Laws in a Charity?

It unfortunately happened that Mr. — was outvoted:—at a subsequent meeting he tried it again; but in vain.

A considerable interest having by this time for a year been exerted in behalf of the Institution, Mr. — thought it prudent, for the good of the Charity, to offer terms of peace to King John, at St. James’s Church, when the anniversary sermon was preached: the offer was immediately accepted.

The election of a new Committee took place in a few weeks, and Mr. — was privately informed, that his Majesty meant to attend with his whole force, to turn out those who were obnoxious to him. The day arrived, when there appeared such an attendance of Governors as had not been seen for many years.

His Majesty opened his Parliament with a speech from the Throne. Unfortunately no short hand-writer had been invited to attend. The substance however was a fresh declaration of war.—The following are some of the passages:—

“Hu-hu-hem—Gentlemen—we have had much dissension in this here Charity of late—hu-hu-hu-hem—its high time we should put an end to all this—hu-hu-hem—We have got some people among us who wants to make themselves men of consequence, like young officers in a regiment, wants to set us all to rights—hu-hu-hem—w’ll shew them what we can do.”

Mr. — expressed his concern and astonishment at such sentiments, after what had taken place only a month before at St. James’s Church; but since he had determined on war, the interest of the Charity required that the battle should be fought.

“Oh, Mr. —,” said his Majesty, “if you think you can do as you please here, you will find yourself mistaken; while I am in the chair, you will find you have got the wrong sow by the ear.”

I care not, replied Mr. —, whether I have a sow or a hog by the ear. I shall do my utmost in defence of the Charity and its good government.

The Meeting then proceeded to elect a Committee, but from the difficulty of referring to the books, there was no possibility of immediately ascertaining the law on this subject. After a long and warm debate the ballot was carried,—whereby, if any were afraid of tax-collectors, they were enabled to vote as they pleased.—When the ballot was closed, to the horror, astonishment, and discomfiture of King John, it appeared that Mr. — and other sincere friends to order and regularity were triumphantly elected at the head of the list.

“Wish you joy,” exclaimed his Majesty.—“Thank you,” said Mr. —, “if my conduct has met with your approbation, I shall endeavour to make myself still more agreeable to you.”

Since the above election Mr. Willock has not shewn himself at the Dispensary, except at the meeting lately, and occasionally to give a vote at an election—Peace and harmony have prevailed, and instead of the former apathy, the utmost energy pervades every department.

Those persons who were in the habit of saying, “we have got some reformers among us, but they will only flounder in it,” may be enabled to judge of their prophetic talents, by the high rank which this Dispensary now holds as a Medical Institution.—I am, &c.

A GOVERNOR OF THE WESTMINSTER GENERAL DISPENSARY.

P.S. A circumstance lately occurred, which shews that Mr. Willock is still a friend to the Institution, by attending a Charity Sermon at Mary-le-bonne Church, when, at the principal door, in a tone and manner peculiar to himself, conciliatory, dignified, and elegant, he demanded the plate from a gentleman, one of the Stewards, out of respect to whom that station was given—in vain did he remonstrate and represent that this duty was allotted to him—"I don't care for that," replied this bustling bundle of impotence and vulgarity—and seized the plate, that he might on an occasion so public still seem to be a great man in the charity;—and lest people should pass him unobserved,—he exerted his eloquence in the true Beadle twang, with, "Pray remember the Westminster General Dispensary,—Pray remember," &c. &c.—Few who had not served the office could have acquitted themselves so well.

ITALIAN OPERA.

MOZART'S Opera of Così fan tutte has been revived here, and most delightfully. It is one of his best, ranking next to Figaro and Don Giovanni; it is altogether taken up with those subjects and feelings, which MOZART played to in so happy a manner,—gallantry, arch humour, gracefulness, laughing enjoyment, voluptuousness, and an occasional pathos which is rather the suspension of pleasure than the sufferance of pain.

This opera too has the advantage of being simpler and more obvious in its incidents,—of telling its own story better, than any we have ever witnessed. There are six people in it, two pair of whom are the lovers, who vow eternal constancy. (FANON, CORI, BEGREZ, and GARCIA),—the fifth an old gentleman (NADU) who is always laughing at them for it,—and the sixth, a servant girl (MORT) who joins with the men in a plot to try the fidelity of the ladies, which the good old gentleman in the first instance warned them against, and which, we must say, is tried with a vengeance. It may have been wrong in the two ladies, whose lovers have apparently taken leave for the army, to listen to the same lovers in disguise, and to feel the courage of their constancy shaken by besiegings, and melancholy implorings, and supposed takings of poison. They ought doubtless to have spared not one kiss of compassion, whatever their notion was of the attachment of the sufferers. They ought, if not to have kicked them into atoms, at least to have let them suffer on as much as they pleased, and drink poison like eau de vie. But unfortunately, they were made of too pitiful stuff; and of course the lovers have to regret their success, and to forgive them upon the ground of the "natural viciousness" of the sex. Così fan tutte, says the play; "It's the way of them all;" and so we must think the worst of it, and then make the best. O wise we!

This is also perhaps the most completely performed opera on the stage. All the singers are at home, with some exception on the part of Miss CORI, who is a good singer, but wants spirit as an actress. The fault of GARCIA, an excellent singer, is of another sort;—he is over-vivacious, if not in his gestures, in his attitudes; and while standing still, as an Irishman would say, keeps writhing and bending himself about like an elephant's trunk. He makes also such doleful mouths when he is pathetic, that he appears to taste the bitterness of his sorrow literally in his mouth. He seems to want a lump of sugar after it.

What an inexhaustible succession of beautiful airs and harmonies is there in MOZART! One combination after another does not start out with a more sparkling facility in the far-famed Kaleidoscope. The first thing you hear in the present opera is the ardent trio, beginning La mia Dorabella, in which the lovers praise their mistresses, and insist that the old gentleman shall give proofs of their possible infidelity; then comes, like a gentler note to the same purpose, the other of E la fede delle femmine, the sounds of which absolutely talk and gesticulate; then the happy and polite one of Una bella serenata, with that gentlemanly willingness of assent on the line Ci sarete, sì signor, like a bow itself; then the triumphant noises of Bella vita militar; then the little sobbing farewell, and entreaty to write every day, Di scrivermi ogni giorno;—the invocation for gentle winds on the voyage, Souave sia, with those delicious risings of the voice, like a siren's from the water; the exquisite laughing trio, E poi ridete, with its slippery rhymes, its uncontrollable and increasing breathlessness, and the grave descending notes of the pitying old gentleman in the base; the quiet triumph and lingering enjoyment of Un'aura amorosa; the nodding and gentle giddiness of Prendo quel brunettino; the breathing passion of Secundate; the smiling insinuation of Il core vi dona. What do we not owe to an art and a master like this, who as it were spoke music as others speak words; and who left his magic imprinted for ever in books, for the hand and the voice to call forth, whenever we want solace in trouble, or perfection in enjoyment!

CRITICISMS UPON THE BAR.

No. 2.—MR. SCARLETT.

Omnibus enim rebus is, qui princeps in agendo est, ornatisimus et paratissimus esse debet.—Cic. in Q. Cæcilium.

An excellent writer has said, that "eloquence is the common child of freedom and knowledge;"* and the remark is verified, if verification were needed, by the present state of the English Bar, as I endeavoured to shew in the introductory article of last week, where, among other causes of the decline of oratory in our Courts of Justice, two were principally rested upon,—the absence of nearly all independence of mind, and the confinement of knowledge almost to the mechanism and drudgery of the profession. In a soil so cold and shallow, eloquence can never flourish; it can never strike wide and deep the spreading roots through which it must draw its nourishment; or if by any accident a seed should fall upon better ground, it can never attain luxuriance or perfection, if the blossoms and burgeons are so unmercifully cropped and clipped by the hand of self-sufficient authority. If, for the sake of impartiality, it be admitted that efforts to break through the trammels are sometimes repressed by Lord ELLENBOROUGH, because he revolts at any attempt to impose upon the good sense of a Jury, it must also be allowed, that it is at least very questionable whether such interference be a part of the province and duties of a Judge; whether one man has a right to assume that he sees more clearly than twelve others, whose understandings he is to take under his protection? But setting aside that point, it ought at least to be recollected, that though one individual may be gifted with extraordinary penetration, it does not follow, that his eleven brethren of the Bench possess the same faculty and in the same degree: indeed the contrary in most instances must be the fact; and supposing that the ends of justice are not often defeated by Lord ELLENBOROUGH's precipitation, by other Judges she may be made a cruel instrument of oppression, because they may think fit to pursue a system of servile and contemptible imitation.

Yet the submissiveness, the crouching acquiescence, the want of independence of mind, so generally deplored, and which has led to the total disuse of Advocates in political and party prosecutions, is not confined merely to the Court of King's Bench, where the Lord Chief Justice presides—the system of imitation extends to the Counsel as well as to the Court; and if the deference be not in all the Courts quite so humiliating, it only arises from the circumstance, that there, indictments for libels upon the government or officers of state are not heard. If however the venue, as it is called, be laid in the country, and not subsequently changed, the case is tried at the Assizes before the Judge who may happen to go that circuit; besides, any Barrister in any of the Courts may be heard in the King's Bench, if he will venture to take a brief on a party question, or if a defendant will venture to trust him with one; so that, in truth, it comes to pretty nearly the same thing. Throughout the whole of this part of the profession, with a few honourable exceptions (of which Mr. SCARLETT is undoubtedly one) there prevails the same sort of contempt for every species of attainment that is not subservient to the miserable technicalities that encumber their capacities. Some have never learnt any thing else; but others, and not a few, reject all their early acquirements and glory in the absurd intricacies of pleas, counterpleas, demurrers, rejoinders, rebutters, sur-rebutters, and all that heap of trash, which makes counsel rich and clients poor;—such are doubly despicable; the rest are mere low-souled blockheads—

For sure a fool I do him firmly hold
That loves his fetters though they be of gold.

Sp. F. Q. B. 3, C. 9.

That Mr. SCARLETT belongs to either of these classes no one will imagine for a moment, who has heard or seen any thing of the proceedings of our Courts within the last five or six years; yet there is not a man at the bar who has a stronger relish for the niceties and subtleties of his pursuit: his admiration seems even sometimes to extend to its complicated and absurd formalities; but this is a mistake: he feels, I am convinced, as supreme a contempt for them as any generous free-spirited student, when first he sets himself to the hateful task of narrowing and subduing his intellect to the comprehension of them. He is a man of great ingenuity and acuteness,—capable of drawing the most subtle and delicate distinctions; and while he despises the mere forms, invented like all other quackery to puzzle the ignorant, he enjoys the curious niceties and refinements to which they not unfrequently lead: he delights in making them as clear to others as to himself, and his countenance, generally good-humoured, and always intelligent, lights up with peculiar brightness while illustrating a point of this kind. To use a phrase of Sir THOMAS BROWNE, he seems to take pleasure, in the first instance, in “posing the understanding,” in losing it in the labyrinths of the law, and then in producing his clue, and shewing how simple the whole matter was when properly viewed. In this particular he stands almost alone: many others perhaps can rival him in the faculty of analysis or simplification, and the power of confounding what is intelligible is a very vulgar attainment among lawyers; but none seem to possess the double quality of first involving a question and then explaining the difficulty, as it were, by that very involution. Until this is understood, Mr. SCARLETT would appear a sort of contradiction of what is above advanced; for he is a lover of learning and of learned men, an admirer of art and its professors—a man of liberal thoughts and liberal acquirements, and yet, to cursory observers, a lover of many of the technicalities of special pleading*.

This extreme ingenuity and subtlety were in some respects of more use to him before he obtained a silk-gown than at present: he has now deservedly become the leading Counsel of the Court in which he practices—the King's Bench; and the greater part of his emoluments arise out of what is termed Nisi prius business, or the trial of actions before a Jury. Arguments upon points of pleading, upon dry technicalities, as well indeed as upon more general questions of law, are chiefly confided to the Juniors, who have more time to study the case, and to hunt up the authorities; for this reason, during term the Seniors have apparently but little to do.—I mean, contrasted with the ostensibility and bustle of their engagements in the Sittings: they are seldom employed; but on matters immediately arising out of the suits, they have conducted at Nisi prius; so that some of the peculiar gifts of Mr. SCARLETT are now very much thrown away. Indeed, at first, after he took his seat within the bar, they were sometimes positively disadvantageous to him, for he not unfrequently refined beyond the comprehension of the Jury, who have been afraid, where the main facts were with him, to give a verdict in his favour, lest they should, in a manner, have been cheated into it by the Advocate. Of late, however, he has in a great degree overcome this propensity; yet it still remains a drawback upon the praise which, in most respects, he eminently deserves.

Although I have seen nothing of Mr. SCARLETT but in public, he may be safely pronounced to be a very accomplished, and what usually follows, a most unaffected, unpretending man: he never quotes Greek to a Jury, (as was done by a late learned and laughed-at Lord), though he has been heard to repeat a few words to the Court: he sometimes, in his addresses, employs a line or two from the Latin writers, but always rather as if the sentence had involuntarily escaped his lips; than as if it had been studiously sought for and laboriously applied. False quantities (a fault not avoided by all at the bar who adventure upon learned citations) are never heard from him; and there is something peculiarly fascinating about his voice and pronunciation. He seems also to be sufficiently acquainted with modern languages, though he does not ostentatiously thrust them forward, in imitation of a paltry smatterer of the last generation of King's Counsel, who in the effort to shew his learning, invariably betrayed his ignorance.—Mr. SCARLETT's references to matters of history, or to general literature, are sparing; but they would probably be more common, did not the extent of his practice almost preclude him in ordinary cases from making long speeches. Though he is a very accomplished man, he is far from being a perfect orator: his voice is musical, and his action not offensive, though in too small a compass; but with regard to language, he appears to have a contempt for every thing like pomp of diction: he forms his periods upon no model, shunning whatever may look like art and construction. He will usually prefer a short word to a long one, even though the latter would sometimes better suit his purpose, and add greatly to the force and fulness of the sentence; as if he were determined that he would not fall under the ordinary reproach,—

—This lawyer hath swallowed
Some apothecaries bills or proclamations;
And now the hard and indigestible words
Come up like stones we use to give our hawks.

Webster's Vittoria Coromona, A. 3.

His mode of speaking is therefore most unambitious; and even when he becomes energetic or impassioned, he rarely reaches eloquence—the sustained and heightened style,—the aureum flumen orationis,—is not his; and if he begins a sentence well, he seldom arrives at the conclusion on the same level. He is one of the very rare instances of men, who have extorted rank and secured emolument by little else than the mere force of talent; yet a few years ago, the defect just no-

* It may be necessary to remark, that the word pleading is applied popularly in a very different sense to that in which it is used by lawyers: with the latter, it means merely the preparation of laborious formalities, and has no reference to speeches either to the Jury or to the Court. This perversion of the term of itself seems to shew the perversion of the practice.

* Perhaps this remark applies less to Mr. SCARLETT than to any other King's Counsel, for his reputation is such, that he is often employed to argue matters of mere law, especially in that involved branch relating to Settlements: yet he has hardly time to read his briefs, and frequently argues difficult questions at sight, much to the satisfaction of his clients.

niced was much more conspicuous in him than at present: his delivery was formerly even deficient in fluency; his words dropped out, two, three, or four at a time, leaving painful intervals, that much interfered with the impressiveness of his delivery: at that period, also, he more frequently destroyed the force of the beginning of his sentences, by the awkward manner in which he concluded them: the first of these defects he has however now entirely conquered, and the last is neither so common nor so obvious.

The business of a leading Counsel at Nisi prius chiefly consists of opening speeches, in which the facts are detailed, of the examination of witnesses, and of replies to the case made out on the other side. It is in the last that Mr. SCARLETT is principally eminent, since he has conquered, in a great measure, his refining inclination: his openings are not remarkable for any thing but distinctness, and an endeavour, carried too far, to answer the supposed case of his adversary, instead of relying upon and enforcing his own: the effect is, that he now and then raises ill-founded suspicions in the minds of the Jurymen, that he has not much confidence on what his own witnesses will establish. His examinations and cross-examinations are not deficient in art or shrewdness, but they are not to be compared with those of Sir WILLIAM GARROW or Lord ERSKINE: they want much of the intuition of the former, and of the humorous wheeling of the latter, by which he not unfrequently convinced an adverse witness, that he was his friend and not his enemy. Mr. SCARLETT however has strength without ungentlemanliness, and he generally is successful in extracting the truth. His ruddy, smiling, contented countenance, often deceives a witness into a belief, that whether his answer be no or yes, is a matter of perfect indifference. His replies are however his great forte—the excellence of some of them has perhaps never been exceeded. If the issue depend upon the balance of testimony, upon contradictory witnesses, there is no man, and perhaps never was a man, who had a happier facility of displaying the weak parts of his opponent's case and the strong parts of his own. If it depend upon a deduction of inferences, upon the combination of many minute circumstances, upon reconciling apparently discordant evidence, he is sure to obtain attention in the commencement, and to rivet it to the conclusion. He makes few or no notes of what he intends to say, but arranges all the points in his memory; and when he rises, his face expresses the certainty of a verdict in his favour. He is never tedious, and his remarks upon trifles never seem frivolous or unnecessary: he never exhausts his hearers, and always his subject.

Before I conclude, let me do this gentleman the justice to observe, that he is to a considerable extent one of the exceptions to that crouching servility of the bar I referred to last week: he is obviously a gentleman in his feelings, and of course a gentleman in his conduct; but I have seen him (and I acknowledge it with pleasure) make a firm though respectful resistance to what he considered the unjust dictation of the Bench: it is fit however to add, that no political question was involved in the result.

AMICUS CURIE.

[The next subject of criticism will be Mr. MARRYAT.]

THE BANKRUPT SYSTEM.

CASE OF CRAWLEY.

MR. EXAMINER.—The different accounts given of this case shew the interest the public are supposed to take in matters of this nature; indeed the liberty of the subject is no slight matter to interest them, whether we view it abstractedly as Englishness, in reference to the established protection afforded by our laws, or in reference to the common rights of man to appeal to general and admitted principles of justice and right, for the guarantee of his privileges and free exercise of his discreet and inoffensive agency in society.

It is not my purpose to crowd your columns with entering into the very elaborate researches of the Lord Chancellor, to find precedents to justify the Commissioners in committing Mr. Crawley to prison. His Lordship's great discrimination upon those researches, and his final decision on the question, must give the public an assurance of his profound knowledge of the law, and the justice of his ultimate judgment on the immediate case.

But, Mr. Examiner, I really feel so strongly the duty I owe to society, and the impression on my mind from this and many other Bankruptcy cases, that I cannot restrain myself from raising a query, whether the subjects would have been likely to have trenched so much on the time of his Lordship and the Court, if it had not carried with it the possibility of culpability and censure on the conduct of the Commissioners?

Have you ever, Mr. Examiner, heard of Commissioners privately referring to authorities for a century or two past, to justify them in committing a man to prison, and possibly depriving him of his liberty for the remainder of his life? I never heard of such a thing! An hour or two, or a much shorter time, suffices for those Gentlemen to decide upon and exercise the power with which they are invested.

I once had occasion to attend a private meeting under a Bankruptcy, when the Commissioner in the chair declared, that Commissioners had a greater power than the Lord Chancellor. The decision of his Lordship in this case seems however to have thrown a cloud over this Learned Commissioner's opinion; and the circumstances may serve to shew the levity and inconsiderateness with which Commissioners of Bankrupt sometimes indulge in speculative theories, and draw their hasty conclusions.

In a comparative view of the tardiness in the Court to make decisions, which may affect the character or conduct of Commissioners, and the short space of time occupied in the investigation and committal of a Bankrupt to prison, one cannot but form conjectures upon the contrast between the one and the other—truly not very favourable to the cause of humanity or justice.

The temperament of a Court of Equity is supposed to have more of mercy in it than a Court of Law; but how do we find it in practice in the present times? Cases protracted, from various pleas and exceptions to proceedings, six, ten, or more years, and the peace of mind of the parties at issue kept on the rack for these long periods! As well as great distress, possibly, praying upon the very vitals of the weaker party; greatly disturbing the ease of the other.

The case in question has been of two years standing! There is another afflicting case, of a Mr. Dufrens, a merchant of Leeds, (some particulars of which I have read in your paper) who has been imprisoned for five or six years; and from what I have observed in that case, great doubts have been expressed, not only in the Court of Chancery but in the House of Lords, as to the authority of the Lord Chancellor, both with respect to bringing up a prisoner by Habeas Corpus, and hearing him afterwards on the subject of his committal by the Commissioners.

I do not mean to enter into the merits of this case of Bankruptcy: I am as great an enemy and persecutor of fraud, vice, and injustice, in any shape, as any man can be; and, I assume to think, I am as great a friend and promoter, as far as in my power, of the protection of property, of peace, happiness, and prosperity of my fellow subjects of these realms; but I will frankly confess to you my alarms, that this rashness, in a position of judicial power on the one hand, and a tardiness to reprove it on the other, may eventually involve the country in most lamentable consequences.—I am, Sir, your assured Friend, OSWALD CUSTON.

PADDINGTON PARISH.

MR. EDITOR.—I was much astonished at reading an article in a weekly paper, headed, "Vestry Act," in which the good effect of Mr. Sturges Bourne's Act was attempted to be exemplified, by stating, that Mr. Stockdale, of Pall Mall, after having lost a question then before the Vestry of the Parish of Paddington, by the usual custom of a show of hands, put this Act in force, which dis-empowers those who have been called upon, and have not paid their Poor Rates, from voting; and that thereby the Faction, as this egotist terms those who oppose his interest, were defeated. How does this appear when fairly stated? Mr. Stockdale and his party lost the motion by a show of hands, the only method of deciding any question ever adopted at this Vestry; he then puts the Act in force, when it was found that some of those gentlemen who opposed Messrs. Stockdale, Hicks, Little King, and Co., had been called on, but were not at home, and not having paid their Rates, their votes were not good; and that the principal part of those who supported Messrs. Stockdale and Co., including Mr. S. himself, had not been called on; so that although they had not paid their Rates, their votes were good. Now, Mr. Editor, can you or any honest man believe, that the violent opposition of this seeker of Parish Offices, is an established custom of the Parish of Paddington, for their Officers to bring forward their accounts at a Vestry to be held monthly: but this salutary practice has, by the advice of Mr. Stockdale, been discontinued, and Vestries are now called as circumstances and the interest of Messrs. S. and Co. require them. The above occurrence leads me to notice what I conceive to be an error in Mr. Sturges Bourne's; in many respects, excellent Act, which is the placing so much power in the hands of Collectors or Overseers: for, as in the present case, individuals of the greatest respectability may be deprived of their power of voting, by the Collector calling at their house just before the meeting of the Vestry, and leaving those whom he knows will support him and his measures uncalled on.

* This man is a third-rate publisher in the above street; and he seems very anxious to rival the Court-book-seller (Murray) in the race of sycophancy and scurrility. The people of Paddington however, if we are rightly informed, already know quite enough of Mr. Stockdale.

GRAND PROJECT.

(From an American Paper.)

MR. EDITOR.—It has been sagely said that this is the age of wonders; that it is, I think none will deny, after perusing the following circular. It was received a few days since from a correspondent in St. Louis, who writes that the author, Captain Symmes, is a very respectable man, a man of intelligent, and really sane in mind. He also states that Symmes is diligently engaged in forwarding his scheme, and that upwards of twenty credible persons have actually engaged in the expedition.

TO ALL THE WORLD!

I declare the earth is hollow, and habitable within; containing a number of solid concentric spheres, one within the other, and that it is open at the poles 12 or 16 degrees. I pledge my life in support of this truth, and am ready to explore the hollow, if the world will support and aid me in the undertaking.

JOHN CLEVELAND SYMMES of Ohio, late Captain of Infantry.

N. B. I have ready for the press, a Treatise on the Principles of Matter, wherein I show proofs of the above positions, account for various phenomena, and disclose Dr. Darwin's golden secret. My terms are, the patronage of this and the new worlds. I dedicate to my wife and her ten children. I select Dr. S. L. Mitchell, Sir H. Davy, and Baron Alexander de Humboldt, as my protectors. I ask one hundred brave companions, well equipped, to start from Siberia in the fall season, with reindeer and sleighs, on the ice of the frozen sea—I engage we find warm and rich land, stocked with thrifty vegetables, and animals, if not men, on reaching one degree northward of latitude 82. We will return in the succeeding spring.

PRACTICE OF COURT.

As soon as the Chancellor had taken his seat, Mr. FONBLANQUE addressed his Lordship in the case of "Willan and Willan," which the learned Counsel observed had been so long depending.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Is Counsel prepared and present on the other side?

Mr. FONBLANQUE.—I do not know, my Lord, whether Sir S. Romilly is instructed or not, but he is not now in Court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Then, Mr. Fonblanque, I will not hear the case. If I am, day after day, to be employed in hearing motions and causes in the absence of the necessary Counsel, I might as well not come here at all. It is quite impossible for me to go on in this manner. If another branch of this Court, instead of following the provisions in the Act of Parliament, which direct that the Chancellor should be consulted, choose to introduce a new practice, without concert or communication with me, and which will prevent the business of this Court from proceeding, I had better never leave my room. For the last time, I intimate now that I will give no answer to such applications in future.
